all feare. In which thing we must so much more earnestly labour as we find it more hard. For no man can be bent to praise, but that he shall seele many bythoughts to creepe upon him, either to breake off, or by some bowing and swaring to hinder the course of his prayer. But here let vs cal to mind, how great an vnworthinesse it is, when God receiueth vs vnto familier talk with him, to abuse his great gentlenessse, with mingling holy and prophane things together, when the reuerence of him holdeth not our minde fast bound vnto him, but as if we talked with some mean man, we do in the midst of our prayer, forsaking him, leape hitther and thither. Let vs therefore know that none do rightly and well prepare themselves to prayer, but they who the majestie of God pearceth, that they come to it vncombred of earthlie cares and affections. And that is meant by the ceremonie of lifting vp of handes, that men should remember that they bee farre distant from God, vnles they lift vp their senses on high. As also it is said in the Psalm, To thee have I lifted vp my soule. And the Scripture oftentimes vseth this maner of speech, to lift vp prayer: that they which desire to be heard of God, should not set still in their dregges. Let this be the summe: that howe much more liberally God dealeth with vs, gently alluring vs to vnload our cares into his boosome, so much less excusable are we vnlesse his so excellent and incomparabe benefite doe with vs ouerwey all other thinges and drawe vs vnto it selfe, that we may earnestly apply our endeavours and senses to pray: which can not be done vnlesse our minde by strongly wrastling with the hinderances doe rise vp aboue them. An other point we haue set forth, that we aske no more than God giueth leave. For though he biddeth vs to pour out our heartes, yet he doth indifferently giue loose reinnes to foolish & froward affections: and when he promiseth that he will doe according to the wil of the godly, he proceedeth not to so tender bearing with them that he submitteth himselfe to their will. But in both these pointes men doe commonly muche oppose. For not onely the most part of men presume without shame, without reverence, to speake to God for their follies, and shamelessly to present to his throne whatsoever liked them in their dreme: but also so great foolishnesse or senselesse dulnesse possedeth them, that they dare thrust into the hearing of God, even all their most filthie desires, whereof they would greatly be ashamed to make men privie. Some prophane men have laughed to seorne, yea and detested this boldnesse, yet the vice it selfe hath alwaye reigned. And hereby it came to passe that ambitious men haue chosen Wipiter to be their Patron: courteous men, Mercurie the desirous of learning, Apollo and Minerva: warriers, Mars: and Lecherous folk, Venus. Like as at this day (as I have euie nowe touched) men doe in prayers graunt more licence to their unlawfull desires, than when they sportingly talke with their Eqals. But God suffreth not his gentlenessse to be so mocked: but claiming to himselfe his right, maketh our prayers subject to his authoritie, and restranceth them with a bridle. Therefore we must kepe fast this saying of John. This is our assiance, that if we aske anie thing according to his will, be he hearteth vs. But forasmuch as our abilities are farre from being sufficient to performe to great perfection, wee must secke a remedy to helpe vs. As we ought to bende the sight of our minde to God, so the affection of the heart.
ought also to follow to the same ende. But both doe, saie, farre beneath it, yea rather doe faint and faile or be carried a contrarie waie. Therefore God to succour this weakness, in our prayers giueth the spirit to be our scholemaster, to instruct vs what is right, and to gouerne our affections. For, because we know not what we ought to pray as we ought, the spirit commeth to our succour, and maketh intercession for vs with unspeakable gronings, that it indeed either praieth or proneth but stireth vp in vs affiance, desires, and fightings, which the strength of nature were not able to conceive. And not without cause Paul calleth them unspeakable gronings which to the faithfull sende forth by the guiding of the spirit, because they which are truely exercised in prayers, are not ignorant that they bee to holden in perplexity with blinde cares, that they scarcely finde what is profitable for them to speake: yea while they goe about to utter hammering wordes they stike fast incombred. Whereupon it followeth, that the gift of praying rightly is a singular gift. These things are not spoken to this purpose, that we favouring our owne flouthfulness should give over the charge of praying to the Spirit of God, and lie dull in that carelessnes, to which we are too much inclined (as there are heard the wicked sayinges of some, that we must lie negligently gaping to waite vntill he prevent our minds occupied elsewhere) but rather that we loathing our owne flouthfulness and sluggishnesse, should crave such helpe of the Spirit. Neither doeth Paul, when he biddeth vs to pray in Spirit, therefore cease to exhort vs to wakefulness: meaning that the instinct of the Spirit to withe his force to frame our prayers, that it nothing hindereth or slacketh our owne endeavour: because God will in this behalfe prove how effectuallly faith moueth our hearts.

6 Let also an other lawe be, that in praying we alwaye seeke our owne want, and that earnestly thinking howe we stande in neede of those things that we aske, we joynie with our prayer an earnest yea fervent affection to obtaine. For manie doe lightly for manners fake recite prayers after a prescribed forme, as though they rendered a certain taske to God: and although they confesse that this is a necessarie remedie for their evils, because it is to their destruction to be without the helpe of God which they crave: yet it appeareth that they doe this dutie for custome, forasmuch as in the mean time their mindes are cold, and doe not wey what they aske. The generall and confusfe feeling indeede of their necessitie leadeth them henceto: but it doth not stirre them as it were in a present case to ask everylee of their neede. Nowe what thinke wee to bee more hatefull or more detestable to God than this faining, when a man asketh forgivenesse of sinnes, in the mean time either thinking that he is not a sinner, or not thinking vpon this that hee is a sinner, cuen wherewith God himselfe is plainly mocked? But of such peruersenesse (as I have saide) mankinde is full, that for manners fake they manie times aske many things of God, which they certainly judge that without his liberality to come to the from some other where, or that they have them headeiie remaining with them. The fault of some other seemeth to be lighter and yet not tolerable, that they which have once conceiued this principle that we must sacrifice to God with praiers prayers, do mumble vp prayers without any musing of minde uppon them. But the godly must principally take heed, that they neuer come into the sight of God to ask any thing, but because they do both boyle with earnest affection of heart, and do theerewith all desire to obtaine it of him. Yea, and also though in those things which wee aske onely to the glorie of God, wee seeme not at the first sight to provide for our owne necessitie, yet the same ought to be asked with no lesse ferventnesse & vehementnes of desire. As, when we pray that his name be halowed, wee must (as I may so speake) frequently hunger & thirst for that hallowing.

7 If any man object, that wee are not alway driven with like necessitie to pray, I grant the same indeede: and this difference is profitably taught vs of James: Is any man heauie among you? Let him pray. Who so is moris, let him sing. Therefore eveu common feeling teacheth vs, that because we are too slothful, therefore, as the matter requireth we are the more sharply pricked forward of God to pray earnestly. And this David calleth the fit time, because (as he teacheth in many other places) how much more hardly troubles, discommodities, feares & other kinds of tentations do preffe vs, so much freer access is open for vs, as though God did call vs vnto him. But yet no lesse true is that saying of Paul, that we must pray al times: because how soever things prosperously flowe according to our hearts desire, and matter of mirth doth compass vs on every side, yet there is no minute of time wherein our neede doth not exhort vs to pray. If a man have abundance of wine and wheate: yet sith he cannot enjoy one morse of breade but by the continual grace of God, whole cellers or barnes full shall be no let why hee should not crave daily breade. Nowe if wee call to minde howe many dangers do euery moment hang over vs, the verie fearre it selde will teach vs that we have no time free from prayer. But this we may better perceiue in spiritual things. For, when shal so many finnes, whereof wee knowe our selues guiltie, suffer vs to sit still without care and not in humblewise crave pardon both of the fault and the paine? When do tentations grant vs truçe, so that we neede not to haft vnto help? Moreover the desire of the kingdome and glorie of God ought so to pluck vs to it selfe, not by fitthes but continually, that it should alway be fit time for vs. Therefore not without cause wee are so oft commanded to pray continually. I doe not yet speake of perseverance in prayer, whereof mention shalbe made hereafter: but when y scripture warneth vs that we ought to pray continually, it accuseth our slownesse, because wee do not perceiue how necessarie this care & diligence is for vs. By this rule all hypocritie and craftines ofelying to God, is debarrd, yea driven farre away from prayer. God promiseth that he will bee neere to all them that cal vpon him in trueth, and he pronounceth that they shall finde him which seake him with their whole heart. But they aspire not that which please themselues in their owne filthinesse. Therefore a right prayer requireth repentance. Whereupon this is commonly said in the Scriptures, that God heareth not wicked doers, and that their prayers are a cursed, like as their sacrifices alfo be: because it is rightfull that they finde the cares of GOD shutte, which doe locke vp their owne heartes, and that they should not finde God easie to bowe, which doe with their owne hardnesse
Cap. 20. Of the manner how to receive

Esa. 15. 15. prouoke his stiffenesse. In Esay he threateneth after this manner. When yee shall multiply your prayers, I will not heare you; for your handes are full of blood. Againe in Iermrie: I haue cried and they haue refused to heare: they shal likewise criе, and I will not heare: because he taketh it for a most high dishonour, that wicked men should boast of his covenant, which doe in all their life desie his holy name. Wherefore in Esay he complaineth that when the Iews come necere to him with their lippes, their heart is farre from him. He speaketh not this of only prayers, but affirmeth that he abhorreth faining in all the partes of worshipping him. To which purpose maketh that saying of James. Yee ask, and receiue not: because yee ask ill, that yee may spende it vpon your pleasures. It is true in deede (as wee shall againe shewe a little hereafter) that the prayers of the godly which they powre out, doe not rest vpon their owne worthinesse; yet is not that admonition of John superfluous, if wee ask any thing, we shall receiue it of him, because wee keepe his commandements: forasmuch as an euill conscience shueth the gate against vs. Whereupon followeth that none doe rightly pray, nor are heard, but the pure worshippers of God. Therefore whosoever prepareth himselfe to pray, let him be lothfull to himselfe in his owne euils, and (which cannot bee done without repentance) let him put on the person and minde of a begger.

The thirde rule of prayer is the unsained humbling & abacing of our sines.

Dan. 9. 18. Hereunto let the third rule be joyned, that whosoever presenteth him selfe before God to pray, should forsake all thinking of his owne glorie, put off all opinion of worthinesse, and finally give ouer all trust of himselfe, giving in the abacing of himselfe the glorie wholly to God: least if wee take any thing be it never so little to our selves, we doe with our owne swelling fall away from his face. Of this submission which throweth downe all height, wee have often examples in the seruants of God: among whom the holier thatervie one is, so much the more he is throwne downe when hee commeth into the sight of the Lord. So Daniel, whom the Lord himselfe commended, with so great a title of praise, saith: We powre not our prayers before thee in our righteousnesses, but in thy great mercies. Here vs Lord, Lord be merciful to vs: Heare vs, & do these things that we ask. For thine owne sake: because thy name is called vp ower the people & ower thy holy place. Neither doth he by a crooked figure (as men sometime speake) mingle him selfe with the multitude as one of the people, but rather severally confesseth his owne guiltiness and humbly fleeth to the sanctuary of forgiveness, as he expressly faith: When I confessed my sins & the sinnes of my people. And this humblenesse Daniel also setteth out with his owne example, when he saith, Enter not into judgement with thy seruaunt, because in thy sight euery one that liueth shal not be justified, In such manner Esay prayeth: Lot, thou art angrie because we haue sinned, the world is founded in thy wayes, therfore wee shalbe sauced: And we haue bin all filled with vncleannesse, & all our righ- teounes as a defiled cloth: and we haue all withered away as a leafe, & our iniquities do scatter vs abroad as the wind: and there is none that calleth vpon thy name, that raiseth vp him selfe to take holde of thee: because thou haft hid thy face from vs, & haft made vs to pine away in the hande of our wickednes. Now therefore O Lord, thou art our father, we are clay, thou art our our fashioner, & we are the worke of thy hande. Be not angrily O Lord, neither remember wickednes for ever. Behold, look upon vs, we are all thy people. Lo, how they stand upon no affiance at all, but vs this only, y thinking upon this y they be Gods, they despize not that he will have care of them. Likewise Jeremie. If our iniquities answer against vs, doe thou for thy names sake. For it is both most truly & most holy written, of whomsoever it be, which being written by an unknowne author is fathered upon the Prophet Baruch: A soule haue not desire & desolate for the greatnes of evil, crooked, & weake, a humber soule, & fainting eyes give glory to thee O Lord. Not according to the rightheousnesse of our fathers do we pour out prayers in thy sight, & ask mercy before thy face O Lord our God, but because thou art mercifull, haue mercy upon vs, because we have sinned before thee.

9 Finally the beginning & also the preparing of praying rightly, is crying of pardon, with an humble & plaine confession of fault. For neither is it to be hoped, that even the holiest man male obtaine any thing of God, vntil he be freely reconciled to him: neither is it possible that God may be favourable to any but them whom he pardoneth. Wherefore it is no maruaile if the faithful do with this keie open to themselves the doore to pray. Which we learne out of many places of the Psalmes. For David when he asked an other thing, faith: Remember not the sinnes of my youth, remember me according to thy mercy for thy goodness sake O Lorde. Again: Looked vpon my affliction, & my labour, & forgive all my sinnes. Where we also see y it is not enough, if we every severall day do call our selves to account for our new sinnes; if we do not also remember those sinnes which might seeme to have beene long ago forgotten. For, the same Prophet in another place, haung confessed one hainous offence by this occasion returneth euens to his mothers wombe wherein he had gathered the infection: not to make the fault seeme lese by the corruption of nature, but that heaping together the sinnes of his whole life, how much more rigorous he is in condemning himselfe, so much more easie he may find God to entreat. But although the holy ones do not alway in expresse words aske forgiveness of sinnes, yet if we diligently weigh their prayers which the Scripture rehearseth, we shall easilie finde which I lay, they gathered a mind to pray of the only mercy of god, & so alway took their beginning at appeasing him: because if every man examine his owne conscience, so farre is he from being bold to open his eares familiarly with God, that he trembleth at evcry comming toward him, except that he standeth vpon trust of mercie & pardon. There is also another speciall confession, where they aske release of paines, that they also praine to have their sins forgiven: because it were an absurditie to will that the effect be taken away while the cause abideth. For wee must beware that God be fauourable vnto vs, before that he will forgive his saunter with outward signs: because both he himselfe will keepe this order, & it should liitle profit vnto haue him beneficailly, unless our conscience feeling him appeased should thoroughly make him loely vnto vs. Which we are also taught by the ancients of Chri$t. For whē he had decreted to heale the man sick of the Palse, he said, Thy sinnes are forgiven thee: lieting vp our mindes thereby to that which is chiefly to be wished, that God first receive vnto fauour, and then

The fourth rule of prayer is courage grounded upon certain hope.

Praise is fruitful, where there is not an unsanctified aspring into godliness, such as David & Ezekiel mention in their praying as warranting thereby that they could not praise in vain.

with the feeling of the just vengeance of God sure affiance of favour: which things do yet very well agree together, if the onely goodnes of God raise vs vp being oppressed with our owne euils, For, as we haue before taught that repentance and faith are knit as companions together with an vnseparable bond; of which yet the one affraie vs, the other eagerhe vs: so in prayers they must mutually meete together. And this agreement David expresseth in fewe wordes: I (faith he) will in the multitude of thy goodnes enter into thy house: I will worship in the Temple of thy holines with feare. Vnder the goodnes of God he comprehended faith, in the meane time not excluding feare: because not onlie his maieftie driueth vs to incence, but also our owne vnworthinesse holdeth vs in feare forgetting all pride and assurednes. But I meane not such an affiance which should shoke the minde loosed from all feeling of carefulnesse with a sweete and full quernessse. For, to rect fo peaceably is the doing of them which haueing all things flowing as they would with it, are touched with no care, are kindled with no deside, do swell with no feare. And it is a very good spurre to the holic ones to call vp on God, when beeing distressed with their owne necessitie, they are vexed with most great vnquietnessse, and are almofte difinaide in them selues, till faith come in fit time to their succours, because in such distresses the goodnesse of God shineth to them, that they do in deed grone beeing warried with weight of present euils, they are also in paine & grieved with feare of greater, yet being so vphold by it, they both receive & comfort the hardnes of bearing them, & doe hope for escape & deliverance. Therefore the praire of a godly man must arise out of both affections, must also contain & shewe both: name lie to grone for present euils, and to be carefulie afraid of new, and yet therewithall to fly to God, nor doubting that he is ready to reach his helping hand. For God is maruellouslie prouoked to wrath by our distrustfulness, if we ask of him the benefits which we hope not to obtaine. Therefore there is nothing more agreeable with the nature of praiers, than this law be preferred & appointed to them, that they breake not forth rashly, but follow faith going before the. To this principle Christ calleth vs all with this saying: I say vnto you, whatsoeuer things ye require, believe that ye shall receive, & they shall happé to you. The same also he confirmeth in another place. Whatsoeuer ye ask in prayer beleueing, ye shall receive. Wherewith agreeeth James also. Faining, If any need wisdom, let him ask it of him which giueth to all me free lie, and vpbraidedeth not: but let him ask in faith not doubting. Wherein setting doubting as contrary to faith, he doth most sily expresse the nature of it. And no leffe is that to be noted which he addeth, that they obtain nothing which call vp God in watering & doubt, and do not determine in their heartes whether they shaue heard or no. Whom he also compariseth to waues which are diverslie tossed and driuen about of the winde. Whereupon in another place he calleth a right prayer, the prayer of Faith. Againe when God so oft affirmeth that he wil giue to euery one according to his faith, he significeth that we obtain nothing without faith. Finallie it is faith that obtaineth whatsoever is granted by praire. This is meant by that notable saying of Paul, which the foolish men doe take no heed vnto: Howe shal any man call vppon him, in whom he hath not beleued? But who shal beleue, beleeue,yunlesse he haue heard? But faith commeth of hearing, and hearing of the word of God. For coneying by degrees the beginning of prayer is faith, he plainly affirneth that God can not be sincerely called vpon of any other, than them to whom by the preaching of the Gospel his mercifullnesse and gentleness hath beene made knowne, and familiarly declared.

12 This necessity our adueraries do not thinke vpon. Therefore when we bid the faithful to hold with assured confidence of mind that God is fauourable, and beareth good will to them, they thinke we speake a most great absurdity. But if they had any of true praire, they would truly understande that God can not be rightly called vpon without that stedfast feeling of Gods good will. Sith no man can well perceive the force of faith, but he which by experience feeleth it in his hart: what may a man profit by disputing with such men, which do openly shew, that they never had anything but a vain imagination: For of what force, & how necessarie is that assurednesse which we require, is cleere learned by invocation. Which who so seeth not, be bewrayeth he hath a very dull conscience. Let vs therefore leaving this kind of blind men, stick fast in that saying of Paul, that God can not be called vpon of any other, but them that know his mercy by the gospel, & are surely perswaded that it is readie for them. For what maner of laying should this be? O lord, I am verily in doubt whether thou wilt hear me: but because I am distresse with carfulnesse, I flee to thee,y thou maist help me if I be worthy. This was not the wonted manner of all the holy ones, whose praiers we read in scriptures. Neither hath the holy ghost thus taught vs by the apostle which biddeth vs to go to the beauteous throne with confidence, that we may obtain grace, & when in another place he teacheth that we have boldnesse & access in confidence by the faith of Chrifl. We must therefore hold fast with both handes this assurednesse to obtain what we ask(fith both the Lord with his owne voice to commandeth vs, & all the holy ones teach it by his example) if we will pray with fruit. For,y only praire is pleasing to God which springeth out of such a presumption of faith( as 1 may so call it) & is grounded vpon a dreadfull certainty of faith, he might have bin content with the bare name of faith, but he not onlie added confidence, but also furnished the fane with libertie or boldnes, by this mark to put difference betwene vs & vnbelieuers, which do in decrees also pray to God as we do, but at adventurce. For which reason the whole church praieth in the psalm: Let thy mercie be vpon vs, as we put our trust in thee. The same condition is also spoken of in another place by the Prophet: In what day I shall cry, this I knowe that God is with me. Again, In the morning I will direct my selfe to thee, & I will watch. Fas of these words we gather, that praiers are in vain cast into the aire, vnlesse hope be adoinde, from whence as out of a watchour we may quietly waite for the Lord. Wherewith agreeth the order of Pauls exhortation. For before that he moueth faithfull to pray in spiritus at all times with wakefulnesse and diligence, he first of all biddeth them to take the shield of faith, the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit, which is the worde of God. Now let the readers here call to remembrance that which I haue before saide, that faith is not overthrowne where it is joined with acknowledging of our misery, neediness, and filthinesse. For with how heauiie weight souer of cuill euill doings the faithfull seele themselues to be overladen or grieved, and they be not only voide of all things which may procure fauour with God, but also that they be burdened with many offences which may worthily make him dreadfull to them: yet they caullie not to present themselues, neither doth this feeling make them to afraid but that they still return to him, for as much as there is no other way to come to him. For prayer was not ordained, whereby we should arrogantly aduance our selues before God, or esteem at great value any thing of our owne, but whereby confessing our guiltines, we would bewail our miseries to him, as children do familiarly open their complaints to their parents. But rather the vnmeasurable heape of our euils ought to be full of spurreys or prickes to pricke vs forward to pray. As also the Prophet teacheth vs by his example, saying: Heale my soule,because I haue sinned against thee, I grant in deedev in such sayinges should be deadly prickings vnlesse God did helpe but the most good father of his incomparable tender kindnes hath brought remedy in his season, whereby appeasing all trouble, affuaging all cares, wiping away feares, he might gently allure vs to him, yea & taking away all doutes (much more all stoppes) hee might make vs an easie way.

13 And first when he commandeth vs to pray, he doth by the very same commandement accuse vs of wicked obstinacy, vnlesse we obey him. Nothing could be more precipitely commanded, than that which is in the Psalm: call vpon me in the day of trouble. But forasmuch as among all the duties of godlines, the Scripture commendeth none more often, I neede not to tarry longer vpon this point. Asketh (as our master) & ye shall receive: knouke, it shalbe opened to you. Howbeit here is also with the commandement ioyned a promise as it is necessarie. For though al men confess, the commandement ought to be obeyed, yet the most part would fle from God, when he calleth, vnlesse he promised ye he would bee easie to be entreated, yea & would offer himselue. These two things being established, it is certaine that whosoever make delays, they come not straight to God, are not onely rebellious & disobedient, but also are proved guiltie of insidetie, because they distrust promises. Which is so much more to be noted, because hypocrites under the colour of humilitie & modestie do as well prouedly dispose the commandement of God, as discredite his gentle calling, yea & destauand him of his chief part of his worship. For after that he hath refused sacrifices, in which at that time all holinesse seemed to stand, he declareth that this is the chiefest thing & most precious to him above all other, to be called vpon in the day of need. Therefore where he requireth his owne, & encourageth vs to cheerefullnes of obeying, there are none so gay colours of doubting that may excuse vs. Wherefore how many testimonies are commonly found in the Scriptures whereby we are commanded to call vpon God, so many standards are set vp before our eyes to put affiance into vs. It were rafhes to rush into the sight of God, vnlesse he did preuent vs with calling vs. Therefore he openeth vs the way with his owne voice, saying: I will say to them, Ye are my people: and they shall say to me, thou art our God. We see howe he preuenteth them that worship him: and willeth them to followe him, and therefore it is not to be feared that this should not be a very sweete melodie which he tuneth.
Cap. 20... Of the maner how to receive

Psal. 65.3. tuneth. Specially let this notable title of God come in our minde, whereupon if we stay, we shall easilie passe over all stopes. Thou God that hearest prayer, even to thee shall all flesh come. For what is more louely or more alluring, than that God be garnished with this title which may ascertaine vs that nothing is more proper to his nature, than to grant the desire of humble suiters? Hereby the Prophet gathereth that the gate standeth open not onely to a fewe, but to all men: because he speaketh even to all in this sayinge: Call upon me in the daye of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorifie me. According to this rule David laith for himselfe that a promise was gived him, that he may obtaine what he asketh: Thou Lord hast revealed into the care of thy seruants: therefore thy seruants hath founde his heart to pray. Whereupon we gather that he was carefull, sauing in so much as the promise had encouraged him, So in another place he armeth himselfe with this general doctrine. He will do the will of them that fear him. Yea, and this may note in the Pfalmes, that as it were breaking his course of praying he pasheth over sometime to the power of God, sometime to his goodnes, sometime to the truth of his promises. It might feme that David by vnsealable threbling in of these sentences, made mangled prayers: but the faithful know by vse and experience, that fruenetnes faine theth vnsele they put newe nourishementes vnto it, and therefore in praying the meditation both of the nature of God, and of his worde is not superfluous. And so by the example of David, let it not grieve vs to thrust in such things as may refresh fainting hearts with new liuely strength.

Our sluggishnes notwithstanding so many so effectuall moses vn to this heavenly exerciese.

Prou. 18.10. Isocl. 2.32. And Ioel, after that he had prophesied of that horrible destruction which was at hand, added this notable sentence. Whosoever calleth vpon the name of the Lorde, shall be safe: which sentence wee knowe to pertaine properly to the course of the Gospell. Scarcely euerie hundredth man is moved to goe forward to meete God. He himselfe crieth by Esay: Ye shall call vpon mee, and I will heare you, yea, before that ye crieth, I will answere you. And this same honour also in another place he vouchfaeth to glie in common to the whole Church, as it belongeth to all the members of Christ. He hath cried to me, I will heare him, I am in trouble with him, that I may deliver him. Neither yet (as I haue alreadie saide) is it my purpose to reckem vp all the places, but to choose out the chiefes, by which we may take a taste howe kindely God allureth vs vnto him, and with howe straitly bonds our vnthankfulnesse is bound, whereamong so sharpe prickings our sluggisnes still make th delay. Wherefore let these sayinges alwaye founde in our cares: The Lorde is nie to all them that call vpon him, that call vpon him in trueth: also these sayinges which wee haue alleaged out of Esaye and Ioel, by which God affrighth that he is heedefull to heare prayers, yea and is delited as with a sacrifice of sweete sauour, when we cast our cares vpon him him. This singular fruit we receive of the promises of God, when we make our prayers not douteing and fearfully but trulying upon his word, whose majesty would otherwise make us afraid, we dare call upon him by the name of Father, forasmuch as he vouchsafe to put this most sweet name into our mouths. It remaineth that we having such allurements should know that we have thereby matter enough to obtain our prayers: forasmuch as our prayers stand upon no merit of our owne, but all their worthines and hope of obtaining are grounded upon the promises of God, and hang upon them: so that it needeth none other underpropping, nor looketh upward hither or thither. Therefore we must determine in our minds, that although we excel not in like holiness as is prayed in the holy fathers, prophets and Apostles, yet because the commandement of prayer is common to vs, and faith is also common, if we rest upon the word of God, in this right we are fellowes with them. For God (as we have before shewed) promising that he will bee gentle, and mercifull to all, giveth cause of hope to all even the most miserable that they shall obtaine what they ask. And therefore the generall formes are to be noted, from which no man (as they say) from the first to the last is excluded: only let there bee present a purenes of hart, misliking of ourselves, humilitie and faith: let not our hypocrisie vnholie abufe the name of God with deceitfull calling upon it: the most good father will not put backe them, whom he not only exhorteth to come to him, but also moueth them by all the meanes that he can. Hereupon commeth the manner of praying of David, which I have even nowe rehearsed. Lo thou hast promised, Lord, to thy seruanta for this cause thy seruant at this day gathereth courage, and hath found what prayer he might make before thee. Now therefore O Lord God, thou art God, and thy words shall be true. Thou hast spok unto thy seruant of these benefits: begin therefore, and doe them. As also in another place, Perfore me to thy seruant according to thy word. And as the Israelites together, so oft as they arm them selves with remembrance of the couenaunt, doe sufficiently declare that we should not pray fearfully, whereas the Lord so appointeth. And herein they followed the examples of the fathers, specially of Jacob, which after that hee had confessed that he was vnworthy of so many mercies which he had received at the hand of God, yet hee faith that hee is encouraged to require greater things because God had promised he woulde doe them. But whatsouer colours the vnbelieuers do pretend, when they flee not to God so oft as necessitie presseth them, when they seeke not him nor craue his helpe, they do as much defraud him of his due honor as if they made to the seruices newe Gods, and idols: for by this means they deny that he is the author of all good things. On the other side, there is nothing stronger to deliver the godly from all dower, than to be armed with this thought, that no stop ought to stay them while they obey the commandement of God, which pronounceth that nothing is more pleasing to him than obedience. Here againe that which I faide before more clearly appeareth, that a dredles spirite to pray, agreeth well with fear, reverence, and carefulnes: and that it is no aburditie to say that God raieth vp the ouerthrown. After this manner those forms ofspeach agree well together which in seeming are contrarie. Jeremiah and Daniel say that they throwe downe prayers before God. In another place Jeremiah saith: Let our prayer fall downe in the sight of God, that he may have mercy on the remnant of his people. On the other side, the faithfull are oftentimes said to lift vp prayere: So speaketh Ezekiel, requiring the prophet to make intercession for him. And David desireth that his prayer may ascend as incense. For although they being persuaded of the fatherly love of God, cheerfully commit themselves into his faithfull keeping, and doubt not to crave the help which he freely promiseth; yet doth not an idle carelesnesse lift them vp, as though they had cast away shame, but they ascende so vpwarde by degrees of promises, that they still remaine humble suppliants in the abacement of themselves.

Here are questions objected more than one. For the Scripture reporteth that the Lord granted certaine desires which yet brake forth of a mind not quiet nor well framed. Verilie for an iust caufe: Joatham had auowed the inhabitants of Sichem, to the destruction which afterward came upon them: but yet God kindled with ferventnes of anger & vengeaunce following his execration seemeth to allowe it tempered violent passions. Such heat also carried Sampson when he laid, Strengthen me O God, that I may take vengeance of the uncircumsized. For though there were some piece of good zeal mingled with it yet a hote, and therefore faultie greedinesse of vengeance did beare rule therein. God granted it. Whereupon it seemeth that it may be gathered, that although the prayers bee not framed according to the pre- scrib'd rule of the word, yet they obtaine their effect. I answer first that a generall law is not taken away by singular examples: again, that sometime special motions haue bin put into a fewe men, whereby it came to passe that there was another consideration of the then of the common people. For the answere of Christ is to be noted, when the disciples did vndiscreetely desire to counterfeit the example of Elias, that they knewe not with what spiritie they were endued. But we must go yet further, and say that the prayers do not alway please God which he granteth: but that, so much as serveth for example that is by clere praise made playne which the scripture teacheth, namely that he succoureth the miserable, heareth the groanings of the which being vnusuall troubles hee craue his helpe: that therefore hee executeth his judgments, when the complaints of the poore rise vp to him, although they be vnworthy to obtaine any thing be it never so little. For how oft hath hee taking vengeance of the cruelties, robberies, violence, filthy lustes, & other wicked doings of the vngodly, subduing their boldnes & rage, & also ouerthrowing their tyrannous power, testified hee helpe the vnworthy oppresced, which yet did beat the ayre with praying to an uncertain godhead? And one Psalme plainly teacheth that the prayers want not effect, which yet do not percease into heauen by faith. For hee gathereth together those prayers which necessarie wringeth no lesse out of the vnbelieuers then out of the godly by the verie feeling of nature: to which yet he proue by the effect, that God is favourable. Is it because hee doth with such gentlenesse testify that they be pleasing to him? No. But to enlarge or to set out his mercie by this circumstance, for that ecu to vnbelieuers their prayers are not denied; and then the more to pricke forwarde his true worshippers to pray, when they...

they see that profane wailings sometime want not their effect. Yet there is no cause why the faithfull should swerve from the lawe laid upon them by God, or should entice the unbelievers, as though they had gotten some great gaine, when they have obtained their desire. After this manner we have sayd, that the Lord was bowed with the repentance of Ahab, that he might thew by this example how easie he is to entreat towardes his elect, when true turning is brought to appease him. Therefore in the Palse he blameth the Iews, that they having by experience proved him so easie to grant their prayers, yet within a little after returned to the stubbornesse of their nature, Which also plainly appeareth by the historie of the Judges: namely that so oft as they wept, although their tears were deceitfull, yet they were delivered out of the hands of their enemies. As therefore the Lord do indifferently bringeth forth his sunne vpon the good and the euill: so doth he also not despise their weepinges: whose cause is righteous and their miseries worthy of helpe. In the meantime he no more heareth these to saluation, than herein ministreth food to the despisers of his goodnes. The question seemeth to be somewhat harder of Abraham and Samuel: of whom the one being warranted by no word of God, prayed for the Sodomites: the other against a manifest forbidding prayer for Saul. Likewise is it of Jeremie which prayed that the city might not be destroyed. For though their requests were denied, yet it seemeth hard to take faith from them. But this solution shall (as I trust) satisfy sober readers: that they being instructed with the general principles, whereby God commandeth them to be merciful even also to the vnworthy; were not altogether without faith, although in a special case their opinion deceived them. Augustine writeth wisely in a certain place: How (faith he) do the holy ones pray by faith, to ask of God contrary to that which he hath decreed? Even because they pray according to his will: not that hidden and vnochangeable will, but the will which he inspirèth into them, that he may heare them after another manner: as he wisely maketh difference. This is well said: because after his incomprehensible counsel he so tempereth the successe of things, that the prayers of the holy ones be not void where are wrapped both with faith and errour together. Neither yet ought this more to auaile to be an example to followe, than it exciteth the holy ones themselves, whome I denie not to have past measure. Wherefore where appeareth no certaine promise, we must ask of God with a condition adjoinned. To which purpose seuereth that saying of David. Watch to the judgement which thou hast commanded: because the seer saith that he was warranted by a special oracule to ask a temporall benefit.

16 This also it is profitable to note, that those things which I have spoken of the foure rules of right prayer, are not so exactly required with extreme rigor, that God refusateth the prayers in which he shall not finde either perfect faith or perfect repentance together with a seruiceness of zeal and well ordered requestes. We haue said that although prayer be a familiar talke of the godly with God, yet we must keepe a seruence & modestie, that wee giue not loose reine to all requestes whatsoever they be; and that we desire no more than God giueth leave: and then, least the maiestie of God shoule.
Of the manner how to receive should grow in contempt with vs, that we must lift our minde vpward to a pure and undefeiled worshipping of him. This no man hath ever perfomned with such puritie as it ought to bee. For, (to speake nothing of the common sort) how many complaints of David do favor of vntemperance: not that he meant of purpose to quarrell with God, or carpe against his judgments: but because he fainting for weaknesse, found no other better comfort, than to cast his sorrowes into his bosome. Yea and God beeareth with our childish speech and pardoneth our ignorance, so often as any thing vnadvisedly escapeth vs: as truely without this tender bearing, there should be no libertie of praying. But although David’s minde was to submit himselfe wholly to the will of God, and he prayed with no lesse patience than desire to obtaine; yet there arieth yeboile out, sometimes troublous affections, which are much disagreeing from the first rule that wee haue set. Specially we may perceive by the conclusion of the xxxix. Psalm, with howe great vehemency of sorrowe that holy man was carried away, that he could not keupe measure Cease (faith he) from me, till I goe away and be not. A man would say that he like a desperate man desirith nothing els but that the hand of God ceaseth, he might rot in his evils. He saith it not for that hee with an aowed minde runneth into such outrage, or (as the reprobat were wont) would have GOD to depart from him: but onely he complaineth that the wrath of GOD is too heauie for him to beare. In these terrors also there fall out oftentimes requestes not well framed according to the rule of the worde of God, and in which the holy ones doe not sufficiently weye what is lawfull and expedient. Whatsoever prayers are spotted with these faultes, they deserve to be refus’d: yet if the holy ones doe bewaile, correct themselues, and by and by come to themselues again, God pardoneth the. So they offend also in the seconde rule, because they are oftentimes driven to wrestle with their owne coldenesse, and their neede and miserie doth not sharply enough pricke them to praise earnestly. And oftentimes it happeneth that their mindes do slide aside, and in a maner wander away into vanity. Therefore in this behalfe also ther is neede of pardon, lest our faint, or unperfect, or broken and wandering prayers have a denial. This God hath naturally planted in the mindes of men, that prayers are not perfect but with minde lifted vpward. Hereupon came the cermemony of lifting vp of handes, as we haue before saide, which hath bene vfed in all ages and nations, as yet it is in vre. But how many a one is there, which when hee lifteth vp his hands, doth not in his owne conscience find himselfe dull, because his heart resteeth upon the grounde? As touching the asking of forgiveness of sinnes, although none of the faithfull doe ouerpasse it, yet they which are truely exercised in prayers doe feel: that they bring for to the tenth part of that sacrifice, of which David speaketh. An acceptable sacrifice to God is a troubled spirit: a broken and humbled heart. O God thou wilt not despise. So there is alwaye double pardon to be asked, both because they knowe themselves guiltie in consciences of many faults, with feeling whereof they are not yet so touched, y they mislike themselves so much as they ought: and also that, so much as it is given them to profit in repentance and in the feare of GOD, they being throned downe with just sorrowe for their offences, should should pray to escape the punishment of the judge. Cheesely the feeblenes or imperfection of faith corrupeth the prayers of the faithful, vntill the tender mercie of God did help them. But it is no maruel that God pardoneth this default, which doth oftentimes exercise the whole, with harpe instructions, as if he should purpose quench their faith. This is a most hard temptation, when the faithful are compelled to cry: how long wilt thou be angrie vpon the paiter of thy servant? as though the verie prayers made God more angrie. So when Ieremias faith: The Lord saith out my praiser, it is no doubt that he was shaken with a violent pang or trouble. Innumerable such examples are commonly found in the scriptures, by which appeareth that the faith of the holy ones was oftentimes mingled & toffe with doubtings, that in beleeuing & hoping they be rayed yet some unfaithfulness, but because they come not so far as it is to be wished, they ought to indenour so much the more that their faults being amended, they may daily come nearer to the perfect rule of praying, & in the meanete time to feele in how great a depth of evils they be drowned, which eu in the very remedies do get to themselves newe diseases; & thus there is no prayer, which the Lord doth not worthwhile vntill he wint at the spots where with they are all besprinkled. I rehearse not these things to this end that the faithful should carelesly pardon themselves any thing, but that in sharpli chastifying themselves they should travel to overcome these stops, & although Saran labour to stop vp at the ways, that he may kepe them from praying, yet neuertheless they should break through, being certainly persuaded, that although they be not vnembred of all hinderances, yet their labours and prayers are allowed of him, so that they travaile & bend themselves thitherward, whither they do not by and by attaine.

17 But forasmuch as there is no man worthie to present himselfe to God, and so come into his sight: the heavenly Father himselfe to deliver vs both from shame & feare which should haue thrown downe all our courages, hath giuen to vs his sonne Iesus Christ our Lorde, to be an advocate & mediator with him for vs, by whose leading we may boldly come to him, trusting that we haue such an interceffor, nothing shall be denied vs which we aske in his name, as nothing can be denied him of the father. And hereunto must all bee referred whatsoever we haue heretofore taught concerning faith: because as the promise setteth out vnto vs Christ for our Mediator, vnlesse our hope of obteining stay vpon him, it taketh from it selfe the benefite of praying. For so soone as the terrible majestie of God commeth in our minde, it is impossible but that we should tremble for feare, and the acknowledging of our owne vnworthinesse should drive vs farre away, till Christ come meane betweene vs and him, which may change the throne of dread full glorie into the throne of grace: as also the Apostle teacheth that we may be bold to appeare with all confidence which shall obtaine mercy & find grace in help comming in his season. And as there is a law set that we should call vpon God, as there is a promise giuen, that they shall be heard which call vpon him: so are we peculiarly commanded to call vpon him in the name of Christ, & we have a promise forth, that we shall obtaine that which we shall aske in his name. Hitherto (faith he) yet haue not asked any thing.

thing in my name: ask & ye shall receive. In y day ye shall ask in my name, & whatsoever ye ask, I will do, that the father may be glorified in the sonne. Hereby it is plaine without controversie, that they which call upon God in any other name than of Christ, do stubbornly break his commandements, & regard his will as nothing, & that they have no promise to obtaine anything. For (as Paul faith) all the promises of God are in Christ, yea & Amen; that is to say, they are confirmed & fulfilled.

18 And the circumstance of the time is diligently to be marked, where Christ commandeth his disciples to flee to intercession to him after that he is gone vp into heauen. In that hour (faith he) ye shall ask in my name. It is certaine that even from the beginning none were heard that prayed, but by means of the mediator. For this reason the Lord had ordained in the lawe, that the Priest alone entering into the sancturie, should beare vppon his shoulders the names of the tribes of Israel, and as many precious stones before his breast: but the people shoulde stande a farre off in the porch, and from thence shoulde joyneth their prayers with the priest. Yea and the Sacrifice availed hereto, that the prayers should bee made sure & of force. Therefore that shadowish ceremonie of the lawe taught that wee are all shut out from the face of God, and that therefore wee neede a Mediator, which may appeare in our name, and may beare vppon his shoulders, and hold vs fast bound to his breast, that wee may be heard in his person: then ye by sprinkeling of blood our prayers are cleansed, which (as we haue alreadie faide) are never voide of filthinesse. And we see that the holy ones, when they desired to obtaine any thing, grounded their hope vppon sacrificies, because they knewe them to bee the stablishments of all requestes. Let him remember thy offering (saith David) and make thy burnt offering fatte. Herevpon is gathered ye God hath bin from the beginning appeased by the intercession of Christ, to recewe the prayers of the godlie. Why then doth Christ appoint a newe heirie, when his Disciples shall beginne to praiie in his name, but because this grace, as it is at this day more glorious, so deserve more commendation with vs. And in this same sense he had faide a little before. Hitherto ye ece have not asked any thing in my name, nowe ask. Not that they understande nothing at all of the office of the Mediator (whereas all the Jews were instructed in the principles) but because they had not yet clearly knowne that Christ by his ascended into heauen should be a surer patron of the Church than hee was before. Therefore to comfort their griefe of his absence with some speciall fruite, hee claimeth to him self the office of an advocate, and teacheth that they have hitherto wanted the chief benefite, which it shall bee granted them to enjoye, when being ayded by his mediation, they shall more freeli call vppon GOD: as the Apostle faith that his newe waie is dedicate in his blode. And so muche lesse excusable is our frowardnesse, vslesse we doe with both armes (as the saying is) embrace so inestimable a benefite, which is properly appoynted for vs.

19 Nowe whereas he is the onelie way, and the onelie entrie by which it is granted vs to come in vnto God: who to do swarue from this waie and forswake this entrie, for the there remaineth no waie nor entry to God: there is nothing left in his throne but wrath, judgement, and terrour. Finally sigh the Father hath marked him for our head, and guide, they which do in anie wife swarue or go away from him, do labour as much as in them lieth to race out and disfigure the mark which God hath imprinted. So Christ is set to be the onlie Mediator, by whose intercession the Father may be made to vs favourable and eallie to be entreated. Howbeit the meane time the holy ones haue their intercessions left to them, whereby they doe mutually commende the saftie one of an other to God, of which the Apostle maketh mention: but those be such as hang upon that onee intercession: for farre is it off, that they minish anie thing of it. For as they spring out of the affection of love, where with we embrace one another, as the members of one body: so they are also referred to the vnitiue of the head. Sith therefore they also are made in the name of Christ, what doe they else but testify that no man can be holpen by any prayers at all, but with the intercession of Christ? And as Christ with his intercession withstandeth not, but that in the Church we make with praieers be advocates one for another: so let this remaie certaine, that all the intercessors of the whole Church ought to be directed to that onlie one. Yea and for this caufe we ought specially to beware of vnthankfulness, because God pardoning our vnworthines, doth not only gue yeue to every one of vs to praie for himself, but also admitte vs to be entreaters one of another. For, where God appointeth advocates for his Church which deserve worthily to be rejected if they praie privately useful one for himselfe: what a pride were it to abuse this libertie to darken the honour of Christ?

20) Nowe it is a mere trifiing, which the Sophistres babble, that Christ is the Mediator of redemption, but the faithfull are Mediators of intercession. As though Christ having performed a Mediation for a time, hath giuen to his fervantes that eternall Mediatorshippe which shall never die. Full courteously forsooth they handle him, that cut awaie so little a portion of honour from him. But the Scripture faith farre otherwise, with the simplicitie wherof a godly man ought to be contented, leaving these deceivers. For where John faith, that if anie do sinne, we haue an advocate with the Father, Christ Iefus: doth he meane that he was once in old time a praine for vs, and not rather assigneth to him an everlastinge intercession? How faie we to this that Paul also affirmeth, that he sitteth at the right hand of God the father and maketh intercession for vs? And when in another place he calleth him the onlie Mediator of God and men: meaneth he not of praieers, of which he had a little before made mention? For when he had before faie that intercession must be made for all men: for profe of that saying, he by and by addeth, that of all men there is one God and one Mediator. And none otherwise doeth Augustine expound it, when he faith thus: Christian men doe mutually commend themselves in their praieers. But he for whom none maketh intercession, but he for all, he is the onlie and true Mediator. Paul the Apostle, though he were a principal member vnder the heade (yet because he was a member of the bodie of Christ, and knewe that the greatest and truest priest of the Church entred, not by a figure, into the inwarde places of the vail, to the holie of holie places, but by express and stedfast truth into the innermost places of heaven, to a holinesse not shadowy with eternally commended by himselfe also to the prayer of the faithfull. Neither doth he make himselfe a Mediator betweene the people and God, but praieth that all the members of the body of Christ should mutually prays for him: because the members are careful one for another: and if one member suffer, the other suffer with it. And that so the mutual prayers one for an other of all the members yet travailling in earth, may ascende to the head which is gone before into heaven, in whom is appeasement for our sinnes. For if Paul were a Mediator, the other Apostles should also be Mediators: and if there were many Mediators, then neither should Pauls owne reason stande fast, in which he had faide,

For there is one God, one Mediator of one GOD and mee, the man Christ, in whom we also are one if we keepe the vnitiue of faith in the bonde of peace. Againe in another place. But if thou secke for a Priest, he is aboue the heavens, where he maketh interceffion for thee, which in earth die for thee. Yet doe we not dreame that he falleth downe at the fathers knees and in humble wise entreath for vs: but we understand with the Apostle, that he saue appeareth before the face of GOD, that the vertue of his death availeth to be a perpetual interceffion for vs: yet so that being entred into the sanctuarie of heaven, vs to the end of the ages of the world he alone carrieth to God the prayers of the people abiding a farre off in the porch.

No Saint hath entrie unto God but by Christ: and therefore we can not without inatriue unto him, make them our intercessors.

21 As touching the Saintes, which being dead in the flesh doe live in Christ, if we give any prayer at all to them, let vs not dreame that they themselves have anie other way of asking, than Christ which onlie is the waie, or that their prayers be acceptable to God in anie other name. Therefore sift the Scripture calleth vs backe from al to Christ onlie: with the heavenly fathers wils to gather together all in him: it was a point of too much dulnesse, I will not say madnesse, to do desire to make for our selves an entrice by them, that we should be led away from him without whom even they themselves have no entrice open. But, that this hath beene usually done in certaine ages past, & that it is at this day done where soever Papistry reigneth, who can deny? Their merites are from time to time thrust in to obtenie the good will of God: and for the most part Christ being passed over, God is prayed to by their names. Is not this, I beseech you, to contrey awake to them the office of that onlie interceffion, which we have affirmed to belong to Christ alone? Againe, what Angell or Diuell euer recueile to any man anie one syllable of this their interceffion which these men faitne? For in the Scripture is nothing of it. What is the reason therefore of inventing it? Truelie when the witte of man secketh for it selfe succours, wherewith we are not certified by the word of God, it plainlie bewraieith his owne distrustfulness. If we appeale to all their confessions that are delighted with the interceffion of saints, we shall finde that the same commeth from no other ground, but because they are grieved with carefulnesse, as though Christ were in this behalfe either too weake or too rigorous. By which doulfulnesse first they dishonor Christ, and robbe him of the title of only Mediator, which as it is given him of the Father for a singular prerogative, so ought ought not also to be conveyed away to any other. And in this very doing they darken the glory of his birth, they make void his cross, finally whatsoever he hath done or suffered they spoil and defraud of the due praise thereof: for all tend to this end that he may be in deed and be accounted the only Mediator; And therewith they cast away the goodness of God, which gave himself to be their Father. For he is not their father, unless they acknowledge Christ to be their brother. Which they utterly deny unless they thinke that he beareth a brotherly affection toward them, than which there can nothing be more kind or tender. Wherefore the Scripture offereth only him to us, and saith vs to him, and saith vs in him. He (faith Ambrose) is our mouth, by which we speak to the Father: our eye, by which we see the Father: our right hand, by which we offer vs to the father, otherwise than by whose intercession neither we nor al the Saints haue any thing with anima. God. If they answer that the common prayers which they make in Churches, are ended with this conclusion adioyned, Through Christ our Lorde: this is a trilling shift: because the intercession of Christ is no lesse prophane when it is mingled with the prayers and merites of dead men, than if it were utterly omitted and only dead men were in our mouth. Againe, in all their Litanies, Hymnes, & Profes, where no honour is left vngiven to dead saints, there is no mention of Christ.

22 But their foolish dulness proceed the farre, that here we haue the nature of superstition expressed, which when it hath once shaken off the bride, is wont to make no end of running astray. For after that men once begun to looke to the intercession of Saints, by little and little there was giuen to every one his special doing, that according to the diuerse in businesse, sometime one & sometime another should be called upon to be intercessor: then they tooke to themselfes every one his peculiar Saint, into whose faith they committed themselfes as it were the keeping of safeguarding Gods. And not only (wherewith the Prophet in the old time reproched Israel) Gods were set vp according to the number of Cities, but euen to the number of persons. But first the Saints referre their desires to the onely will of God, & behold it, and rest upon it: he thinketh foolishly, and fleshly, yea and flaun-derously of them, which assigneth to them any other prayer, than whereby they pray for the comming of the kingdom of God: from which that is most farre distant which they faile to them, that every one is with private affec- tion more partially bent to his owne worshippers. At length, many abstracned not from horrible sacrifice, in calling nowe upon them not as helpers but as prinquant rulers of their saluation, Lo whereunto foolish men do fall when they wander out of their true standing, that is, the word of God. I speake not of the grosser monstrousnesses of vngodliness, wherein they are abominable to God, Angels, and men, they are not yet ashamed nor wearie of them. They falling downe before the image or picture of Barbara, Catherine, and such other, doe mumble Paternoster, Our father. This madness the Paffors doe so care to heal or restrain, that being allured with the sweete favour of gaine they allowe it with rejoyning at it. But al-though they turne from themselves the blame of so hainous an offence, yet by what couloure will they defende this that Ley or Medard are prayed vnto...

unto, to looke downe vpon and helpe their servants from heaven: that the holy Virgin is prayed unto, to command her sonne to doe that which they ask? In the olde time it was forbidden in the Counsell at Carthage, that at the altar no direct prayer should be made to Saints. And it is likely that when the holy men could not altogether suppress the force of the unquiet custome, yet they added at least this restraint that the publike prayers should not be corrupted with this forme: Saint Peter praye for vs. But how much further hath their dullest importunitie ranged, which stickne not to giue away to dead men that which properly belongeth onely to God and Christ?

23 But whereas they trauel to bringe to passe that such intercession may seeme to be grounded upon the authoritie of Scripture, wherein they labour in vaine. We read oftentimes (say they) of the prayers of Angels: and not that onely: but it is said that the prayers of the faithful are by their hands carried into the sight of God. But if they left to compare holy men departed out of this present life, to angels: they should prove that they are ministering spirits, to whom is committed the ministerie to looke to our safetie, to whom the charge is giuen to kepe vs in all our wayes, to go about vs, to admonish and counsell vs, to watch for vs: all which things are giuen to Angels, but not to them. How wrongfull they wrap vp dead holy men with Angels, appeareth largely by so many divers offices, whereby the scripture putteth difference betwene some and other some. No man dare execute the office of an advocate before an earthly judge, vnlesse he be admitted, from whence then haue wormses so great libertie, to thrust vnto God those for patrones to whom it is not read that the office is enioyed? For God will was to appoint the Angels to looke vnto our safetie, wherefore they doe both frequent holy assemblies, and the Church is a stage to them, wherein they wonder at the diuers and manifold wisdome of God, WHO SO conveys away to other that which is peculiar to them, verily they confound and pervert the order set by God, which ought to haue ben inviolable. With like hauersome expense they procede in allagae standing other testimonies. God said to Jeremia: If Mofes and Samuel should stand before me, my soule is not to this people. How (say they) could he haue spokien thus of dead men, vnlesse he knew that they made intercession for the living? But I on the contrarie side gather thus, that if this be true, thereby appeareth that neither Mofes nor Samuel made intercession for the people of Israel, there was then no intercession at all of dead me. For which of the Saints is to be thought to be careful for the safetie of the people, whe Mofes ceasthat, which in this behalfe farre passed all other when he liued. But if they follow such sleight subtleties, to say that the dead make intercession for the living, because the Lord said. If they should make intercession, I will much more colourable reason in this manner: In the extreme necessitie of the people Mofes made not intercession, of whom it is said, if he shall make intercession, therefore it is likely that none other may make intercession, sith they are also farre from the gentlenesse, goodnes, and fatherly carefullnesse of Mofes. This forsooth they get with caulling, that they be wounded with the same weapons, where with they thought themselves daily senfed. But it is very fonde that a simple sentence shoulde to bee wrested, because the
The grace of Christ.

24. They answere againe: that we then take from them al praiers of charity, which in the whole course of their life breathed nothing but charity & mercie? Verily as I will not curiously search what they doe, or what they must vsdo if it is not likely, that they are carried about hither & thither with divers & particular requests; but rather that they do with a staid and unmoved will, long for the kingdom of God, which standeth no lesse in the destruction of the wicked, than in the salvation of the godlie. If this be true, it is no doubt that their charity is contained in the communion of the body of Christ, & expressed no further, than the nature of that communion beareth. But now though I grant that they praiie in this manner for vs, yet they do not therefore depart from their owne quietnesse, to be diversly drawn into earthly cares: and much lesse must we therefore by and by call upon them. Neither doth it thereby followe, that they must doe, because men which live in earth may commend one another in their praiers. For this doing search for nourishing of charity among them, when they doe as it were parte and mutually take vp upon them their necessities among themselves. And this they doe by the commandement of the Lord, and are not without a promise, which two things, have alway the chiefe place in prayer. All such considerations are farre from the dead, whom when the Lord hath conveyed fro our companie, he hath left to vs no enterchange of doings with them, nor to them with vs, so farre as we may gather by conjonctures. But if any man allege, that it is impossible but that they must keepe the same charity toward vs, as they be joyned in one faith with vs; yet who hath recoued, that they have so long cares to reach to our voices? So bearing eyes to watch our necessities? They praiie in their shadowes I wot not what of by brightnesse of the couranence of God extending his beams vpon them, in which as in a mirror they may from on high behold the matters of men beneath. But to affirme that especially with such boldnesse as they dare, what is it else but to give about by the drunken dreames of our owne braine, without his word to perce & breake into the hidden judgements of God, & to tread the Scripture under fecte which doth pronouche that the wisedome of the flesh is enemie to the wisedome of God, which wholly condemneth the vanitie of our natural vit, which willeth all our reason to be thrown downe, and the only will of God to be looked ynto of vs.
Cap. 20. Of the manner how to receive

25 The other testimonies of Scripture which they bring to defend this their lie, they most naughtily write. But Jacob (saith they) praieth that his name and the name of his Fathers, Abraham & Isaac be called upon over his posterity. First let vs see what forme of calling upon this is among the Israelites. For they call not vp0 their Fathers, to help them. But, as it becometh God to remember his servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Therefore their example maketh nothing for them that speake to the Saints themselves. But because those blockes (such as their dullnes) neither understand what it is to call upon the name of Jacob, nor why it is to be called upon, it is no maruell if in the verie forme also they do childishly stumble. This manner of speach is not seldome found in the Scriptures. For Esai saith that the name of the men is called upon over the women, when they have them as their husbands vnnder whose charge & defence they live. Therefore the calling upon of the name of Abraham upon the Israelites, standeth in this when they convey their pedigree from him, & do with solemn memorable honor him for their author & parent. Neither doth Jacob this because he is careful with the enlarging of the renome of his name: but for as much as he knew that the whole blefsednesse of his posterity consisted in the inheritaunce of the covenant which God had made with him: he wisheth that which he feeth should be the chiefe of all good things to them, that they be accounted in his kinred: For, that is nothing els but to convey to them the succession of the covenant. They againe when they bring such remembrance into their prayers, do not flee to the intercessions of dead men: but do put the Lord in mind of his covenant, whereby the most kinde father hath promised, he will be fauorabke and beneficial to them for Abrahams, Isacks, and Jacobs sake. How little the holy ones did otherwise leane upon the merits of their fathers, the common saying of the Church in the Prophet testifieth, Thou art our Father, & Abraham knewe vs not, and Israels was ignorant of vs. Thou Lord art our Father & our redeemer. And when they say thus, they add therewithall, Returne O Lord for thy servants sake: yet thinking vpon no intercession, but bending their mind to the benefit of the covenant. But nowes fith we have the Lord Iefus, in whose hand the eternall covenant of mercie is not one lie made, but also confirmed to vs; whose name should we rather vfe in our prayers? And because these good matters will haue the Patriarches to be by these wordes made intercessors, I would faine knowe of them why in fo great a route Abraham the Father of the Church hath no place at all among them. Out of what fincke they fetch their advocates, it is not vnown. Let them answere me, how it is that Abraham, whom God preferred above all other, & who he aduanced to the highest degree of honor, should be neglected & suppressed. Verily when it was evident that such vfe was vnown to the old Church, they thought good for hiding of the newnesse to speak nothing of the olde Fathers: as though the diversitie of names excused the new and forged manner. But whereas some object that God is praised vnto, to haue mercy on the people for Davids sake, it doth so nothing at all wake for defence of their error, that it is a most strong prece for the confusion thereof. For if we consider what person Davids did beare: he is seuered from all the assembly of Saintes, that God should stablish the covenant which he hath made made in his hand. So both the covenant is rather considered than the man and under a figure the onely intercession of Christ is affirmed, For it is certaine that that which belonged only to David, in so much as he was the image of Christ, accordeth not with any other.

26 But this forsooth moueth some, that it is often times red that the prayers of Saintes have beene heard. Why so? Euen because they prayed.
They trusted in the(e faith the Prophet) & they were saved: they cried, and they were not confounded. Therefore let vs also pray as they did, & we may be hard as they were. But these men, otherwisethan they ought, do wrongfullie reason, that none shalbe heard but they that haue once beene heard.
How much better doth James say? Elias (faith he) was a man like to vs: and he prayed with prater that it should not rain, & it rained not upon the earth in three yeares & sixe moneths. A gaire he prayed, & the heauen gaue raine, & the earth gaue her fruict. What? doth he gather any singular prerogatiue of Elias, to which we ought to flee? No. But he teacheth what is the continual strengthe of godly & pure prater, to exhort vs likewise to pray. For wee do niggardlie construe the readines & gentlenesse of God in hearing them, vnto we be by such experiences confirmed into a more sure affiance of his promises, in which he promiseth that his care shalbe enclined not to one, or two, nor yet to a fewe, but to al ye call vpon his name. And so much leffe excusable is this foolishnes,because they see me as it were of set purpose to despise so many admonitions of Scripture. David was oft deliuered by the power of God.Was it he should draw power to himself, we should be deli-uered by his helpe? He himself affirmeth farre otherwise: The righteous look for me, till thou render to me. Againe, The righteous shall see, & they shall re-joyce, & trust in the Lord. Behold, this poore man hath cried to God, and he hath answered him: There be in the Psalmes many such praiers, in which to cause that which he requirith, he moueth god by this maner, that the righteous be not made ashamed, but manie by his example be raised vp to hope.
Let vs now be contented with this one example: Therefore every hole one shall pray to the in fit time. Which place I haue so much the more willingly rehearsed, because the lewd babblers which do let out to hire the service of their warded tongue have not beene ashamed to allege it to proove the intercession of the dead. As though David meant in some thing else, than to shewe the fruit that shall come of the mericffulness and gentles of God, when he shall be heard. And in this kinde we must learne, that the experience of the grace of God, as well towards our selues as other, is no slender helpe to confirme the credite of his promises. I haue unrehearsed many places, where David setteth before himselfe the benefits of God for matter of confidence, because the readers of the Psalms shal commonly find them without seeking. This selfe same thing had Iacob before taught by his owne example: I am vnworthie of all thy mercies, and of the truth which thou haist perfourned to thy servaunt. I with my staffe haue passed over this Jordane, & now I come forth with two bandes. Hee allegeth in deed the promise, but not alone: but he also joyneth the effect, that he may the more courugiouslie in time to come truist that God will be the same toward him. For he is not like to mortall men, which are wearable of their liberalitie, or whose abilitie
Cap. 20. Of the manner how to receive

The directing of prayers unto Saints departed is the offering of intercession unto God, & of discourse unto Christ's intercession, which by the mutual prayers of Saints as yet living, is not prevented.

Psal. 44. 21

Iam. 5. 8.

The kinds of prayer.

abilistic is wasted: but he is to be weighed by his own nature, as David wisely doth, where he saith, Thou hast redeemed me, O God that speakest truth. After that he hath given to God the praises of his salvation, he addeth, ye he is a true speaker: because vnlesse he were continuallie like him selfe, there could not be gathered of his benefits a sufficiently strong reasone of affiance and calling upon him. But when we know that so oft as he helpeth vs, he showeth an example and prooves of his goodness, we neede not to fear that our hope shall be put to shame or disapoint vs,

27. Let this be the summe, Whereas the scripture setteth out this ynterly for the cheefe point in the worship of God (as resting all sacrifices, he requireth of vs this dutie of godlines) prayer is not without manifest sacrifice directed to other. Wherefore albeit it is faide in the Psalm, If we stretch forth our hands to a strange God, shall not God require these thinges? Again, whereas God will not bee called upon, but of Fayth and expressly commandeth prayers to be framed according to the rule of his word; finally whereas, as Faith founded vpon the word, is the mother of right prayer, so soon as we swerve from the word, our prayer must needs be corrupted, but it is already swept, if the whole scripture be sought, this honor is thrown out of God only. As touching the office of intercession, we have alfo shewed, it is peculiar to Christ, and there is no prayer acceptable to God, but which mediator halloweth. And though the faithful do one for another offer prayers to God for their brethren, We have shewed that this abateth nothing fro the only intercession of Christ, because they altogether,anding vpon it do commend both themselves and other to God. Moreover we have taught, this is vnholy drawn to dead men, to whom we never read, it hath bin commanded that they should pray for vs. The scripture doth oftentimes exhorte vs to mutual doings of this dutie one for another; but of dead men there is not so much as one syllable: yea and James joyning these two things together, that we should confess our felowes in our felowes, and mutually pray, one for another, doth secretly exclude dead men. Therefore to condemn this error, this one reason sufficeth, that the beginning of praying rightly, springeth out of faith, and that Faith commeth of the hearing of the word of God, where is no mention of the tained intercession, because superstition hath rashly gotten to it. Like patrons which were not given the of God. For whereas the Scripture is full of many forms of prayer, there is no example found of this patronship, without which in the papacy they believe, there is no prayer. Moreover it is certaine that this superstition hath grown of distrustfulness either because they were not content with Christ to be their intercessor, or have altogether robbed him of his praise. And this latter point is easilly proued by their namelesenes: because they have no other stronger argument to proue that we have need of the intercession of Saints, than when they obiect that we are unworthy of familiar accessse to God. Which we in deed do grant to be most true: but then upon we gather, that they leave nothing to Christ, which esteemeth his intercession nothing worth, vnlesse there be adioyned George, Hypolite, or such other visors.

libly comprehended both under one name. For these special forces, which Paul teacheth, fall under the first part of this division. With asking & craving we purpose forth our desires before God, requiring as well those things that we seem to spread abroad his glory and set forth his name, as the benefits which are profitable to our life. With giving of thanks, we do with due praise magnify his good doings toward us, acknowledging to be received of his liberalitie whatsoever good things do come to us. Therefore David comprehended these two parts together, saying: Call upon me in the day of necessity, I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me. The Scripture not in vain commandeth us to give both. For we have said in another place, your nedises is to great, and the experience it self crieth out, ye are on every side pinched and pressed with so many and so great distresses, ye all have cause enough why they should both sigh to God, and in humble wise call upon him. For though they be free from adversities, ye the guiltines of their wicked doings, & their innumerable assaults of temptation ought to pricke forward the most holy to aske remedie. But in the sacrifice of praise & thanksgiving there can be no interruption without hainous sinne, forasmuch as God calleth not to heape upon divers men divers benefites to drive vs though we be slack and slowe, to thankfulness. Finally so great and so plenteous largeesse of his benefits doeth in a manner overwhelme vs: there are so many and so great miracles of his seene on euery side which way spouer thou turne thee, ye we neverswan ground and matter of praise & thanksgiving. And, that these things may be somewhat plameliere declared: see all our hopes and wealth stand in God (which we have before sufficiently proved) ye neither we nor all our things can be in prosperitie but by his blessing: we must continually commit our selues and all our things to him. Then, whatsoever we purpose, speake, or do, let vs purpose, speake, & do under his hand & will, finally under the hope of his help. For all are pronounced accursed of God, which devise or determine any purposes upon trust of themselves, or of any other, which without his will, & without calling upon him do enterprize or attempt to begin any thing. And whereas we have divers times alreadie said, that he is dulye honoured when he is acknowledged the author of all good thinges: therupon followeth that all those thinges are so to be receuued at his hands, that we yeld continually thanks for them: & that there is no other right way for vs to vs his benefites, which flow & proceed from his liberalitie to no other end, but ye we should be continually busied in confessing his praise & giving of thanks. For Paul, when he testifieth that they are sanctified by the word & prayer, doth therevtherall signifie that they are not holy & cleane to vs without ye word & prayer, understanding by ye word, faith by figure. Therefore David faith verie well, when hauing received his liberalitie of the Lord, he declareth that there is gien him into his mouth a new song, whereby, verily he signifieth that it is a malicious silence, if we passe over any of his benefites without praise: so he also giveth vs matter to say good of him, as he doth good to vs. As also Ezechiel setting out the sicular grace of God, exhorteth the faithfull to a newe & unwonted song. In which sense David faith in another place, Lord open thou my hoppes, and my mouth shall shewe forth thy praise. Likewise Ezechiel and Iohns testifie that this shalle to them the end of their
of their deliverance, to celebrate the goodness of God with songs in the temple. This same lawe David prescribeth to all the godly. What shall I repay to the Lord (faith he) for all the things that he hath bestowed upon me? I will take the cup of salutations, and will call upon the name of the Lord. And the same lawe the Church followeth in another Psalm, sacue vs our God, that we may confess to thy name and glory in thy praise. Again, he hath looked vnto the prayer of the solitarie, and he hath not despised their prayers. This shalbe written to the generation that shall followe, and the people. This take the fame we vnto in final praise the Lord, that they may declare his name in him and his praise in Hierusalem. Ye so oft as the faithful befeech God to doe for his names sake: as they profess themselves unworthy to obtaine any thing in their owne name, so thy bind them selves to give thanks, and they promise that this shalbe to them the right way of the bountifullnes of God that they shalbe publishers of it. So see speaking of the redemption to come of the Church, take away iniquitie O God, and lift vp good: and we will pay the values of lippes. And the benefits of God do not only claime to themselves the praise of the tongue, but also do naturally procure loue. I haue loued (faith David) because the Lord hath heard the voyce of my prayer. Again, in an other place, hearing the helpes which he had felt, he saith: I will loue thee O God, my strength, Neither shall the prayers ever please God, which shall not flow out of this sweetness of loue. Yea and also we must holde fast this sayeing of Paul, that all prayers are wrongfull and faulcie to which is not adioyned gluing of thanks. For thus he saith, in all prayer and befeecching with thanksgiving let your petitions, be known with God. For fith tediouesnes, patience, bitternes of griefe, and fear do moue many in praying to murmure, he commandeth that our affections be so tempered, that the faithful ere they have obtained that which they desire, should nevertheless cheerfully bleffe God. If this knot ought to haue place in things in a maner contrarie, with so much more holy and doeth God bind vs to sing his praises, so oft as he maketh vs to enjoy our requestes. But as wee haue taught that our prayers are hallowed by the intercession of Christ, which otherwise should be unclean: so the Apostle, where he commandeth vs to offer a sacrifice of praise by Christ, putteth in mind we haue not a mouth clean enough to praise the name of God, vnlesse the priesthood of Christ become the meane. Whereupon we gather that men haue beene monstruously bewitched in the papacie, where the greater part marueileth why Christ is called an advocate. This is why Paul commandeth both to pray and to give thanks without ceasing: namely for that he willeth that with so great continuing as may be, at euery time in euery place, in all matters and busineses, the prayers of al men should be lifted vp to God, which may both looke for all things at his hand & yeild to him the praise of all things, as he offereth vs continuall matter to praise and pray.

29 But this continuall diligence of praying, although it specially concerneth the proper and private prayers of every man, yet somewhat also pertaineth to the publike prayers of the Church. But thoie can neither be continuall, nor ought otherwise to be done than according to the politike order why shall by common consent be agreed upon among all. I grant the same in deede, For therefore certaine houres are set & appointed, as indifferent with God, so necessary for the vises of men, that the commoditie of all men may be provided for, & all things (according to the saying of Paul) may be col-ly and orderly done in the Church. But this makest nothing to the contra-rie but that everie Church ought both from time to time to stirre vp it selfe to often vis of prayers, & when it is admonished by any greater necessity, to be seruent with more earnest endeauour. As for perserverance which hath a great affinity with continuall diligence, there shall be a sitte place to spea-it about the end. Nowe these make nothing for the much babling which Christe willed that we should be forbidden. For he forbiddeth not to continue long, nor oft, nor with much affection in prayers, but that we shoule not trust that we may wring anie thing out of God, by dulling his eares with much babling tale, as if he were to be perswaded after the manner of men.

For we know that Hypocrites, because they do not consider that they have to doe with God, doe not: he make a pompous shewe in their prayersthan in a triumph. For, the Pharisee which thanked God that he was not like to other men, without doubt rejoiced at himselfe in the eyes of men, as if hee would by prayer seek to get a name of holiness. Hereupon came that much babling, which at this day upon a like cause is vised in the papacies, while some do vainlie spend the time in repeating the same prayers, & other some doe set out themselves among the people with a long heape of words. Sith this babling childishlie mocketh God, it is no marvel that it is forbidden out of the Church, to the end that nothing shoule there be vised but earnest and proceeding from the bottome of the heart. Of a neere kind and like: to this corruption is there another, which Christ condemneth with this, namely that hypocrites for boasting fake doo seek to have manie witnesses, and do rather occupie the market place to pray in, than their praier should we want the praife of the worlde. But whereas we haue already shewed that this is the marke that prayer shooteth at, that our mindes may be carried vpward to God, both to confession of praiers and to craving of help: thereby we may understand that the cheefe duties thereof do stande in the minde and the heart, or rather that praiser it self is properly an affection of the inward hart, which is powred forth & laid open before God the searcher of harts. Wherefore (as it is alreadie said:) the heavenly schoolmaster, when he minded to set out the best rule of praying, commanded vs to go into our chamber, and there the doore being shut to pray to our father which is in secret, that our Father which is in secret may heare vs. For when he hath drawn us away from the example of hypocrites, which with ambitious boasting them of praieres sought the favor of men, he then withal addeth what is better, name-he to enter into our chamber, and there to pray the doore being shutte. In which words (as I expound them) he willed vs to seeke solitary being, which may help vs to defend and to enter throughly with our whole thought into our heart, promising to the affections of our heart that God shall be nere vs whose temples our bodies ought to be. For he meant not to deny but that it is expedient also to pray in other places: but he saith that praier is a certain secret thing, which both is cheerfully placed in the soule, & requi-seth the quiet thereof far from all troubles of cares. Not without cause therfore the Lorde himselfe also, when he was disposed to apply him selfe more earnestly to prayer conueyed himselfe into some solitarie place far from the troublous company of men: but to teach vs by his example that these helps are not to be despised, by which our mind being too slippery of it selfe is more bent to earnest applying of prayer. But in the mean time even as he in the midst of the multitude of men, abstained not from praying, if occasion at any time so required, so should we in all places where need shall be, lift vp pure hands. Finallie, thus it is to be holden, that who soever refuseth to pray in the holy assembly of the godly, he knoweth not what it is to pray apart, or in solitarines, or at home. Again, that he that neglecteth to pray alone or privately how diligently focuer he haue publike assemblies, doth ther make but vain prayers: because he giveth more to the opinion of men than to the secret judgment of God. In the mean time, that the common prayers of the Church should not grow into contempt, God in olde time garnished them with glorious titles, specially where he called the temple the house of prayer. For, by this laying he both taught that the chief part of the worshipping of him is the duty of prayer: and that to the end that the faithfull should with one consent exercise themselves in it, the temple was set vp as a standard for the.

There was also added a notable promise: There abideth for thee, O God, prayer in Sion: and to thee the vowe shall be paid. By which words the Prophet calleth vs, that the prayers of the Church are never void: because the Lord alway mine the people matter to sing vp with joy. But although the shadowes of the lawe are ceased: yet because the Lorde will was by this ceremonie to nourish among vs also the vnity of faith, it is no doubt that the same promise belongeth to vs, which both Christ hath stablished with his owne mouth, and Paul teacheth that it is of force for euer.

Now as the Lord by his word commandeth the faithfull to vs common prayers: so there must be common temples appointed for the vsing of the: where who so refuse to communicte their prayer with the people of God, there is no cause why they should abuse this pretence, that they enter into their chamber that they may obey the commandement of the Lord. For he that promiteth that he will do what soever two or three shall ask being gathered together in his name, telseth that he despiseth not prayers openly made: so that boasting and seeking of glory of men be absent, so that vnainted and true affection be present which dwelleth in the secret of the heart. If this be the right vs of temples (as truely it is) we must again beware that neither (as they have begun in certain ages past to be accounted) we take them for the proper dwelling places of God from whence he may more nerelie bend his care vs: nor faine to them I wote not what secrete holinesse, which may make our prayer more holy before God. For fith we our selves be the true temples of God we must pray in our selves if we will call vp God in his owne holie temple. As for that grossenesse, let vs whiche have a commandement to call vp the Lorde in Spirit and truth without difference of place, leaque it to the Iewes or the Gentiles. There was in deede a Temple in old time by the commandement of God for offering of prayers and sacrifices: but vs was at such time as the truth lay hid figured vnder such shadowes, which being now liuely expressed vs doth not suffer vs to sticke in any material temple. Neither was the temple given to the Jews themselves with this condition, that they should inclose the presence of God, within the walls thereof, but whereby they might be exercised to beholde the image of the true temple. Therefore they, which in any part thought that God dwelleth in temples made with handes, were sharply rebuked of Esay and Stephen.

31 Here moreover it is more than evident, that neither voice nor song, if they be vset in prayer, have any force, or do any whit profit before God, vnlesse they proceede from the deepe affection of the heart. But rather they provoke his wrath against vs, if they come onely from the lippes and out of the throat: forasmuch as that is to abuse his holy name, and to make a moccerie of his majestie: as we gather out of the wordes of Esay, which although they extende further, yet pertainne also to reprove this fault. This people (faith he) commeth neere to me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lippes: but their heart is farre from me: and they have feared me with the commandement and doctrine of men. Therefore beholde I will make in this people a miracle great and to be wondered at. For wise men shall perish from their wise men, and the prudence of the Elders shall vanish away. Ncyther yet doe we here condemne voice or singing, but rather do highly commend them, so that they accompany the affection of the minde. For so they exercise the minde and holde it intentiue in thinking upon God, which as it is slipperie and rolling, easlie slacketh and is diversely drawn vnlesse it be stayed with diverse helps. Moreover whereas the glory of God ought after a certaine manner to shine in all the partes of our bodie, it specially behoueth that the tongue be applied and auowed to this service both in singing and speaking which is properly created to shewe forth and display the praise of God: But the cheefe vse of the tongue is in publique prayers, which are made in the assembly of the godly: which tende to this ende, that we may al with one common voyce, and as it were with one mouth together glorifie God whom we worshippe with one spirit and one faith: and that openly, that all men mutually, euerie one of his brother, may receive the confession of Faith, to the example whereof they may bee both allured and stirred.

32 As for the vse of singing in Churches (that I may touch this also by the way:) it is certaine that it is not only most sainten: but that it was also in vse among the Apostles, wee may gather by these words of Paul I will sing in Spiriue, I will sing also in minde. Againe to the Colossians, Teaching and admonishing you mutually in hymnes, Psalmes, and spirituall songs, singing with grace in your heartes to the Lorde. For in the first place he teacheth that we should sing with voyce and heart: in the other he commendeth spirituall songs, wherewith the godly doe mutually edifie themselves. Yet that it was not vniuerseall, Augustine testifieth, which reporteth that in the time of Ambrose the Church of Milan first began to sing, when Insina the mother of Valentinian cruellly raged against the true faith, the people more vset watchings than they were wont: and that afterward the other westerne Churches followed. For he had a little before sayde that this manner came from the Eastern Churches. He tellleth also in his secunde cond booke of Retractions that it was in his time receiued in Africa. One Hilarie (faith he) a ruler did in cenie place whereof he could, with malicious blaming raile at the manner which then began to be at Carthage, that the hymnes at the altar should be pronounced out of the booke of Pialmes, either before the oblation, or when that had been offered was distributed to the people. Hie I answered at the commandement of my brethren, And truly if song be tempered to that grauitie which becometh the presence of God and Angels, it both procureth dignitie and grace to the holy actions, and much auaileth to stirre vp the minde to true affection and ferventnes of praying. But we must diligently beware that our cares be not more heedfully bent to the note, than our minde to the spiritual sense of the wordes. With which perill Augustine in a certaine place faith that he was so moved, that he sometime wifhed that the manner which Athanasius kept should be establisshed, which commanded that the reader should found his wordes with so small a bowing of his voce, that it should be licker to one y readeth than to one that singeth. But when he remembered howe much profite he himself had receiued by singing, he inclined to the other side. Therefore vsing this moderation, there is no doubt that it is a most holy and profitable ordinance. As on the other side what songes so euer are framed oney to sweetenesse and delight of the cares, they both become not the majestie of the Church, and cannot but highly despleaue God.

Publique prayer in what tongh and what geue to be made.

Whereby it also plainly appeareth that common prayers are to bee spoken not in Grecke among Latine men, nor in Latinne among Frenchmen or Englishmen (as it hath heretofore beeene eche where commonly done) but in e peoples mother tongue, which commonly may be vnderstood of the whole assemblie; forasmuch as it ought to be done to the edifying of the whole Church, which receiues no fruite at all of a found not vnderstood. But they which haue no regarde neither of charitie nor of humanitie, shoulde at least haue beeene somewhat moued with the authoritie of Paul, whose words are nothing doubtfull. If thou bless (faith he) in spirit, how shall he that fylleth the place of an vnlearned man answere Amen to thy blessing, fith he knoweth not what thou sayst? For thou in deede giuesst thankes, but the other is not edified. Who therefore can sufficiently wonder at the unbridled licentiousnes of the Papists, which, the Apostle so openly crying out against it, feare not to roare out in a straung tongh most babbling prayers, in which they themselves sometime vnderstande not one syllable, nor would haue otherfolkes to vnderstand it? But Paul teacheth that we ought to do otherwise. How then? I will pray (faith he) with spirit, I will pray also with mind: I will sing with spirit: I will sing also with mind: signifying by the name of spirit, the singular gift of tongues, which many beeing endued with, abused it, when they feuered it from the mind, that is, from vnderstanding. But this we must altogether thinke, that it is by no meane possible, neither in publike nor in private prayer, but that the tongue without the heart must highly delights God. Moreover we must thinke that the mind ought to be kindled with ferventies of thought, that it may far surmount all that the tongue may express with vterance. Finally that the tongue is not necessarie at all for private prayer, but so farre as the inward feeling either is not able to suftice

As which ons. For thus, the cause befell. Hereupon came the muttering of Hann, & such a like thing at the holy ones alwayse fcel in themselves, when they burst out into broken & vnperfect voices. As for the gestures of the bodie which are wont to be fвед in prayer (as kneeling &vcouerying of the head) they are exercises by which we endeavour to rise up to a greater reuercencing of God.

34 Nowe wee must learn, not only a more certaine rule, but also the verie forme of praying; namely the same, which the heavenly father hath taught vs by his beloved fonne: wherein wee may acknowledge his unmeasurable goodnesse & kindnesse. For beside this he warnceth and exhorteth vs to seek him in al our necessities (as children are wont to fte to their fathers defence, & as they be troubled with any distrefse) because hee saue if he did not sufficiently perceive this, howe slender our pouertie was, what were meete to be asked, and what were for our profite: hee provided also for this our ignoiane, and what our capacite wanted, he supplied & furnished of his owne. For he hath prescribed to vs a forme wherein he hath as in a Table set out whatsoever we may desire of him, whatsoever vaileth for our profite, and whatsoever is necessarie to ask. Of which his gentlenesse we receiue a great fruite of comfort that we understande that we ask no inconvenient thing, no vnfeeming or vnfit thing, finally nothing that is not acceptable to him, fith we ask in a manner after his owne mouth. When Plato saw the follie of men in making requests to God, which being graunted, it many times befell much to their owne hurt. He pronouncd that this is the best maner of praying taken out of the olde Poete, King Iuppiter giue vnto vs the best things both when we ask them, and when we doe not ask them, but commannde euill things to be away from vs eu en when we ask them. And verily the heathen man is wise in this, that he judgeth howe perilous it is to ask of the Lord that which our owne desire moueth vs; and there withall he bewrayeth our vnhappy case, that we cannot once open our mouthes before God without danger, vnfeeing the spirite do infruct vs to a right rule of praying. And in so much greater estimation this privilege is worthie to bee had of vs, Sith the onely begotten fonne of God ministreth wordes into our mouth which may deliver our mind from all doubting.

31 This whether you call it forme or rule of praying is made of five petiti ons. For, the cause why I agree not to them that diuide it into feuen partes, is this, that by putting in this aduersative word (But) it seemeth that the Engilisht meant to joyn these two pecces together, as if he had said: Suffer vs not to be oppressed with tentation, but rather helpe our weaknesses & deliver vs, that we faint not. The old writers also think on this side, to that note that which is in Mathew added in the feventh place, is by way of declaration to be joyned to the first petition. But although the whole prayer is such that in every part of it regard is specially to be had of the glorie of God, yet the three first petitions are pereculiarly appointed to Gods glory, which alone we ought ought in them to looke vnto without any respect (as they say) of our owne profite. The other three haue care of vs, and are properly alligned to ask those things that are for our profite. And when we pray that the name of god be hallowed: because God will proue whether hee be loued and honoured of vs freely or for hope of rewarde, we must then thinke nothing of our own commoditie, but his glorie must be set before vs, which alone wee must be holde with fixed eyes: and no otherwise ought wee to bee minded in the other prayers of this sort. And euem this turneth to our great profite, that when it is sanctified as wee praye, it is also likewise made our sanctification. But our eyes (as it is saide) must winke and after a certaine manner bee blinde at such profite, so as they may not once looke at it: that if all hope of our private benefit were cut off, yet wee shoulde not cease to wish and pray for this sanctification and other things which pertaine to the glorie of God. As it is seene in the examples of Moses and Paul, to whome it was not greeuous to turne away their mindes and eyes from themselfes, & with vehement and inflamed zeale to wish their owne destruction, that though it were with their owne losse they might avaunce the glorie & kingdom of God. On the other side when wee praye that our daily brede bee giuen vs: although wee wishe that for our owne commoditie, yet here also wee ought cheefely to secke the glorie of God, so that wee should not aske it vnlesse it might turne to his glorie. Nowe let vs come to the declaring of the payer it selfe.

Our Father which art in heaven.

36 First in the verie entrie wee meete with this which wee saide before that all prayer ought none otherwise to be offered of vs to God than in the name of Christ, as it can by no other name be made acceptable vnto him. For since wee call him father, truely wee allege for vs the name of Christ. For by what boldnesse might any man call God, Father? who shoulde burst forth into so great rashnesse, to take to himselfe the honour of the Sonne of God, vnlesse we were adopted the children of grace in Christ? Which being the true Sonne, is giuen of him to vs to be our brother: that that which he hath proper by nature, may by the benefite of adoption be made ours, if we doe with sure faith embrace so great bountifulnesse. As John saith, that power is giuen to them which beleue in his name of the only begotten Sonne of God, that they also may be made the children of God. Therefore hee both calleth himselfe our Father, and will be so called of us, by this sweetenesse of name deliveringe vs from all distrust, sith there can no where hee founde any greater affection of love than in a father. Therefore hee could by no furer example testifie his vnmeasurable deare loue towarde vs than by this that wee are named the sones of God. But his loue is so much greater & more excellent towardes vs than all loue of our parents, as hee paffeth all men in goodnesse and merchie: that if all the fathers that are in the earth, hauing shaken off all feeling of fatherly naturalnesse, woulde forfake their children, yet hee will never faile vs, because hee cannot denie himselfe. For wee haue his promise, if you being euill can giue good giftes to your children, how

How much more can your Father which is in heaven? Again, in the Prophet, 'Can a mother forget her children? Though she forget them, yet I will not forget thee. If we be his child, then as a child cannot give himself into the tuition of a stranger & forien man, unless he complained of the cruelty or poverty of his father: so we cannot seek succours from els where than from him alone, unless we reproach him with poverty and want of ability, or with cruelty or too extreme rigorousness.

37 Neither let us alledge that we are worthy made fearful with conscience of sinnes, which may make a Father be he never so merciful & kind, daily to be displeased. For if among men the fonne can with no better advocate please his cause to his Father, and by no better means get & recover his favour being lost, than if he himself humbly and lowly, acknowledging his fault, do beseech his fathers merchie (for then the fatherly bowels can not hide these enemies but must be moved at such prayers) what shall that father of mercies do, if the God of all comfort, that he rather heare the teares and groninges of his children intreating for themselves (specially in such doth call and exhort vs to doe so) than anie other intercessions whatsoever they be to the succour whereof they doe so fearfully flee, not without some sheue of despair, because they distrust of the kindnes and mercifulnesse of their father? This overflowing plentie of fatherlie kindnes he depainteth & seth out unto vs in the parable, where the Father louingly embraceth the fonne that had estranged himselfe from him, that had riotously wafted his substance, that had every waie grievously offended against him; and he tareth not till he do with words craue pardon, but he himselfe preuenteth him, knoweth him a farre off returing of his own will goeth to intreat him, comforteth him and receueth him into favour. For, setting out in a man this example of so great gentlenes, he minded to teach vs how much more plentifull kindnes we ought to looke for at his hande, who is not only a Father, but also the best and most mercifull of all Fathers, howsoever we be vnkind, rebellious and naughty children: so that yet we cast our selues vpon his merchie. And that he might make it to be more assuredly beleeued, that he is such a Father to vs, if we be Christians: he willed not onlie to be called Father, but also by express name Our Father: as if we might thus take with him, O Father which hast so great naturall kindnesse toward thy children, so great easinesse to pardon, wee thy children call to thee and praire to thee, being assured and fully persuaded, that thou bearest no other affection to vs than fatherly, howsoever we be vnworthie of such a Father. But because the small capacities of our heart conceiue not so great vnmeasurablenesse of favour, not onlie Christ is to vs a pledge and earnest of our adoption, but also he giueth vs the Spirit for witness of the same adoption, through whom we maie with a free and lowd voice crie, Abba, Father. So oft therefore as anie delay shall withstand vs, let vs remember to aske of him, that correcting our fearfulnesse he will set before vs that Spirit of couragiousnes to be our guide to praire boldlie.

38 Whereas we are not so taught that every one should seuerally call him his owne father, but rather that we should al in common together call him Our Father: thereby we are put in minde, how great affection of brotherly

When we call God our Father, the holy fellowship which love ought to be among vs, which are altogether by one same right of mercy and liberality, the children of such a Father. For we all have one common Father, from whom commeth whatsoever good thing may beide unto vs; there ought to be nothing severall among vs, which wee are not readie with great cheerfulness of minde to communicate one to another, so much as neede requireth. Nowe if we be so desirous, as we ought to be, to reach our hand and help one to another, there is nothing wherein we may more profit our brethren, than to commend them to the care and providence of the most good father, who being well pleased and favoring, nothing at all can be wanted. And verily even this same we owe to our Father. For as he that truly & heartly loveth any Father of household, doth also embrace his whole household, with love and good will; likewise what love and affection we bear to this heavenlie Father, we must shew toward his people, his household & his inheritance, which he hath so honored, that he hath called it the fulness of his onelie begotten Sonne. Let a Christian man therefore frame his prayers by this rule, that they be common, and maie comprehend all them that be brethren in Christ with him: and not onelie thole whom he presently feeth and knoweth to be such, but all men that live upon earth: of whom, what God hath determined, it is out of our knowledge: sauing that it is not leff godly than naturall to with the best to them, & hope the best of them. Howbeit we ought with a certain singular affection to bare a special inclination to the of the household of faith, whom the Apostle hath in every thing peculiarly commended unto vs. In a summe, All our prayers ought to be made, that they have respect to that community which our Lord hath established in his kingdom and his house.

Yet this withstanding not, but that we maie specially praise both for our selves and for certaine other: to that yet our minde depart not from having ancie to this communite, not once swane from it, but apply all things unto it. For though they be singularly spoken in forme, yet cause they are directed to that same, they cease not to be common. All this maie be easily understood by a like example. The word is general, to relieue the neede of al poor: and yet they obey this commandement which to this end doe help their poveryr whom they know or see to be in neede, although they passe over many who they see to be pressd with no lesse necessitie: either because they can not knowe all, or be not able to help al. After this maner they also do not against the will of God, which having regard unto & thinking upon this common fellowship of the Church, do make such particular prayers, by which they do with a common mind in particular words, commend to God himselfes or other, whose necessitie God willed to bee more nerely known to them. Howbeit all things are not like in praiere & in bestowing of goods. For, the liberality of giving cannot be vfed but toward them whole neede we have perceived, but with prayers we may help eueryth that are most strange & most vnknowe to vs, by how great a space of ground soever they be distant from vs. This is done by the general forme of prayer, wherein all the children of God are contained, among whom they also are. Here to we may apply which Paul exhorteth the faithful of this time, they lifte vp every where pure hands without strife: because whiche warneth the y strife strive shutteth the gate against prayers, he willeth them with one minde to lay their petitions in common together.

40 It is added, that he is in heaven. Whereupon it is not by and by to be gathered that he is bound fast inclosed & compassed with the circle of heaven, as within certaine barres. For Salomon also confesseth that the heavens of heaven cannot containe him. And he himselfe faith by the Prophet that heaven is his feate, and the earth his footstoole. Whereby verily he signifieth that he is not limited in any certaine coast, but is spread abroad through out all things. But because our minde (such is the grossenesse of it) could not otherwise conceiue his vnspakeable glory, it is signified to vs by the heaven, than which there can nothing come vnder our sight more ample or fuller of maieftie. Sith therefore wheresoeuer our senses comprehend any thing, there they vse to fasten it: God is set out of all place, that when we wil seeke him we should be raised vp above all senses both of body & soule againe by this maner of speaking he is lifted vp above all chaunce of corruption & change: finally it is signified that hee comprehendeth and containeth the whole worlde & governeth it with his power. Wherefore this is all one as if he had ben called of infinite greatnes or height, of incomprehensible subftance, of vnmeasurable power, of everlastinge immortalitie. But while we haue this, we must lift vp our mind higher when God is spoken of, that we dreame not any earthly or fleshly thing of him, that we measure him not by our small proportions, nor draw his wil to the rule of our affections. And the withal is to be raised vp our affiance in him, by whose prudence & power we understand heaven & earth to be governned. Let this be the summe, that under the name of Father is set before vs that God which hath in his owne image appeared to vs, he may be called vp with assured faith: & that the familiar name of Father is not only applied to stablish affiance, but also availeth to holde fast our minde: the be not drawn to doubtful or fained Gods, but should from the only be gotten some clime vp to the only father of Angels & of the Church: then, that because his feate is placed in heaven, wee are by the gouvernance of the world put in mind that not without cause wee come to him which with present care commeth of his own wil to meete vs. Who come to God ( faith & Apostile) they must first beleue that there is a God then he is a rewarder to all them that seek him. Both these things Christ affirneth to be proper to his father, our faith may be staid in him: then, that we may be certainly persuaded that hee is not carelessse of his safetie: because he vouchsafeith even to vs to extend his prudence. With which introductions Paul prepar eth vs to pray rightly. For before that he biddeth our petitions to be opened before God he faith thus. Be ye carefull for nothing the Lord is at hand. Whereby appeareth that they doubtfully & with perplexitie tosse their prayers in their mind which haue not this well settled in them, that the eye of God is vpon the righteous.

41 The first petition is, That the name of God be hallowed, the neede whereof is joined with our great shame. For what is more shamefull than that the glory of God should be partly by our unthankfulness, partly by our maliciousnes darkned, and (so much as in it lieth) by our boldnesse and furious stubbornesse, utterly blotted out? Though all the wicked would burst them-themselves with their wilfullnesse full of sacriledge, yet the holinesse of the name of God gloriously shineth. And not without cause the Prophets crieth out, As thy name O God, so is thy praise into all the ends of the earth. For whereoeuer the name of God is knowe, it cannot be but that his strengths, power, goodness, wisdom, righteousnes, mercie, & trueth must have for themselues, which may draw vs into admiration of him, and stirre vs vp to publish his praise. Sith therefore the holinesse of God is so shamefully taken from him in earth, if we be not able to refuse it, we be at the leaft commanded to take care of it in our prayers. The summe is, that we with the honour to be given to God which he is worthie to haue, that men never speake or thinke of him without most high reuerence: whereunto is contrarie the unholy abusing, which hath alway beene too common in the world, as at this day also it rangeth abroad. And hereupon commeth the necessitie of this petition, which if there lued in vs any godlines, though it were but a little, ought to have beene superfluous. But if the name of God haue his holinesse safie, when being seuered from all other, it breatheth out nothing but glorie, here wee are commanded not onely to pray that God will deliver that holy name from all contempt and dishonour, but also that hee will subdue all mankinde to the reuerence of it. Nowe whereas GOD discloseth himselfe to vs, partly by doctrine, and partly by worke, hee is no otherwise sanctified of vs, than if wee glue to him in both behaltes that which is his, and so embrace whatsoever shall come from him; and that his seueritie haue no lesse praisse among vs than his mercifullnesse, forasmuch as hee hath in the manifolde diuersitie of his worke imprinted marke of his glorie which may worthily drawe out of all tongues a confession of his praisse. So shall it come to passe that the Scripture shall haue full authority with vs, and that no success shall hinder the blessing which God decreueth in his whole course of the governing of the world. Againe, the petition also tendeth to this purpose, that all vngodlinesse which deflieth this holy name, may bee destroyed and taken away; that whatsoever things doe darken and diminish this sanctifying, as well flaunders as mockings, may be druen away; and when God subdueth all sacriledges, his glory may thereby more and more shine abroad.

The partes and proteste of the kingdome of God amongst men:
which is the second petition.

42. The seconde petition is, that The kingdome of God may come:}

which although it containe no newe thing, is yet not without cause seuered from the first: becaues if we consider our owne drowndenes in a thing greates of all other, it is profitable that the thing which ought of it selue to have beene most well knowne, be with many wordes oft beaten into vs. Therefore after that wee haue beene commanded to pray to God to bring into subjection, and at length utterly to destroye what so ever spotteth his holy name: now is added a like and in a manner the same request, that his kingdome come. But although wee haue alreadie set forth the definition of his kingdome, yet I nowe briefly rehearse, that God reigneth when men as well with forsaking of themselves as with despising of the world, and of the earthly life, doe so yelde themselves to his righteousness, that they aspire to the heavenly life. Therfore there are two partes of this kingdome: the one that God correct with the power of his Spiritual corrupth desir of the flesh,

which doe by multitudes make warre against him: the other, that he frame all our senses to the obedience of his governement. Therefore none do keepe right order in this prayer, but they which beginne at themselves, that is to say, that they be cleansed from all corruptions which trouble the quiet state of the kingdom of God, and infect the pureness thereof. Now because the word of God is like a kingly scepter, we are here commanded to pray that he will subdue the mindes and heartes of all men to willing obedience of it. Which is done, when with the seerer instruct of his Spirit he spaketh the effectuall force of his wordes, that it may be advanced in such degree as it is worthie. Afterward we must come done to the wicked which do obstinately and with desperate rage resist his auhoritie. God therefore seteth vp his kingdom by humbling the whole world; but that in diuerse maners; because he calleth the wantonnesse of some, and of other some he breaketh the vaunted pride. This is daylie to be wished that it be done, that it may please God to gather to himselfe Churches out of all the coasts of the world, to enlarget and encrease them in number, to enrich them with his gifts, to stabill right order in them: on the other side to ouerthrowe all the enemies of pure doctrine and religion, to scatter abroad their counsels, to cast downe their enterprizes. Whereby appeareth that the endeavoure of dailie proceeding is not in vaine commanded vs: because the matters of men are newre in so good case, that filthinesse being shaken awake and cleansed, full pureness fleuritheth and is in lively force. But the fulnesse of it is dffered unto the last comming of Christ, when Paul teacheth that God shall be all in all. And so this prayer ought to withdrawe vs from all the corrupt ones of the world, which doeuer vs from God that his kingdom should not flourish in vs, and also to kindle our endeavoure to mortifie the flesh, finally to intinct vs to the bearing of the cross: forasmuch as God wil in this vshe have his kingdom spread abroad. Neither ought we to take it miscontentedly that the outward man be destroyed, so that the inward man be renewed. For this is the nature of the kingdom of God, when wee submit our selues to the righteousnesse thereof, to make vs partakers of his glorie. This is done when rightly setting forth his light and truth with alwaie new encreases, whereby the darknesse and lies of Satan and his kingdom, maie vanish away, be deftroied and perished, he defendeth them that be his, with the helpe of his Spirite, directeth them to vproyntnesse, and stregtheneth them to continuance: but ouerthroweth the wicked conspiracys of his enemies shakerabroad their treasons and deceites, preuenteth their malicie, and beater done downe their stubbornnesse, till at length he kill Antichrist with the Spirit of his mouth and destroie all vnghostliness with the brightnesse of his comming.

43 The third petition is, That the will of God be done in earth as it is in heaven. Which although it hangeth upon his kingdom, and cannot be seuered from it, is not in vaine added seuerally, for our grossenesse, which doeth not easilly or by and by conceiue what it is that GOD reigne in the worlde. It shall therefore be no absurditie if this be taken by way of plainer exposition: that God shall then be king in the worlde when all things shall submit themselves to his will. Nowe here is not meant of his secrete will, whereby he governeth all things & directeth them to their end. For though Satan & men are troublesome, carried against him, yet he can by his incomprehensible counsel not only turne aside their violent motions, but also drive them into order that he may do by them that which he hath purposed. But here is spoken of an other will of God, namely that, whereunto answereth willing obedience: and therefore the heaven is by name compared with the earth; because the Angels, as it is said in the Psalm, do willingly obey God & are diligently bent to do his commandments. We are therefore commanded to wish that as in heaven nothing is done but by the beck of God, & the Angels are quietly framed to all rightnesse: for the earth, all stubbornnesse & pertuerbnesse being quenched, may be subject to such government. And when we require this, we renounce the desires of our own flesh: because whosoever doth not resign and yield his affections to God, he doth as much as in him lieth set himself against him, for as much as nothing cometh out of us but faultie. And we are againe by this prayer framed to the forsaking of our selves, that God may govern us after his will, and that he may also create in us new mindes & new hearts, our old being brought to nought: that we may feele in our selves none other motion of desire than a mere consent with his will; summarily that we may will nothing of our selves, but that his Spirit maie govern our hearts, by whom inwardly teaching vs we maie learne to love those things that please him, & to hate those things that displease him. Whereupon this also followeth, that whatsoever affections fight against his will, he maie make them vaine and void. Loe here be the first three chiefest points of this prayer, in asking whereof we ought to have the onelie glory of God before our eyes, leaving the respect of our selves, and having no regard to anie of our owne profit, which although it come hereof largely unto us, yet we ought not here to secke it. But albeit all these things, though we neither thinke of them, nor with them, nor aske them, must nevertheless come to passe in their due time, yet we must will with them and require them. And this to doe is no small profit for our trauaille, that we maie so testifie and profess our selves to be the servants and children of God, as much as in vs lieth endeavouing and being truethie and throughly given to set forth his honour, which is due to him being both a Lord and a Father. Whoso therefore doth not with affection and zeal of auauncing the glory of God, pray that the name of God bee hallowed, that his kingdom come, that his will be done: they are not to be accounted among the children and servants of God: and as all these things shalbe done against their willes, so they shall turne to their confusion and destruction.

Psal. 103. 20.

The sense of the fourth petition wherein our corporall & earthly necessities are commended unto God.
1. Cor. 10. 31.

44 Nowe followeth the second parte of the prayer, in which we come downe to our owne commodities: not that bidding fare well to the glorie of God (which as Paul witnesseth, is to be regarded even in meate & drinke) we should secke onelie what is profitable for our selves: but we have already giuen warning that there is this difference, that God peculiarly claiming three petitions to himselfe doeth drawe vs to himselfe wholly, that he may in this wise prove our godlinesse. Then he graunteth vs also to have an eye to our owne commodities, but with this condition, that wee aske nothing nothing for ourselves but to this end that whatsoever benefits he befloweth vpon vs, they may set forth his glory: forasmuch as nothing is more rightfull than that we live and die to him, But in this petition we ask of God generally all things which the use of the bodie needeth vnder the elements of this world, not only wherewith we may bee fed & clothed, but also what soever he forseeth to be profitable for vs, that we may eat our bread in peace. By which prayer bredefully we yeeld our selves into his care, and commit vs to his providence, that he may seede, cherish, and preferue vs. For the most good Father disdaineth not to receiue also our bodie into his faithful safeguard and keeping, to exercise our Faith in these small things, we look for all things at his hands even to a crumme of bread and a dropp of water. For whereas it is come to passe I wote not howe by our iniquitie, that we be maced and vexed with greater care of the flesh than of the soule: many which dare trust to God for their soul, are yet careful for their flesh, are yet in doubt what they shall eate, and wherewith they shall be clothed: and if they have not plente of wine, wheate, and oile for hande, they tremble for feare. So much more doe we esteeme the shadowe of this life which lafteth but a moment, than that euerlafting immortalitie. But who so trusting to God haue once cast away that carefulnesse for the provision of the flesh, do also by and by looke for salvation and euerlafting life at his hande, which are greater things. It is therefore no small exercise of Faith, to hope for those things of God, which otherwise do so much holde vs in care: & we haue not smal profite, whē we haue put off this vnbelievingnes which flicketh fast within the bones almoest of all men. As for that which some do heare teach of this substantial bread, it seemeth but smally to agree with the meaning of Christ: yea but if we did not euen in this fraile life giue to God the office of a nourishing Father, our prayer should be vnprefect. The reason which they bring is too much prophane: that it is not meete that the children of God, which ought to be spiritually, should not only cast their minde to earthly cares, but also wrappe God therein with them. As though his blessing and fatherly fauour doth not also appeare in the suftenance of our life, or as though it were written in vaine that godlinesse hath promisses not onclie of the life to come, but also of this present life. But although the foreiguenesse of sinnes is of much greater value than the suftennances of the body, yet Christ hath set the inferior thing in the first place, to the extent to lift vs vp by degrees to the other two petitions which do properly belong to the heauenlie life, wherein he had regard to our godlinesse. We are commanded to aske Our breade, that we should be content with the quantity which our heauenly father vouchfaethe to giue vs, & should not seek for gaine by vnlawfull craftie meanes. In the meane time we must learne that it is made Ours by Title of giftes, because neither our diligence, nor our travaile, nor our handes (as it is sayde in Moses) doe by them selves get vs any thing, vnlesse the blessing of God be present: yea the plenty of bread should nothing at all profite vs, vnlesse it were by God turned into nourishment. And therefore this liberalitie of GOD is no lesse necessarie for the riche than for the poore: because hauling their cellars and their barnes full, they shoude yet sainte for drines and emptinesse, vnlesse they did by his grace enjoy. enjoy their bread. The words This Day, or every day as it is in the other Evangeliist, and also the aiceticue Dailie, do bridle the too much greedines of fairle things, wherewith we are wont to burne out of measure, & wherunto are ioyned other euiis: whith if we have plentiful abundance, we do gloriously powre it our vpon pleasure, delights, boffing, and other kinds of riotous exceffe. Therefore we are commanded to ask only so much as is enough for our necessifty, & as it were from day to day, with this affiance, that when our heavenly Father hath fedde vs this day, hee will also not fail vs to morowe.
Therefore how great plenty of things, soeuer do flowe vnto vs, yea when our barnes be stuffed, and our cellars full; yet we ought alway to aske our dayly bread, because we must certeинlie believe that all substance is nothing, but insomuch as the Lorde doth by powring out of his blessing with continual encresse make it fruitful: & that the very same substance that is in our hand, is not our owne, but insomuch as hee doth euery house giue vs a portion & graunte vs the use of it. This whereas the pride of men doth most hardlie suffer it selfe to be perswaded: the Lord testifieth that he hath shewed a singular example therof for all ages, when he fed his people with Manna in the wildernesse, to teach vs that man liueth not in bread alone, but rather in the words that commeth out of his mouth. Wherby is declared, that it is his power alone by which our life and strengthes are sustenned, although he do minister it vnto vs vnder bodile instruments. As hee is wont also to reach vs by the contrarie example, when he so oft as hee will, breake th strength and (as he calleth it) the staffe of bread, that men eating may pine with hunger, and drinking may be dried vp with thirst. But who so not being contented with daily bread, but with vnbridled greedinesse are gaping for endlesse store, or who so being full with their abundance, and carelesse by reason of the heape of their riches, doth never thelesse sue to God with this prayer, they do nothing else but mocke him. For, the first sort of such men aske that which they would not obtaine, yea that which they most of all abhorre, that is, to have onely dailie bread, and so much as in them lieth they dismembering hide from God the affection of their covetousnesse: whereas true prayer ought to powre out before him the verie whole minde it selfe, and whatsoeuer inwardly lieth hidden. But the other sorte do aske that which they looke not for at his hande, namelie that which they thinke that they haue with themselves. In this that it is called Ours the bountifulnes of God (as we haue saide) so much more appeareth, which maketh that ours that is by no right due to vs. Yet that exposition is not to be rejected which I haue also touched, that by our bread is meant that which is earned with rightfull & harmelsse travaile, and not gotten with deceits and extorti-ones; because that is alway other mens which we get to our selves with any ill doing. Whereas we pray that it be giuen vs, thereby is signified that it is the onely and free gift of God, from whence focuer it come to vs, yea when it shall most of all seeme to be gotten by our owne pollitie and travaile, and carne with our owne hands: forasmuch as it commeth to passe by his on-lie blessing that our labours prosper well.

45 Now followeth, Forgiu vs our dettes: in which petition and the next next following, Christ hath briefly contained whatsoever maketh for the heavenly life: as in these two partes above standeth the spiritual covenant which God hath made for the salvation of his Church, I will write my laws in their hearts, and I will be mercifull to their iniquities. Here Christ beginneth the forgiving of sins after this, he will by and by adioyne the second grace, that God defend vs with the power of his Spirit, & sustaine vs in his help, that we may stand overcome against all tentations. And sins he calleth debts, because we are destound to pay the penality of them, & were by no meennes able to satisfie it, vnlesse we were acquired by this forgiving. Which pardon is of his free mercy, when he himselse liberally wypeth out these debts, taking no payment of vs, but with his owne mercy satisfying himselfe in Christ, which hath once given himselfe for recompence, Therefore whose trust that God shalbe satisfied by their owne or other meanes, and that with such satisfactions the forgiueness of sins is recompened and redeemed, they have no parte of communicating of this free forgivinge: and when they call upon God in this manner, they do nothing but subscribe to their owne accusation, yea and seal their owne condemnation with their owne witnessse. For they confess themselves debtors, vnlesse they be acquired by the benefit of forgivinge, which yet they do not receive, but rather refuse, when they thrust into God their owne merits and satisfactions. For, they do not beseech his mercy, but do appeale to his judgement. As for them that dreamed of a perfection in themselves, which taketh away neede to crave pardon, let them hate such disciple whome the itching of their cares driueth to errores: so that it be certaine that so many disciples as they get, are taken away from Christe: forasmuch as he instructing all to confess their guiltiness, receiue both none but sinners: for that he cherisheth sinnes with flatteringes, but because he knew that the faithful are never throughly vnclotshed of the vices of their flesh, but that they alway remain subiect to the judgement of God. It is in deed to be wished, yea and to be earnestly endeavoured, that we having performed all the partes of our dutie may truely rejoice before God that we are cleane from all spot but forasmuch as it pleaseth God by hilde and little to make againe his image in vs, that there alway remaineth some infection in our flesh, the remedy ought not to have bene defined. If Christ by the authoritie given to him of his Father, commandeth vs throughout the whole course of our life, to flee from craving of pardon of our guiltiness: which shall be able to suffer these newe masters, which goe about with this imagined ghost of perfect innocencie to deffall the eyes of the simple, to make them to trust they may be made free from all fault? Which, as 1 John witnesseth, is nothing else but to make God a liger. And with all one worke these lewd men by cancelling one article do teare in sunder & by y meane doe weaken from the very foundacion the whole covenant of God, wherein we have shewed our salvation is contained: so as they be not only robbers of God, because they seuer those things so conioyned, but also wicked and cruel because they overthrowe poore soules with despair: and traitours to themselves and other, that be like them, because they bring themselves into a slothfulness directly contrary to the mercie of God. But whereas some object, that in willing the comming of the kindome of God, wee doe also ask the putting away of sinne: that is too childish, because in your first table of this praiers first forth unto vs most high perfection, but in this part is set forth our weakness. So these two things do fitly agree together, that in a spring toward the mark we despise not the remedies which our necessities requireth. Finally, we pray that we may be forgiven as we our selues doe forgive our debters, that is, as we do forgive and pardon all of whomsoever wee haue beene in anything offended, either venustiy handled in deed, or reproachfully said in word. Nor that it lyeth in vs to pardon the guiltines of the fault & offence which pertaineth to God alone: but this is our forgiving of our owne willingness to lay away out of our mind wrath, hatred, and desire of reuengement, and with voluntarie forgetfulness to tread under foote the remembrance of injuries. Wherefore we may not aske forgiveness of sinnes at the hande of God, if we do not also forgive their offences towards vs which either do or haue done vs wrong. But if wee keepe any hatreds in our heartes, and purpose any reuengementes, and imagine by what occasion wee, may hurt, yea, and if we do not endeavour to come into fauour againe with our enemies, and to deserre well of vs with all kinde of friendly doinges, & to winne them vnto vs, we do by this prayer beseech God that he doe not forgive vs. For we require that he grant to vs the same forgiveness which we grant to other. But this is to pray that he grant not to vs vnlesse wee grant it to them. Whoso therefore be such, what doe they obtaine by their prayer but a more grieuous judgement? Last of all it is to be noted, this condition he forgive vs as we forgive our debters, is not therefore added for if we deserre his forgiveness by the forgiveness which we grant to other, as if that cause of forgiveness to vs were there expressed: but by this worde partly the Lordes will was to comfort the weaknesses of our Faith, for he added this as a signe whereby we may be assured that he hath as surely granted to vs forgiveness of our sinnes, as we surely know in our conscience that we haue granted the same to other, if our mind be voide and cleansed of all hatred, enuy, and reuengement, and partly by this as it were by a marke, he wipeth them out of the number of his children that they may not bee bold to call upon him as their Father, which being headlong hafty to reuenge, & hardly entreated to pardon, doe in stifely continuing enmities, and doe chear in themselves the same displeasure toward other which they praye to be turned from themselves. Which is also in Luke expressly spoken in the words of Christ.

46 The sixt petition (as we haue saide) answereth to the promise of engraunting the lawe of God in our heartes. But because we do not without continuall warrefare with the great displeasings obey to God, wee doe here pray to be furnished with such weapons and defended with such succor, that wee maie be able to get the victorie: whereby wee are warned that we stand in neede not onelie of the grace of the Spirit, which may soften, bowe, & direct our heartes to the obedience of God, but also of his helpe, whereby hee may make vs invincible against both all the traitorous entrapings and violent conflicts of Satan: But now of tentations there are manye and diverse sortes. For, both the puerile thoughts of minde provoking vs to trespassing

The passing against the law, which either our own lust doth minister vnto vs, or the deuill sturreth vp, are tentations: and all those things which of their owne nature are not euill, yet by the craft of the deuill are made tentations, when they are so set before our eyes, by the occasion of them we be drawn away or do swappe from God. And these tentations are either on the right hand or on the left. On the right hand, as riches, power, honours, which commonlie do with their glistering and the we of good so do fell the sight of men, and caether them with the bated hooke oftheir flatteringes, that being entrapped with such deceites, or dronk with such sweeteffe they may forget their God. On the left hand, as pouertie, reproches, despilings, troubles, and such other: that they being grievd with the bitternes & hardnes thereof, may be vittellie discourages, cast away faith and hope, and finally be altogether estranged from God. To these tentations of both forces, which fight with vs either being kindled in vs by our own lust, or being set against vs by the craft of Satan, we pray to our heauelie Father that he suffer vs not to yeeld: but rather that hee vpholde vs and raife vs vp with his hande, that being strong by his strength, we may stand fast against all the assaultes of the malicious enemie, whatsoever thoughtes he put into our mindes: then, that whatsoever is set before vs on either side, we may turne it to good, that we neither be puffed vp with prosperitie, nor throwne downe with aduersitie. Neither yet doe we heare require that we may seele no tentations at all, with which we have great neede to be stirred vp, pricked, and pinched, least by too much rest we growe dull. For not in vaine did David write to be tempted: and not without cause the Lord daylie tempteth his elect, chastising them by shame, pouertie, trouble, and other kindes of Croffe. But God tempteth after one manner, and Satan after another: Satan, to destroy, damne, confound, and throwe downe headlong: but God, that by proving them that be his he may have a trial of their vnstainedneffe, and by exercising them may confirm their strength, to mortifie, purge by fire, and scare their flesh, which vnlesse it were in this wise restraine, would waxe wanton, and would wilfully outrageous above measure. Moreover Satan affaiileth men vnarmed and vnreadie, that hee may oppresse them vnware: God even with tempting worketh the effect, that they which be his may pacientlie bear whatsoever he sendeth vpon them. By the name of the Euill, whether we understande the Deuill or sinne, it maketh little matter. Satan in deed himselfe is the enimie that lieth in waite for our life: but with sinne he is armed to destroy vs. This therefore is our request, that we may not bee overcome or overwhelmed with any tentations, but may by the power of the Lord stande strong against all contrarie powers wherewith we are affaiiled: which is, not to yeeld vs so qualified to tentations, that being receiued into his keeping & charge, and being safe by his protection, we may endure vnconquerable surfe, death, the gates of hell, and the whole kingdom of the deuill which is to be deliered from euill. Where it is also to be diligently marked, that it is about our strength to matche with the deuill to greate a warrier, & to beare his force and violence. Otherwise we should but vainely or as it were in moccage ask that which we had alreadie in our selves. Surely they which prepare them to such a battle with trust of them selves, doe not not sufficiently understand with how fierce and well armed an enemy they hast to doe. Now wee pray to be deliuered from his power, as out of the mouth of a mad and raging lyon, whereas we should be born in pieces with his teeth and paws, and swallowed with his throte, vnlesse the Lord do deliuer vs out of the midst of death, yet theewth knowing this that if the Lord shall stande by vs, and fight for vs when we are ouerthrown, we shall in his strength thewe strength. Let other trust as they lift to their owne abilities and strengths of freewill, which they thinke that they have of them selves, but let it suffice vs that we stand and are strong by the only strength of God. But this prayer conteineth more than at the first sight it beareth in thewe. For if the spirite of God be our strength to fight out our combat with Satan, we shall not be able to get the victorie vs till we being filled with that Spirite shall haue put off all the weakenesse of our flesh. When therefore we pray to be deliuered from Satan and the Deuill, we pray to be from time to unce encreases of the grace of God, till being fully stuffed with them we may triumph over all evil. It seemeth hard and rough to some, that we craue of God that he lead vs not into temptation, forasmuch as it is contrary to his nature to tempt, as James witnesseth. But this question is already partly afoiled, where we said that our owne lust is properly the cause of all the tentations wherewith we are overcome, & therefore worthilie beareth the blame thereof. Neither doth James mean any thing else, but that the faultes are without cause and wrongfully laid upon God, which we are druen to impute to our selues, because we know our selues in our conscience guilty of them. But this withstandeth not but that God may when it pleaseth him make vs bond to Satan, cast vs away into a reprobatre sense, and to filthy lustes, and so lead vs into temptation by his judgement which is righteous in deed but yet oftentimes secret: forasmuch as the cause of it is often hid from men, which is yet certainly known with him. Whereupon is gathered that this is no vnfit manner of speaking, if we bee persuaded that he doth not without cause so oft threaten, that when the reprobatre shall be striken with blindness and harding of heart, these shall be sure tokens of his vengeance.

47 These three petitions, wherewith we do peculiarlie commend vs & our things to God, doe evidently shew this which we have before said, that the prayers of Christians ought to be common and to tend to the common edifying of the Church, and to the encrease of the communion of the faithful. For ther doth not every man pray to have any thing privately given, but all in common together do pray for our bread, for forgiveness of sins, that we may not be led into temptation, that we may be deliuered from evil. There is furthermore adoined a cause why wee haue both so great boldnesse to ask, and so great trust to obtaine: which although it be not in the latine copies, yet it agreeth more fitly in this place than that it should seeme worthy to be omitted, namely that his is the kingdom, and the power and the glory for euer. This is the perfect and quiet rest of our soule. For if our prayers were to be commended to God by their own worthinesse, who should be so bold, as once to open his mouth before him? Now howsoever we bee most miserable, howsoever most vnworthie of all men, howsoever void of all com-commendation: yet we shall not want cause to pray, & never be destitute of confidence: forasmuch as our father cannot have his kingdom, power, and glory taken away from him. At the end is added Amen, whereby is expressed our ferventness of desire to obtain those things that we have asked of God, and our hope is confirmed that all such things are already obtained & shall surely be given vs because they are promised of God, which can not deceive. And this agreeeth with that manner of prayer which we have here before rehearsed, Doe it Lorde for thy names sake, not for our sakes or our righteousness: whereby the holy ones do not only express the ende of their prayers, but also confess that they are unworthy to obtain vnslesse God fetch the cause from himselfe: and that their trust to speed commeth of the onely nature of God.

48 Thus haue wee whatsoeuer we ought ye or in any wise may ask of God, set foorth in this forme & as it were a rule of praying taught by the best scholemaster Christe, whom the Lord hath set ouer vs to be our teacher, and whom alone he hath willed to be hardenèd vnto. For he both alway hath beene his eternall wisdome, and being made man is given to men the Angel of great counsell. And this prayer is in all pointes so fully perfect, that whatsoeuer foreseen or strange thing is added which cannot be referred to it, it is vnsodly and vnworthy to be allowed of God. For in this summery he hath set foorth, what is meete for him, what is pleasing to him, what is necessary for vs: finally what he will graunt. Wherefore who so dare go further, and to ask any thing of God beside these, first they will adde of their owne to the wisdome of God (which can not be done without mad blasphemie) then they holde not themselves vnder the will of GOD, but defying it doe with greediness wander further: finally they shall neuer obtaine any thing, forasmuch as they pray without faith, And there is no doubt of all such prayers are made without faith, because here wanteth the worde of GOD, vpon which vnslesse faith be grounded, it can in no wise stand. But they which forsaking the maisters rule, doe followe their owne desires, are not onely without the worde of God, but also so much as they be able with their whole endevoure, are against it. Therefore Tertullian no lesse fitly than truly hath called this a lawfull prayer, secretly signifying that all other are lawlesse and vnlawfull.

49 We would not haue these things so taken as though we were so bound with this forme of prayer, that we may not change a worde or a syllable. For there are ech where read many praiers in the Scriptures, farre differing from this in worde, yet written by the same Spirit, and which are at this day profitable to be vfed of vs. Many are continuallly put into their mouthes of the faithfull by the same Spirit, which in likenesesse of wordes doe not so much agree. This onely is our meaning in so teaching, that no man should seeke, looke for, or aske any other thing at all than that which is summarily comprehended in this prayer, & which though it most differ in wordes yet differeth not in sente. Like as it is certaine that all the prayers which are founde in the Scriptures, & which do come out of godly hearts, are applied to this, so verily none can any where be found, which may match, much lesse passe, the perfection of this prayer. Here is nothing left out, that might be thought upon upon to the prayers of God, nothing that ought to come into thy mind of man for his owne profits: and the same so fully that all hope is worthily taken away from all men to attempt to make any better. In a summe, let vs remember that this is the doctrine of the wisdom of God, which hath taught what he willed, and willed what was needfull.

50 But although we haue aforesayd, that we ought alway to breath vpward with mindes lifted vp to God, and pray without ceasing: yet forasmuch as such is our weakeenesse, as needeth to bee vp upheld with many helps: such is our dulnesse, as needeth to be pricked forward with many spurre: it is good that we doe one of vs appoint to himselfe privately certaine houres which may not passe away without prayer, and which may haue the whole affections of our minde throughly busied to that purpose: as, when we rise in the morning, before that we goe to our dayes worke, when we fitte downe to meate, when we haue bene fedde by the blessing of God, when we take vs to rest. One lyt this not be a superstitious observing of houres, by which, as paying a taske to God, we may thinkke our selues dischargd for the other houres: but a training of our weakeenesse, whereby it may so be exercised and from time to time stirred vp. specially we ought carefull to looke that so oft as either we our selues are in distresse, or wee see other to be in distresse with any hardnesse of adversitie, we runne with all speede way to him, not with feet but with heartes: then, that we suffer not any prosperitie of our owne or other mens, to passe but that we teastifie that we acknowledge it to bee his with prayer and thanksgiving. Finally, this is diligently to be obserued in all prayer, that we go not about to binde God to certaine circumstances, nor to appoint to hym, what he shal doe, at what time, in what place, and in what maner: as by this prayer we are taught to make to him no lawe, nor to appoint to hym any condition, but to leaue to his will that those thinges which he will doe, he may doe in what maner, at what time, & in what place it pleaseth him. Wherefore ere we make any prayer for our selues, we first pray that his will be done: where we doe alreadie submittre our will to his: with which when it is restrayned as with a bridle put vpon it, it may not presume to bring GOD into rule, but make him the judge and governour of all her desires.

51 If we do with mindes framed to this obedience, suffer our selues to be ruled with the lawes of Gods providence, we shal easely learn to continue in prayer, and with longing desieres patiently to waite for the Lorde: being assured that although he appeares not, yet he is alway present with vs, and will when he seeth his time declare howe he doth care he gauie to the prayer, which in the eyes of men seemed to be despised. And this shall be a most present comfort, that we faint not & fall downe by despaire, if at any time God do not answeare at our first requestes. Like as they are wont to do, which while they are caried with their sodaine heathe, do so cal vpon GOD, that if he come not to them at their first brutes and bring them present helpe, they by and be imagine him to be angry and hatefully bent against them, and casting away all hope of obtaining do cease to cal vpon him. But rather differing our hope with a well tempered evenennesse of minde, let vs goe forward in that perseverance which is so much commended to vs in Scriptures. For

For in the Psalms we may oftentimes see how David & other faithful men, when they seeme in a manner wearied with praying, did beare the aire, because they threw away their words to God that heard them not, and yet they cease not from praying: because the worde of God hath not his full authoritye maintained, unless the credite thereof be set aboue all successs of things. Moreover let vs not tempt God and proue him against vs being wearied with our importunacye, which many vs to doe, which doe nothing but infect with God vspon a certaine condition, and binte him to the laws of their couenuanting, as though he were seruant to their desires: which if he do not presently obey, they disdaine, they chafe, they carp against hym, they murmure, they turmoile. Therefore to such oftentimes in his furor he being angrie graunteth that, which to other in his mercie he being fauourable denieth. An example hereof are the children of Israel, for whom it had bene better not to have bene heard of the Lorde, than with flesh to eate vp his wrath.

But if yet at length after long looking for it our sense do not perceiue what we have prevailed with praying, and seeleth no fruite thereof: yet our faith shal assure vs of that, which cannot be perceived by sense, namely that wee have obteined that which was expedient for vs, forasmuch as the Lord doeth so oft, and so certeainely take vpwn him that hee will have care of our greeces, after that they have bene once laide in his bosome. And so he will make vs to posseffe abundance in povertie, comfort in afflication. For howsoever all other things do faile vs, yet God will never faile vs, which suffreth the waiting and patience of them that be his to be disappointed. Hee alone shal suffice vs in stede of all thinges, forasmuch as hee containeth in himselfe all good thinges, which hee shal one day discloxe vs at the day of judgement when hee shall plainly shew forth his kingdome. Beside this although God grant vs, yet hee doeth not alway aunswere according to the express forme of our request, but holding vs after outwarde seeming in suspence, yet by a meane vnknowne hee sheweth that our prayers were not vaine. This is meant by the words of John, If wee knowe that hee heareth vs when we ask any thing of him, wee know that we haue the petitions which we ask of him. This seemeth a weake superfluousnesse of words: but it is a singularly profitable declaration, namely that God euen when he doth not follow our desires, is yet gentle and fauourable to our prayers, that the hope which refeth vpoun his worde may never dispoint vs. But with this patience the faithfull doe so farre neede to bee sustaine, that they shoulde not long stand vnlesse they did stay vpoun it. For the Lorde doth by no light trialls proove them that be his, and not tenderly doeth exercise them: but oftentimes driueth them into the greatest extremeties, and when they are driuen thither hee suffreth them long to sticke fast in the mire, ere hee giue them any taste of his sweetenesse: and, as Hanna sayeth, hee sayeth, and quickeneth: hee leadeth downe to the helles, and bringeth backe againe. What could they heere doe but bee discouraged, and fall headlong into dispaire: vnlesse when they are in distresse and defolate and all readie halfe dece, this thought did raise them vp, that God doeth looke vpon them, and that there shall be at hande an ende of their euils. But howsoever they stand fast upon the assurednesse of that hope, they cease not in the meanest time to pray: because if there be not in prayer a stedfastnesse of continuance, we nothing preuaile with praying.

The xxv. Chapter.

Of the eternall election, whereby God hath predestinate some to salvation, and other some to destruction.

But nowe whereas the covenant of life is not equally preached to all men, and with them to whom it is preached it doth not either equally or continually find like place: in this diversitie the wondrous depth of the judgement of God appeareth. For neither is it any doubt but that this diversitie also springeth from the free choice of Gods eternall election. If it be euident that it is wrought by the will of God that salvation is freely offered to some, & other some are debarred from comming to it: here by & by arise great & hard questions which cannot otherwise be discused, than if the godly minds have certainly establisht which they ought to holde concerning election & predestination. This is (as many thinke) a combersome question: because they thinke nothing to bee lesse reasonable than of the common multitude of men, some bee foreordained to salvation, other some to destruction. But howe they wrongfullie encomber themselves, shall afterwarde bee euident by the framing of the matter together. Beside that, in the very same darkness which maketh men afraid, not only the profabelenes of this doctrine, but also the most sweete fruites theyeighth forth it selfe. Wee shall never bee clearly perswaded as wee ought to bee, that our salvation floweth out of the fountain of the free meritie of God, till his eternall election bee known to vs, which by this comparison brightly setteth forth the grace of God, that he doeth not without difference adopt all into the hope of salvation, but giueth to some that which he denieth to other. How much the ignorance of this principle diminishteth the glorie of God, howe much it withdraweth from the true humilitie, it is plaine to see. But Paul denieth that that which is so necessarie to be known, is possible to be known, vnlesse God leaung altogether the respect of workes doe choose them whom he hath determined with himselfe. In this time (saieth he) the remnantes were saued according to the free election, If by Grace, then not of worke: forasmuch as Grace should then not be Grace. If of worke, then not of grace: forasmuch as worke should now not be worke. If we must be brought backe to the beginning of elecction, that it may be certaine that salvation commeth to vs from noother where than from the mere liberalitie of God: they which will haue this principle quenched, doeiggardly so much as in the lyter darknesse which ought gloriouly and with full mouth to haue beeene published, and they plucke vp the very roote of humilitie. Paul, where the salvation of the remnant of the people is ascribed to free election, cleerele refieth that onely then it is knowne that God doth by his meeke good pleasure, sue whom he will, and not render rewardes which cannot bee done. They which shut the gates, that none may bee bolde to come to the tasting of
of this doctrine, do no lees wrong to men than to God: because neither shall any other thing suffice to humble us as we ought to be, neither shall we otherwise feel, from our heart, how much we are bounde to God. Neither yet is there any other where the vpholding sate of found affiance, as Christ himselfe teacheth, which to deliuer vs from all feare, and to make vs vnuanquishable among so manie dangers, ambushes, & deadly battels, promiseth that whatsoever he hath receiued of his Father to keepe, halbe safe. Whereof we gather that they shal with continuall trembling be miserable, whose ever they be that knowe not themselves to be the proper possession of God: and therefore that do verie ill provide both for themselves and for all faithful, which being blind at these three profits which we have touched, wold with the whole foundation of our salvation to be quite taken from among vs. Moreover, hereby the Church appeareth vnto vs, which otherwise (as Bernarde rightely teache th) were not possible to be found, nor to be known among creatures, because both wares in maruelous wise it lieth hidde within the bofore of blessed predestinatiö, & within the Maffe of miserable damnatiö. But ere I enter into the matter itself, I must before hande in two forties speak to two forties of men. That the in treating of predestinatiö, wheras of it self it is somewhat combersome, is made verie doubtfull yea & dangerous, the curiousnes of men is the caus: which can by no stops be restrained from wandering into forbidden compasses, & climbing vp on high: which, if it may, will use to God no secret which it wil not search and turn ouer. Into this boldnesse and importunacie forasmuch as we commonly see many to run headlong, & among those some that are otherwise not euil me: here is his occasion to warne them what is in this behalf the due measure of their dutie. First therefor let the remembre, that when they enquire vpon Predeftinatiö, they perceiue into the secret closets of the wisedome of God: whereinto if any man do carelesly and boldly breake in, he shall both not attaine therewith to satisfie his curiousnesse, and he shall enter into a maze where he shall finde no waie to get out againe. For neither is it meete that man shoulde freely search those thinges which God hath willed to bee hidden in himselfe, and to turne ouer from verie eternitie the height of wisedome, which hee willed to be honored and not be conceived, that by it also he might be maruells vnto vs. Those secrets of his wille which he hath determined to be opened vnto vs, he hath disclosed in his word: and he hath determined, so far as he foresaw to perserne vnto vs and to be profitable for vs.

2. We are come (saih Augustine) into the waie of Faith, let vs stedfastly holde it. It bringeth into the Kings chamber, in which all the treasures of knowledge and wisedome are hidden. For, the Lord himselfe Christ did not enue his excellent and most chosen disciples, when hee said, I haue manie thinges to be said to you, but ye cannot bare them now. We must warke, we must profit, we must increase, that our harts may be able to conceiue those thinges which now we canot conceiue. If the last day find vs profiting, there we shall learne that which here we could not. If this thought be offorce with vs, that the word of the Lord is the onely way, that maie leade vs to search whatsoever is lawfull to be learned of him, that it is the onely light, which maie guide vs light to see whatsoever we ought to see of him: it shall easlie

holde backe and restraine vs from all rashnesse. For wee shall knowe that so soone as we be gone out of the boundes of the worlde, we run out of the waie, and in darkenesse, in which race wee must needs oftentimes straie, slippe, and stumble. First therefore let this be before our eyes, that to couete any other knowledge of Predestination than that which is set forth by the worde of God, is a point of no lesse madnesse then if a man have a will to go by an unpassable waie, or to see in darkenesse. Neither let vs bee ashamed, to be ignorant of somewhat in it wherein there is some learned ignorant. But rather let vs willingly abstein from the searching of that knowledge, whereof the excessiue coueting is both foolish & perillous, yea & deadly. But if the wantonnesse of wit provoke vs, it shal be profitable alway to set this against it, wherby it may be beaten backe, that as too much of honie is not good, so the searching of glorie doth not turne vs to glorie to the curious. For there is good cause why we shoulde be frayned away from that boldnes, which can do nothing but throw vs downe headlong into ruine.

There be other which when they have a will to remedy this euill, doe command all mention of Predestination to bee in a manner buried, at the least they teach men to flee from euerie manner of questioning thereof as from a rock. Although the moderatio of these men be herein worthy to be praised that they judge that mysteries shold be tafted of with such sobriety: yet because they defied too much beneath the mean:they little prevail with \( y \) wis man, which doth not lightly suffer it selfe to be restrained. Therefore, that in this behalf also we may keep a right end, we must return to the word of the Lord, in which we have a sure rule of understanding. For the scripture is the schole of the holic Ghost, in which as nothing is left out which is both necessarie & profitable to be known, so nothing is taught but that which is behouefull to learne. Whateuer therefore is vted in the Scripture concerning predestination, wee must beware that we debarre not the faithfull from it, lest we should seem either enviously to defraud them of the benefit of their God, or to blame & accuse the holy Ghost who hath published those things which it is anie wise profitable to be suppresed. Let vs (I say) give leave to a Christian man, to open his minde and his eates to all the lainges of God which are directe to him, so that it be done with this temperance, that so soone as the Lorde hath closed his holy mouth, hee maie also ferre close to himselfe all the way to enquire further. This shall be the best bonde of sobrietie, if not onely in learning we alway followe the Lorde going before vs, but also when hee maketh an ende of teaching, wee ceale to will to learne Neither is the danger which they feare of so great importance, that we ought therefore to turne away our minds from the oracles of God. Notable is the sayings of Salomon, that the glorie of God is to conceale a worde. But fith both godlinesse and common reason teacheth that this is not generally meant of euerie thing, wee must secke a difference, least brutish ignorance should please vs under colour of modestie and sobrietie. That difference is in fewe wordees plainly set out by Moses, To the Lorde our God (faith he) belong his secretes: but to vs and to our children hee hath disclosed these things. For we see how he commendeth to the people the study of the doctrine of the law, only by reason of the decree of God, because is plea-pleased God to publish it, and how hee withholdeth the people within those bounds, by this only reason, because it is not lawful for mortal men to thrust themselves into the secretes of God.

4. Prophane men (I grant) do in the matter of Predestination sodainly catch holde offomewhat which they may carpe, or caull, or barke, or scoffe at. But if their waiwardnes do stray vs away from it, the chiefe articles of the faith must be kept secret, of which there is almost none which they or such as they be do leave untouched with blasphemie. A frowarde wit will no lesse proudly outrage when he heareth that in the essence of God there are three persons, than if hee heareth that God foresawe what shoule become of man when he created him. Neither will they absteine from laughing, when they shall understande that there is little more than five thousand yeares passed since the creation of the world; for they will aske why the power of God was so long idle and asleepe. Finally there can be nothing brought forth, which they wil not scoffe at. For the restraining of these factileges, must wee hold our peace of the Godhead of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost? or must wee passe over in silence the creation of the world? Yea but the truth of God is both in this behalfe and euery where mightier than that it neede to feare the euil speaking of the wicked: as Augustine strongly maintaineing in his work of the good of Perseuerance. For we see that the false Apostles could not by defaming & flanderung the true doctrine of Paul, make him to be ashamed of it. But whereas they say that this whole disputation is perillous also for godly minds, because it makeith against exhortations, because it shaketh faith, because it troublith the heart it selfe: this is vaine. Augustine stickeith not to confess that for these causes he was wont to be blamed, for that he did too freely preach Predestination: but as he had in readiness where-withall, he largely confute them. But we, because many & diverse absurdities are thrust into this place, had rather to refere every one to be wiped away in place, fit for it. Only this I desire generally to obteine of them, that those things which the Lord hath laid vp in secret, we may not search: those things which he hath brought openly abroad, we may not neglect: lest either on one part we be condemned of vaine curiositie, or on the other part, of vn-thankfulness. For this also is very well said of Augustine, that wee may safely follow the scripture, which as with a motherly pace goeth stoupingly, least it should forsake our weaknesses. But who so are to ware & so fearfull that they would have Predestination to be buried, least it should trouble weak soules: with what colour, I beseech you, will they couer their arrogancie, when they indirectly accuse God of foolish vnadvisednes, as though he foresawe not the danger, which they thinke themselues to have wisely met with? Whosoever therefore travellid to bring the doctrine of Predestination into mis liking, he openly faith euil of God: as though somewhat had vnadvisedly slipped from him which is hurtfull to the Church.

5. Predestination whereby God adopteth some into the hope of life, & judgeth some to eternal death, no man that would be accounted godly dare simply deny: But they wrap it vp with many caullatiues, specially they which make foreknowledge the cause of it. We in deede do say, that they be both in God, but we say that the one is wrongfully made subject to the other.
When we give foreknowledge to God, we mean, that all things at any time, even and perpetually do remaine under his eyes: so that to his knowledge there is nothing to come or past, but all things are present, and to present that he doeth not imagine onely by conceived forms (as those things are present to us) whereof our minde holdeth fast the remembrance) but hee truly beholdeth and seeth them as set before him. And this foreknowledge extendeth to the whole compasse of the world, and to all creatures. Predestination we call the eternal decree of God, whereby he had it determined with himselfe what hee willed to become of every man. For all are not created to like estate: but to some eternal life, and to some everlasting damnation is foreappointed. Therefore as every man is created to the one or other end, so we lay that he is predestinate either to life or to death. But this predestination God hath not only testified in every several person, but hath shewed an example thereof in the whole issue of Abraham, whereby he might plainly appear that it lieth in his will what shalbe the estate of every nation. When the Highest divided the nations, and seuered the children of Adam, his part was the people of Israel, the cord of his inheritance. The separation is before the eyes of all men: in the person of Abraham as in a drie flocke one people is peculiarly chosen, all other being refused; but the cause appeareth not, sauing that Moses, to cut off all occasion of glorying from posterity, teacheth that they excell only by the free love of God. For he assigneth this to be the cause of their deliuercance, for that God loued the fathers, & chose their seede after them. More plainly in another Chapter: Hee was pleased in you to choose you, not because you passed other nations in number, but because he loved you. The same admonition is often repeated with him, behold, to the Lorde thy God belongeth the heaven, the earth, and whatsoever things are in it: and hee hath pleased himselfe onely in your Fathers, and hath loved them, and hath chosen you their seede. Again in another place sanctification is commanded them, because they are chosen to bee a peculiar people. And again in another place, Louse is affirmed to bee the cause of protection which also the faithfull do declare with one voice, saying: He hath chosen vs our inheritance, the glory of Jacob, whom he hath loved. For they doe impute to free love all the gifts where with they were garnished of God: not only because they knew that they themselves had obtained them by no deserving, but also that euen the holy Patriarch was not endued with such vertue, that he could purchase to himselfe and his posteritie go great a prerogative of honor. And the more strongly to tread downe at pride, he vppbraided them, they have deferred so much thing, forasmuch as they are a stubborn and hard-necked people. And oftentimes the Prophets doe hatefully and as by way of reproche cast the lewes in the teeth with this election, because they had soeLOW departed from it. Whatsoever it be, now let the come forth which will bind the election of God either to the worthines of men, or to the merits of worke. When they see one nation to be preferred before another, & when they heare that God was led with no respect to be more favourably bent to a few & vnoble, yea & froward & disobedient men: will they quarrel with him, because his will was to shewe such an example of mercy? But they shall neither with their prating voices hin-hinder his work, nor with throwing stones of tauntes into heaven, shall hit or hurt his righteousness, but rather they fall backe upon their owne heads. Moreover the Israelites are called backe to this principle of the free covenants, when either thanks are to be given to God, or their hope to be raised vp against the time to come. He made vs, & not ourselves the Prophets his people, & the sheepe of his pastures. The derogation is not superfluous, which is added to exclude vs, that they may knowe that of all the good things wherewith they excell, God is not onely the author, but fetched the cause thereof from himselfe, because there was nothing in them worthie of so great honor. Alfo he biddeth them to be contented with the meeke good pleasure of God; in these words. The seede of Abraham are his felauantes: the children of Jacob his elect. And after he hath rehearsed the continuall benefits of God as fruits of the election, at length he concluded, that he dealt so liberally because he remembred his covenants. With which doctrine agreeth the song of the whole Church, Thy right hande, and the light of thy countraine gave the land to our Fathers, because thou wast pleased in them. But it is to be noted, that where mention is made of the land, it is a visible signe of the secret seuering wherein the adoption is contained. To the same thankfulnessesse David in another place shorteth the people, saying, Blessed is the nation whose God the Lord is, the people which he hath chosen for an inheritance to himselfe. And Samuel encourageth them to good hope, saying, The Lorde will not forsake you, for his owne great names sake, because it pleased him to create you for a people to himselfe. Likewise David when his faith is affailed, armeth himselfe to fight, saying, Blessed is he whom thou hast chosen, he shall dwell in thy courtes. But forasmuch as the election hidden in God was established as well by the first deliverance as by the second, and other meane benefits: in say the word of Election is transferred to this; God shall have mercie on Jacob, and he shall yet choose out of Israel, because he signifying the time to come, faith that the gathering together of the remnant of the people which he seemed to have forsaken, shall be a signe of the stable and steadfast election, which once seemed to have bene fallen away. When also it is said in another place, I have chosen thee & have not cast thee away; he seteth out the continual course of the notable liberaltie of his fatherly good wil. And yet more plainly the Angel faith in Zacharie, God shall yet choose Ierusalem: as though in hardly chastling it, he had receiued it; or as though the exile were an interrupting of the election: which yet remaineth inviolable, although the signes thereof do not alway appeare.

6. There is to be added a second degree more narrowly restrained, or in which was seen a more speciall grace of God; when of the same kinred of Abraham, God refused some, & other som by nourishing them in the church he shewed that he retained among his children. Israel had at the beginning obtained egall degree with his brother Isaac, because the spirituall covenant had beene no lesse sealed in him by the signe of Circumcision. He is cut off, and then Esau at the last an innumerable multitude and almost Israel. In Isaac was the seede called: the same calling endured in Isaac. A like exaemple God shewed in reiecting Sack, which thing is also gloriously set forth.
Of the maner how to receiue

in the Psalm, he hath put backe the tribe of Israel, & the tribe of Ephraim, he hath not chosen, but he hath chosen the tribe of Juda. Which the holy historic diverse times repeateth, that the wonderfull secret of the grace may the better appeare in this change. As, that Israel, Esau, and such other, (to grant) fell from the adoption by their own fault & guiltiness; because there was a condition adjoint, that they should faithfully keep the covenant of God, which they falsely brake. But this was yet a singular benefit of God, that he vouchsafed to preferre them above the other Gentiles: as it is said in the Psalm, he hath not so done to other nations, nor hath opened his judgements to them. But here I hate not without cause said that there be two degrees to be noted: because now in the choosing of the whole nation God showed he is in his own measure liberalitie bound to no lawes: but he is free, so that equal portion of grace is not to be required at his hand: the unequalitie whereof the weth that it is truely of free gift. Therefore Malachi amplifieth the thankfulness of Israel, because they beeing not onelie chosen out of all mankinde, but also seuered out of a holy house to be a peculiar people, doeth not onely and wickedly despise God for beneficially a Father. Was not Esau the brother of Jacob? (faith he) and yet Jacob I loued, but Esau I hated. For God taketh it for confessed, that when either of them was borne of a holy Father, and fuccesflour of the covenant, finally a branch of the holy roote: nowe the children of Jacob were more than commonly bond, which were taken into that dignitie. But when Esau the first begotten being refuse, their Father which was by nature inferior was made the heire, hee pro- ueth them doubly vnhankfull, and complaineth that they were not holden with that double bond.

7 Although it be already sufficiently evident, that God doth by his secret counsell freely choose whom he will, rejecting other, yet his free election is hitherto but halfe shewed, till we come to all particular persons, to whom God not onely offereth salvation, but doth assigne it, that the certaintie of the effect thereof is not in suspence or doubtfull. For, these are accounted in that onely seede, whereof Paul maketh mention. For although the adoption was left in the hand of Abraham, yet because manie of his posteritie were cut off as rotten members: that the election maie be effectuall and truely steadfast, we must needs ascend to the head, in whom the heauenlie Father hath bound together his elect one with another, and hath knit them to himselfe with a knot impossible to be loosed. So in the adoption of the children of Abraham, shined the liberal favour of God, which he denied to other men: yet in the members of Christ, appeareth a much more excellent strength of grace, because they being grafted into their seed do never fail away from salvation. Therefore Paul doth fully reason out of the place of Malachi, which I even now alleged: that where God with making a covenant of eternall life calleth any people to himselfe, there is in part a speciall manner of election, that he doth not choose all effectuall with common grace. Whereas it is said, I have loued Jacob, this pertaineth to the whole issue of the Patriarch, which the Prophet there setteth in comparison against the posteritie of Esau. Yet this with standeth not, but why in the person of one man was set foorth to vs an example of the election, which cannot slippe away, but mu must come to the mark that it tendeth to. These Paul doth not vainly note to be called remnant; because experience teacheth that of a great multitude many slip and vanish away, so that oftentimes thee remaineth but a small portion. But why the general election of a people is not alway firm and sted-fast, there is a reason offering it selfe in readiness; because with whom God covenant he doth not by and by give to them the spirit of regeneration by the power whereof they may continue in the covenant to the end; but the outward changing without the inward effectualness of grace, which might be of force to holde them in, is a certaine meanes thing betwixt the forsaking of whole mankind, and the election of a small number of the godly. The whole people of Israel was called the inheritance of God, of whom yet there were many strangers. But because God had not for nothing made covenant with them that he would be their father and redeemer, he rather hath respect to his owne free favour than to the unfaithfull falling away of many: by whom his truth was not abolished because where he referred any remnant, it appeared that his calling was without repentance.
For whereas God did from time to time choose vnto himselfe a Church rather out of the children of Abraham, than out of the prophane nations, hee had regard to his covenant, which being broken of the whole multitude he restrained to a fewe, that it should not utterly fall away. Finally the common adoption of the seed of Abraham was a certain visible image of a greater benefite, which God hath vouchsafed to graunt to fewe out of many.
This is the reason why Paul so diligently putteth difference betwixt his child-rend Abraham according to the flesh, & his spiritual children which were calced after the example of Isaac. Not that it was a vaine and vnfruitfull thing simply to be the child of Abraham (which might not be said without dishonour of the covenant) but because the unchangeable counsell of God, whereby he hath predestinate whome he would, is by it selfe effectually onely to this latter vorte vnto salvation. But I warne the readers that they bring not a foreconceived judgement on either side, till it appeare by the places of scripture brought forth what is to bee thought. That therefore which the Scripture clearly sheweth, we say by eternal and unchangeable counsell hath once appointed him in time to come he would take to salvation, and on the other side whome he would condemne to destruction.
This counsell as touching the elect, we say to bee grounded vpon his free mercie without any respect of the worthinesse of man, but whome he ap-poineth to damnation, to them by his just in deed and irreprehensible, but also incomprehensible judgement, the entry of life is foreclosed. Now in the elect we set vocation, to be the testimony of election and the justification to be an other signe of the manifest shewing of it, till they come to glorifie wherein is the fulfilling of it. But as by vocation and election God maketh his elect: so by shewing out the reprobate either from the knowledge of his name or from the sanctification of his spirit, he doth as it were by these marks open what judgement abideth for them. I will here passe over many sained inuentions, which foolish men have forged to overthrow predestination. For they need no confutation, which so soon as they are brought forth, do largly bewraie their owne fallenesse. I will tary onely vpon those, which either are in controversie among the learned, or which may bring any hardneffe to the simple, or which ungodlinessse with faire seeming they pretendeth, to scoffe at the righteousnesse of God.

The xxii. Chapter.

A confirmation of this doctrine by testimonies of the Scripture.

All these things which we have set are not without controversie among many, specially the free election of the faithful: which yet can not bee weakened. For the common sorte doe thinke that GOD, as hee foresaw that everie mans desiring shall bee, doth make a difference betwixt men: that therefore whome he doth forke, that they shall be not unworthy of his grace, them he adopteth into place of children: and whose nature he episteth that they will bee bent to wickednesse and ungodlinessse, them he appointeth to the damnation of death. So by cloaking it with the veile of foreknowledge they do not onely darken election, but faigne that it hath beginning from elsewhere. And this opinion receivèd of the common sort is not the opinion of the common sort alone: for in all ages it hath had great maintainers. Which I doe plainly confesse to the entent that no man shoulde trust that it shall much hurt our cause if their names be objected against vs. For, the truth of GOD herein is more certaine, that it may bee shaken more cleare, than that it may be darkerened with the authoritie of men. But some other neither exercised in the scripture, nor worthy of any voice, doe raise at this doctrine with greater malignitie, than that their forward pride ought to be suffered, because God choosing some, after his owne will, leaueth other same, they picke a quarrel against him. But if the thing it selfe be knoune for true, what shall they preuaile with brawling against God: We teach nothing but that which is approved by experience, that it was alway at libertie for GOD, to bestow his grace to whom hee will. I will not enquire whereby the posteritie of Abraham excelled others, but by that vouchsafing, whereof there is founde no cause elsewhere, than in GOD. Lette them answer why they bee men rather than oxen or Asse. When it was in the bande of God to make them dogges, he fashioned them after his owne image. Will they giue leace to brute beasts to quarrell with god for their estate as though the difference were vnrighteous? Truly it is no more righteous, that they should enjoy the prerogative which they have obtained by no desertings, than for God diuerse to deale abroad his benefites according to the measure of his owne judgement. If they skip over persons, where the inequalitye is more hateful to them, at the least at the example of Christ, they ought to be afraid to prate so boldly of so high a mystery. He is conceived of the seed of David, a mortal man by what vertues will they say that hee refraced to be in the very wombe made the head of Angelles, the only begotten sonne of God, the image and glorie of the Father, the light, righteousnessse, and saluation of the world? This thing Augustine wisely noted, that in the very head of the Church is a most cleare mirror of free election, least it should trouble vs. in the members: and that hee was not by righteously living, made the sonne of

of God; but he had so great honour freely given him; that he might afterwarde make other partakers of his gifts. Here is any man ask why other. were not the same that he was, or why all we are so farre distant from him?
why al we be corrupt & he purenes? such a man shall bewray not only his madneffe, but therewith all also his shamelesnesse. But if they go forward to labor take from God the free power to chose & refuse, let them also take away that which is given to Christ. Now it is worth the trasile to consider what the scripture pronounceth of every one. Paul verily, when he teacheth that we were chosen in Christ, taketh away all respect of our owne worthinesse.
For it is all one as if he had said: because in the whole seede of Adam the heavenly father found nothing worthie of his election, he turned his eyes unto his Christ, to choose it were members out of his body them whom he would take into the fellowship of life. Let this reason then be of force among the faithful, that we were therefore adopted in Christe into the heaually inheritance, because in our selves we were not able to receive so great excellencie. Which also he touched in another place, when he exhorteth y Colossians to using of thanks, for this that they were by God made fit to be partakers of the estate of the holy. If election go before this grace of God that we be made fit to obtaine the glorie of the life to come: what shall God himself now finde in vs whereby he may be moved to elect vs? My meaning shall yet be more openly, expressed by another saying of his. He hath chosen vs (faith he) are the foundations of the world were laid, according to a good pleasure of his will, that we might be holy, and unspotted, and unreprouable in his sight: where he setteth the good pleasure of God against all our deternings whatsoever they be.

2. That the proffe may be more strong it is worth the labour to note that the partes of that place, which being coupled together do leave no doubt.
Where he nameth the elect, it is no doubt that he speaketh to the faithful, as he also by and by afterward affirmeth. Wherefore they doe with too sole a glosse abuse that name, which wrote it to the age wherein the gosspell was first published. Where he faith that they were elect before the beginning of the world, he taketh away all respect of worthinesse. For what reason of difference is there betweene them which yet were not, and those which afterward should in Adam be equal? Now if they be elect in Christ, it reflecteth that not only every manis seuered without himselfe, but also one of them from another, forasmuch as we see that not al the members of Christe. That which is added, that they were elect that they might be holy, plainly con-forteth the error which deriveth election from foreknowledge, forasmuch as Paul cryeth out against it, and saith that whatsoever vertue appeareth in men, it is the effect of election. Now if a higher cause be sought, Paul anc-swereth, that God hath so predestinate, yea and that according to the good pleasure of his will. In which words he overthroweth whatsoever meane-of their election men do imagine in them selves. For he also teacheth that whatsoever things God giueth toward spiritual life, they flowe out of this one fountaine, because God hath chosen whom he would: and ere they were borne he had seuerally laide vp for them the grace which he vouchsaf-ued to giue them.

3 But wherefore this pleasure of God reigneth, there no workes come to be considered. He doth not here in deede pursue the comparison of contraries, but it is to be understand such as he himselfe declareth. Hee hath called vs (saith he) with a holy calling, not according to our workes, but according to his purpose and the grace which is gien of Christ before the times of the world. And we have already theweth that al doubt is taken away in this which followeth, that we might be holy and vnspotted. For if thou say, because he foresawe that we should be holy, therefore hee chose vs, thou shalt pervert the order of Paul. Thus therefore thou must safely gather, If hee chose vs, we might be holy; then hee chose vs, not because he foresawe we would be such. For these two things are contrarie the one to the other; that the godly haue it of election that they be holy, and that they come to it by meanes of workes. Neither is their caulation here any thing worth to which they commonly fleethe, that the Lord doth not render the grace of election to any workes going before, but yet graunteeth it to workes to come. For when it is said that the faithfull were chosen, that they might be holy; therewithall is signified that the holinessse which was to come in them tooke beginning at election. And how shall this saying agree together, that those things which are derived from election gaue caufe to election? The same thing which he said he semeth afterward to confirm more strongly, where he faith, According to the purpose of his will which he had purposed in him selfe. For, to say that God purposed in himselfe, is as much in effect as if it had bene said, that without himselfe he considered nothing whereof hee had any regard in decreeing. Therefore he by and by addeth, the whole summe of our election tendeth to this end, we should be to the praise of the grace of God. Truly the grace of God decreueth not to be praised alone in our election, vnlesse our election be free. But free it shall not be, if God in electing his, do consider what shalbe the works of euery one. Therfore we find that that which Christ saide to his discipless, hath place vniuersally among all the faithfull, Ye haue not chosen me, but I haue chosen you. Where hee not onely exclueth deseruings past, but also signifieth that they had nothing in themselves why they should be chosen, if hee had not prouen them with his mercie. Like as this saying of Paul is al also to be understande: Who first gave to him, & shall receive recompence? For he meaneth to shewe that ye goodness of God so proueneth men, that it findeth nothing in them neyther past nor to come, whereby he may be wonne to be favourable to them.

4 Now to the Romans, where he testeth this question further off, and followeth it more largely, he denieth that all they are Israelites, which are issued of Israel; because although by right of inheritance they were all blessed, yet the succession did not egally passe to them all. The beginning of this disputation proceeded of the pride & deceitful glorying of the Jewish people. For when they claimed to themselves the name of the Church, they would haue the credit of the Gospel to hang upon their will: as the Papistes at this day would gladly with this faine colour thrust themselves into the place of God. Paul, although he granteth the offspring of Abraham is holy by reason of the covenant, yet affirmeth ye the most part of them are strangers in it: & ye not only because they swarue out of kind, so that of lawfull children they they become bastards, but because the especial election of God standeth above and remaineth in the highest top, which alone maketh the adoption thereof sure: if their own godliness established some in the hope of salvation, and their own falling away alone differed it other some: Paul verily should both fondly and unconvincingly lift up the readers even to the secret election. Now if the will of God (the cause whereof neither appeareth nor is to be fought, without himself) maketh the one sort differing from the other, so that not all the children of Israel be true Israelites, it is vainly fained that euerie mans estate hath beginning in himself. Then hee further followeth the matter under the example of Jacob & Esau. For when they both were the sonnes of Abraham, both together enclosed in one mothers wombe, it was a mōste like change: that the honour of first birth was removed to Jacob, by which change Paul affirmeth that there was testified the election of one, and the reprobation of the other. The originall and cause of it is enquired, which the teachers of foreknowledge will have to be set out in the vertues, & vices of men. For this is an easy short way with them, that God shewed in the person of Jacob, that hee chooseth the worthy of his grace: and in the person of Esau, he refuseth them whom he foresaeth to be vnworthy. Thus they say boldly. But what faith Paul? when they were not yet born, and had not done any good or euill, that according to election the purpose of God might abide, not of works, but of him that calleth, it is said: The elder shall serue the yonger: as it is written, Jacob I haue loued, but Esau I haue hated. If foreknowledge were of any force in this difference of the brethren, then verily mention were vnsittlie made of the time. Let vs graunt that Jacob was chosen, because he had worthines gotten by works to come: to what purpose should Paul say that he was not yet borne? And this now should be vndaeledlic added, that he had yet done no good: because this shall bee readie answere, that nothing is hidden from God, & that so the godlines of Jacob was present before him. If works do win grace, they shoulde then worthily haue had their price before that Jacob was borne as he had been growe to full age. But the Apostle goeth forward in vndeing this knot, and teacheth that the adoption of Jacob was not made of works, but of the calling of God. In workes he enterlacet not the time to come or time past: & then he directlly setteth them against the calling of God, meaning by establishing of the one expressly to overthrow the other: as if he had said that it is to be considered what hath pleased God, not what men haue brought of themselves. Last of all it is certain that by the words of election and Purpose, all causes whatsoever men are wont to faine elsewhere than in the secrete counsell of God, are quite removed from this matter.

5 What colour will they bring to darken these things, who in election assigne some place to workes either past or to come? For this is vterlie to mōcke out that which the Apostle affirmeth, that the difference of the brethren hangeth not upon any consideration of workes, but upon the meere calling of God, because it was put betweene them when they were not yet born. Neither had he beene ignorant of this their suttletic, if it had had any foundnes in it: but because he very well knew, God can foresee no goodnes in man, but which he hath first determined by the benefit of his election to give give him; hee fleeth not to that vnorderlie order, to set good works before the cause of them selves. Thus haue we by the wordes of the Apostke, that the salvation of the faithfull is founded vpon the will of the only election of God: and that the same favour is not gotten by works, but commeth of free calling. We haue also as it were an image of that thing set before vs, Esau & Jacob are brethren, issuing both of the same parentes, enclosed yet both in one wombe, not yet brought out into the worlde. In them all thinges are egall yet of them the judgement of God is divers. For he taketh the one & forsaiketh the other. There was nothing but the onelie first birth, by right wherof the one excelled the other. But this also being passed over, thing is given to the yonger which is denied in the elder. Yea, and in other alio God seemeth alway as of let purpose to haue depisefirst birth, to cut off from the flesh all matter of glorying. Refusing Ismael, he cast his minde to Isaac. Plucking backe Manasse, he more honoured Ephraim.

Rom. 9:11.

6. If any man interrupt me with saying that wee must not by these inferiour & small benefites determine of the summe of the life to come; that he which hath bin advanced to the honor of first birth, should therefore be reckoned to bee adopted into the inheritance of heaven: (for there bee some which spare not Paul himself, as though in alleging these testimonies hee had wriuen the scripture to a strange sense:) I anwere as I haue done herebefore, y the apostle neither slipped by vnauisednes, nor willfullie abused y testimonies of the scripture. But he saw (which they can not abide to consider) y God minded by an earthly signe to declare the spirituall election of Jacob, which otherwise was hidden in his inaccessible throne. For vnlesse we refer the first birth graunted to him vnto the world to come, it should be a vaine & fond forme of blessing whereby he obtained nothing but manifolde miseries, discomfortes griefesfull punishment, and many bitterness of sorrow and cares. Therefore when Paul saw without doubting, that God by outward blessing testified the blessing which he had in his kingdom prepared spirittuall and never decaying for his servant: he doubted not for proofs of this spirittuall blessing, to fetch an argument from that outward blessing. This also we must remember that to the land of Canaan was adioyned the pledge of the heavenlie dwelling; so that it ought not at all to be doubted that Jacob was graffed with the Angels into the body of Christ, that he might bee partaker of the same life. Jacob therefore is chosen, when Esau is rejected and by the predestination of God is made different from him from whom he differed not in any defeuings, If you ask a cause, the apostle rendreth this, because it is said to Moses, I will haue mercie vpon whom I will haue mercie, and I will vouchsafe to graunt mercie to whom soeuer I will vouchsafe to graunt mercy. And what I befeech you meaneth this? Verily, the Lorde himselfe most plainlie pronounceth that he haue in these elues no cause why he should do good to them, but he fetcheth the cause from his owne mercie only: & therefore y the salvation of his is his owne worke. When God setteth thy salvation in him selfe alone, why wilt thou desceend to thy selfe? When he appointeth to thee his mercie alone, why wilt thou runne to thine owne defeuings? When he holdeth thy thought wholly in his mercefulnes alone, why wilt thou turne part to the beholding of thine owne worke? Therefore.
we must needs come to that lesser people, which Paul in an other place said to have beene foreknowen to God: nor in such sort as these men imagine, to foreknowe out of an idle watchtoure the things that hee worketh not: but in such fense as it is oft read. For truly when Peter faith in Luke, that Christ was by the determined couiel & foreknowledge of God appointed to death: he doth not bring God as a looker on but the author of our salvation. So the same Peter also, where he sayth that the faithful to whom he wrote were chosen according to the foreknowledge of GOD, properly expresseth that secret Predestination whereby God hath marked for his children whom he would. And ¥ word Purpose, which he joyneth for a divers word, expressing all one thing, forasmuch as it doth every where significit a fixed determination as they commonly call it, undoubtedly teacheth that God when he is author of our salvation goeth out of himself. In which sense he sayth in the same Chapter that Christ was the Lamb foreknowen before the creation of the world. For what is more fonde or trifling, than to say that God from on high did (and looking whence salvation should come to mankind) Therefore in Paul the foreknowen people is as much as a fmal portion mingled with the multitude which falsely pretendeth ¥ name of God: In another place also Paul to beate down their boasting which being but couered with a visor, do take upon themselves the chief preeminence among the godly before the world, faith that God knoweth who be his. Finally by that saying Paul pointeth vnto vs two sorts of people: the one, of the whole kinred of Abraham: the other, severally chosen out of it, and which being laid vp vnder the eyes of God, is hidden from the sight of men. And it is no doubt that he tooke this out of Moses, which affirmeth ¥ God will be mercifull to whom he wil (although hee spake of the elect people, whose estate in outward seeming was equal) as if he should have said, ¥ in the common adoption is included with him a speciall grace toward some, as it were a more holy treasure: and that the common covenant with standeth not but that the samesmall number may be exempt in degree: and he willing to make himselfe the free disposer and ruler of this thing, precisely denieth that he will be mercifull to one rather than to an other, for any other reason but for that it so pleaseth him: because when mercy cometh to him, that seeker it, though hee in deed suffer not a denial, yet he either preuenteth or partly geteth to himselfe the favour whereof God claimeth to himselfe the prayse.

7 Now let the soueriegne Judge & master pronounce of the whole matter. When he saw so great hardnes in his hearers, that he did in a manner waft his wordes without fruit among the multitude: to remedy this offence, hee cryeth out, Whatsoever my Father giueth me, it shall come to me. For this is the will of my Father, that whatsoever my Father hath giuen me, I shall not loose any thing of it. Note that the beginning is taken at the Fathers gift, that we may be deliverd into the faithfull keeping and defence of Christ. Here some man peraduenture will turne a circle about, and will take exception, saying that they onely are accounted in the proper possession of the Father, whose yeelding hath beene voluntarie by faith. But Christ standeth onely upon that point, that although the fallinges away of great multitudes doe make the whole world, yet the counsell of GOD shalbe stedfast in the

Stand faster than the heavens themselves, that his election may never fail. They are said to have been the elect of the Father, before that he gave to them his only begotten Sonne. They ask whether it were by nature: yea rather, them which were strangers he made his owne by drawing them to him. There is a greater clearenesse in the words of Christ than can by shifting be couered with any darknesse. No man (faith he) can come to mee, vnlesse my Father drawe him. But who so hath heard and learned of my Father, he commeth to mee. If all genera without difference shoulde bow their knee before Christ, then the election were common: but nowe in the feenesse of the beleeuers appeareth a manifest diuersitie. Therefore after that Christ had affirmed that the disciples which were given him, were the peculiar possesio of God the Father, within a little after he added, I pray not for the world; but for those who thou hast given me, because they are thine. Wherby it is proved that the whole world belongeth not to the Creator of it, sauing that grace deliuereth a few from the wrath of God, and from eternal death, which otherwise should have perished: but the world it selfe is left in his owne destruction to which it was appointed. In the mean etime although Christ put himselfe meane betweene, yet he claimeth to himselfe the power of choosing in common with the Father. I speake not (faith he) of all: I know whom I have chosen. If any man asketh from whence he hath chosen them, he answereth in an other place, Out of the world, which he excludeth out of his prayers when he commendeth his discipels to his Father. This is to be holde, that when he affirmeth he knoweth who he hath chosen, there is signified some speciall force in the generall kindes of men: then, that the same speciall force is made to differ not by the qualitie of their owne vertues, but by the heavenlyl decree. Whereupon followeth that many excell by their owne force or diligence, when Christc maketh himselfe the author of election. For when in another place he reckonneth Indas among the electe, whereas he was a deuell, this is referred onely to the office of apostle Philippe which although it be a cleare mirour of the favour of God (as Paul so oftentimes acknowledgeth in his owne person,) yet it containeth not in it selfe the hope of eternall salvation. Indas therefore, when he did vunfaithfully beare the office of an Apostle, might bee worse than the deuell; but of those whom Christ hath once graffed into his body, he will suffer none to perish: because in preferring their salvation he will performe that which he hath promised, that is, he will stretch forth the power of God which is greater than all. For whereas he saith in an other place, Father, of those whom thou hast given mee, I haue lost none but the sonne of perdition: although it be an abusive speche by figure, yet it hath no doubftfull meaning. The summe is that God maketh them his children by free adoption whom he will haue to be his children: and that the inward cause thereof is in himselfe: because he is content with his owne secreete good pleasure.

But Ambrose, Origene, and Hierome thought that GOD distributeth his grace among men, as he foreseeth that euerie man will use it well: Yea and Augustine was once in the same opinion. But when he had better profited in knowledge of the Scripture, hee not onely revoket it as evidentlly false, false, but also strongly confuted it: yea, and after his reauoking of it, in reproving the Pelagians for that they continued in the same error, saith: Who cannot maruel that the Apostole knewe not this most subtle fene? For when he had set out a thing to be wondered at of these brethren, while they were not yet borne, and afterward objected a question against himselfe, saying: what then? Is there vnjuice with God? Here was fit place for him to anfwere, that God forfaue the merites of them both: yet he faith not this, but flyeth to the judgements and mericie of God. And in another place, when he had taken away all merites before election, Here (faith hee) is confuted their vaine reasoning which defend the foreknowledge of God against the grace of God: & therefore faie that wee are chosen before the making of the world because God foreknewe that we would be good, not that he himselfe would make vs good. He faith not this, which faith, ye haue not chosen mee, but I haue chosen you. For if he had therefore chosen vs, because hee foreknewe that we would be good: hee should therewithall also haue foreknowne why we would choose him: and so forth as followeth to that effect. Let the testimo die of Augustine be of force among them that willingly rest in the author itie of the Fathers. Howbeit, Augustine suffreth not himselfe to bee seuered from the rest: but by clere testimonies sheweth that this disagreement is fallse with the malice whereof the Pelagians burdened him. For in the xix.

Chapter of his booke of the predestination of Saints, he allegerth out of Am brofe, Christ calleth whom he hath mercy on, Againe, if he had willed, of the vndequo he might haue made devoue. But God calleth whom he vouchfa ueth, & whom he wil he maketh religious. If I list to knit together a whole volume out of Augustine, I could redily shewe to the readers that I neede no other words but his:But I wil not load them with rediousnes. But go to, let vs imagine that they speake not at all: but let vs giue heede to the matter it selfe. A hard question was moued, whether God did righteously in this that he vouchfaued to grant his grace but to some: Of which question Paul might haue vncombed himselfe with one word if he had alledged his respect of works. Why therefore doth he it not, but rather continueth on a discourse which abideth in the same hardnes? Why, but because he ought not? For the Holy ghost which spake by his mouth, had not the disease of forgetfulness, Therefore without any circumstances he anfwereth, that God therefore fa ouereth his elect, because he wil therefore hath mercie, because he wil. For this Oracle of God, I wil haue mercie vpon whom I wil haue mercie, and I will shew mercie to whom I will shew mercie, is as much in effet as if it had bin said, that God is moued to mercie by no other reafon but because hee will haue mercie. Therefore this saying of Augustine remaineth true, that the grace of God doth not find men fit to be choen, but maketh them.

9 Neither do we any thing passe vpon the suttiletie of Thomas, that the foreknowing of defereuings, is not in deede the caufe of Predeftination on the behalfe of the act of him that doeth predeftinate, but on our behalfe it may after a certaine manner bee so called, that is, according to the partic ular weting of Predeftination: as when it is faide that God predeftinate teth glorie to man by defereuings, because hee hath decreed to giue to him grace by which hee may deferue glorie. For fith the Lorde will in election have us to looke vnto nothing but his meere goodnesse, if any man shall con-tuer here to see any more, it shalbee a wrongfull greedinesse . If wee lufted to strive in suttlicetie, wee want not wherewith to beate backe this silly suttletic of Thomas. Hee affirmeth that to the elect glorie is after a certaine manner predestinate by desieruinges, because the Lorde doeth after a certaine manner predestinate to them the grace, by which they may deserue glorie. What if I answere on the contrarie side and saye that predestina-tion vnto grace, serveth election vnto life, and is as it were a waiting maide after it?that grace is predestinate to them, to whom the possession of glorie hath beene long agoe appointed: because it pleaseth the Lorde to bring his children from election into iustification? For thereupon it shal follow that the predestination of glorie was rather the cause of the Predestination of grace, than contrariwise. But away with these strivings as things superfluous for such as shal thinke that there is wisedom enough for them in the worde of God. For this was in olde time truely written of an Ecclesiastical writer, that they which assigne the election of God to merites are more wise than they ought to be.

Some doe object that God shoulde bee contrarie to himselfe if hee shoulde unuerfully call all men to him, and receive but a fewe elect. So by their opinion the unuerfalnesse of the promise taketh away the difference of special grace. And thus certaine sober men speake, not so much to oppre-sse the truth, as to debarre crabbed questions, and to bridle the curiosity of many. Their will is praiseworthy, but their counsell is not to be allowed: because dallying by shifting is never excusable. But their objecting of it which do more raiingly inueigh against it, is verily too fonde a cauilla-tion, or too shameful an error. How the scripture maketh these two to agree together, that by outward preaching all men are called to Repentance and faith, and yet not to all men is gien the Spirit of Repentance and faith, I have in another place alreadie declared, and by & by some what of it must be repeated againe. Now that which they require I denie to them, sith it is two ways faile. For the threateneth that while it raineth vpoun one cittie, there shall be drought upon another: Hee that pronounceth that there shall in another place be famine of doctrine, bindeth not himself with a certaine lawe to call all men equallie. And hee which forbidding Paul to speake in Asia, and turning him from Bithinia draweth him into Macedonia, sheweth that it is in his owne power to distribute this treasure to whomsoever it shall please him. Yet more plainly hee sheweth by Esay, how he peculiarly directeth to the elect the promises of salvation: for hee layeth of them onely, and not of all mankind indifferently, that they shalbe his Disciples.
Whereby it is certaine that the doctrine of salvation is wrongfully set open in common to all men to profite effectuallie, which is saide to bee severally layde vp onely for the children of the Church. Let this suffice at this present, that although the voyce of the Gospell speake generally to all, yet the gifte of faith is rare. Esay assigneth the cause, for that the arme of the Lorde is not open to all men. If hee had saide that the Gospel is maliciously and frowardly despised, because many doe stubbornely refuse to heare: peradventure this colour touching vnuerfall calling shoulde preuaile. Neither is it the purpose of the Prophet to diminish the fault of men, who he teacheth that the fountain of blindness is, that God vouchsafeth not to open his arme to them: onelie he giueth warning, that because faith is a singular gift, the cares are beaten in vaine with outward doctrine. But I would myself know of these doctors, whether onely preaching, or faith, make the children of God. Certainly when it is said in the first chapter of John, Whosoever believe in the only begotten Sonne of God, are themselves also made the chil. John 1, 12. dren of God, there is not in that place a confused heap jumbled vp together: but a speciall order is giuen to the faithfull, which are borne not of bloude, not of the will of the fleshe, not of the will of man, but of God. But (laye they) there is a mutuall content of faith with the worde, namely where clo- sure is faith. But it is no new thing that seede fall among thornes or in stony places: not onely because the greater part appeareth indeede obstinate against God, but also because not all men have eyes and cares. How then shal it agree that God calleth to him them who he knoweth will not come? Let Augustine answeare for me. Wilt thou dispute with me? Matuaile with me, & cry out. Of depth. Let vs both agree in feare, least we perish in error. Moreover if election (as Paul witnesse. h.) be the mother of faith, I turne backe the argument vpon their owne head, that faith is therefore not general, because election is special. For by the orderly hanging together of causes & effects, it is easilie gathered that where Paul faith, that we are full of all spiritual blessing, as God had choosen vs before the creation of the world; therefore these riches are not common to all, because God hath choesen only who he would. This is the reason why in another place he comendeth the faith of the elect, lest it should be thought that any man doth by his owne motion get faith to himselfe: but that this glorie mai externe with God, that they are freely enlightened of him, whom he had choosen before. For Bernarde sayth rightly, Friends doe severally heare, to whom he also faith, Fcare not thou small flocke: for to you it is giuen to know the mysterie of the kingdom of heaven. Who be these? even they whom he hath for known and predestinate to be fashioned like to the image of his Sonne. A great & secret counsell is made known. The Lorde knewe who be his: but that which was known to God is made manifest to men: neither doth he vouchsafe to make any other partakers of so great a mystery, but those selfe same men whom he hath for known and predestinate to be his. A litte after he conclueth. The mercy of God is from eternity euenger to eternitie vpon them, heare him: for eternitie, by reason of predestination to eternitie, by reason of blessed making: the one without beginning, the other without ending. But what need I to cite Bernarde for witnesse, when we heare of the masters owne mouth, that none doe see but they which are of God? By which words he signifieth, that all they which are not begotten againe of god, doe dasell at the brightesse of his countenance. And to election faith indeede is fitted ioyned, so that it keepe the second degree. Which order the worde of Christ do effectly express, in another place, This is the will of my Father, that I lose not y which he hath giuen. For this is his will, that who soever beleueth in the Sonne, shall not perish. If he would have all saueth, he would appoint ouer them his Sonne to be their keeper, and would graffe them all into his bodie: with the Cap. 22. Of the manner how to receive holy bond of faith. Nowe it is certaine that faith is a singular pledge of his fatherly love, laide vp for his children whom he hath adopted. Therefore Christ in another place faith that the sheep follow the shepheard, because they know his voice: but they followe not a stranger, because they knowe not the voice of strangers. Whence commeth this difference, but because their eares are bored by God? For no man make him selfe a sheppe: but hee is made one by the heavenly grace. For which cause also the Lorde teacheth that our fatafal shall alway be certaine and free from danger, because it is kept by the invincible power of God. Wherefore he concludeth that the unbleeueres are not of his sheppe: namely because they are not of the number of them, whom God hath promised by Esaie that they shall be his disciples. Nowe because in the testimonies which I haue alleaged is expressed perseverance, they doe there withall testifye the unmouable steadfastnesse of election.

11 Now let us speak of the reprobate, whom the Apostle ioyneth there together. For as Iacobs, having yet with good workes deserved nothing, is taken into grace: so Esaids, beeing yet desiled with no wicked doing, is hated. If we turne our eyes to workes, we do wrong to the Apostle, as though he sawe not the same thing which we cleerely see. It is prooved that he sawe it not, forasmuch as he expressly enforceth this pointe, that when they had not yet done any good or euill, they were chosen, and the other refused, to proove that the foundation of the predestination of GOD is not in workes. Againe when he moved the objection, whether God be vnrighteous, he allegeth not that which had ben the most certaine and plaine defense of his righteousnesse, namely that God reduced to Esaids according to his euilnesse: but he was content with another solution, that the reprobate are stirred vp to this ende, that the glory of God may be set forth by them. Last of all he adiouneth a concluding sentence, that God hath mercie vpon whom he will, and hardeneth whom he will. See you not how he impueth both to the onely will of God? Therefore if we can not declare a reason why he vouchsafteth to grant mercie to them that be his, but because it so pleaseth him: neither also shall we haue any other cause in reiecting of other, than his owne will. For when it is said that God hardeneth, or theweth mercie to whom he will, men are thereby warned to seek no cause else where than in his will.

The xxiii. Chapter.
A Confutation of the flanders whereon vth shoule nat doctrine hath alwaie beene wantonly burdened.

By when the witte of man heareth these things, the frowardnesse thereof cannot be restraine, but that by and by at the bloody blast of a true pet soulding to battaile, it diuerstly and excellently turmoileth. And many in descende, as though they would drive away the malice from GOD, doe so grant election, that they denne that any man is reprobate: but they do too ignorantly and childishly: forasmuch as election if felse could not stand unless it were set contradicte to reprobation: God is said to suer them whom he adopteth.

adopteth unto salvation: it should be more than foolishly said that other do either by chance or by their owne endeuer obtaine that which onely election giueth to a fewe. Therefore whom God passeth over, hee reiecteth: & for none other cause, but for that he will exclude them from the inheritance which he doth predestinate to his children. Neither is the waiward-nesse of men tolerable, if it suffer not it selfe to bee bridled with the worde of God, where the incomprehensible counsell of God is entretied of, which the Angels themselves doe worship, But wee haue alreadie heard, y hardening is no leffe in the hand & will of God than mercie. Neither doth Paul (as these men do that I haue spoken of) busily labor to excuse God with a lying defence: but only he teacheth that it is not lawfull for the thing formed to quarrel with him that formed it. Now who so doe not admit that any are rejected of God, how will they vncumber themselves from that saying of Christ, Every tree which my father hath not planted, shall be plucked vp by the roote. They plainly heare that all they are adiudged and auowed to destruction, whom the heavenly Father hath not vouchsafed to plant as holy trees in his grounde. If they deny this to be a signe of reprobation, then is there nothing so cleere y it may be proved to them. But if they cease not to wrangle, let the librie of sofistie be conteined with this admonition of Paul, that there is no cause to quarrel with God, if he willing on the one side to shew his wrath and to make his power knowne do with dumme sufferance, and leni-rie beare with the vessel of wrath prepared to destruction: & on the other side he make knowne the richeffe of his glorie toward the vessel of mercie which he hath prepared to glorie. Let the Readers marke, how Paul to cut off occasion from whisperings & backbitings, giueth the cheefe rule to the wrath & power of God: because it is vniall that those deepe judgements which swallow vp al our senses, should be made subiect to our determinatio. Our aduersaries aunswere is verie trifling, that God doth not vterly reiect them whom he suffereth in leniety, but abideth with a mind hanging in su-herence toward them, if peradventure they may repent. As though Paul giueth to God a patience, to look for their turning, whom he faith to be made to destruction. For Augustin faith rightly where he expoundeth this place, where power is ioyned to sufferance, God doth not suffer, but gouerne with his power. They further say also that it is not for nothing saide that the ves-sells of wrath are prepared to destruction: but, y God hath prepared the ves-sells of mercie: because by this meane he ascribith & chalengeth the praise of saluation to God, but the blame of destruction he catteth vppon them which by their owne will doe bring it vppon themselves. But although I graunt to them that Paul by the diuerse manner of speaking did sooften the roughnesse of the first parte of the sentence, yet is it not meete to affigne the preparing vnto destruction to any other thing than to the secreet coun-sell of God: which also is affirmed a little before in the rest of the text. That God stired vp Pharaoh: Then that hee hardeneth whom he will. Where-pon followeth that the hidden counsell of God is the cause of hardening. This at the leaft I get which Augustin sayeth, that when God of Wolues makest sheepe, hee doeth with a mightier grace reforme them, that their hardnes may be tamed: and therefore God for this cause doth not convert the

the obstinate, because he doth not shew forth in them the mightier grace, which he wanteth not if he would shew it forth.

2. These sayings in deed should be sufficient for the godly and sober, & them which remember themselves to be men. But forasmuch as these venomous dogges do cast vp not only one sort of venom against God, we will as the matter that suffer, answer to every one particularly. Foolish men do devise ways quarrell with God, as though they had him subject to their accusations. First therefore they ask, by what right the Lorde is angrie with his creatures, of whom he hath not ben first provoked by any offence: for to condemn to destruction whom he will, agreeeth rather with the wilfulness of a tyrant, than the lawful sentence of a judge. Therefore they say that there is cause why men should charge God, if by his bare will, without their own defearing, they be predestinate to eternall death. If such thoughts do at any time come into the mind of the godly, to break their violent assaults, they shall be sufficiently armed with this, although they had no more, if they consider howe great wickednesse it is, euen so much as to inquire of the causes of the will of God: for all things that are, is the cause, & worthily ought to be. For if it haue any cause, then somewhat must go before it, where to it must be as it were bounde: which it is unlawful once to imagine. For, the will of God is so the highest rule of righteousness, that whatsoever he willeth, euen for this that he willeth it, it ought to bee taken for righteousness. When therefore it is asked, why the Lord did it: it is to be understanded, because he willed it. But if thou goe further in asking why he willed it, thou askest some greater & higher thing than the will of God: which cannot be found. Let therefore the rashness of man restrain it selfe, & not seek it which is not, least peradventure it may not finde that which is. With this bridle (I say) he shall be well withholden who sauceth hee be that will dispute of the secrets of God with reference. As for the boldnesse of the wicked, which dare not openly to speake evil of God: against it the Lord with his own righteousness, without any our defence shall sufficiently defend himselfe, when he shall take all shifting from their consciences, and hold them fast convinced, and condemn them. Neither doe we yet thrust in the faine deuile of absolute power, which as it is prophane, so worthily ought to be abhorred of vs. We faine not God lawlesse, who is a lawe to himselfe: because (as Plato faith) men stand in neede of lawes, who are troubled with unlawful lustes: but the will of God is not onlye pure from all fault, but also is the highest rule of perfection, yea and the lawe of all lawes. But we deny that he is subject to yeld an account, we deny also that we are meatie judges, which would pronounce of this cause after our owne sense. Wherefore if we attempt further than we lawfully may, let that threatening of the Psalme bring vs in feare, that God (hal) overcome so oft as he is judged of anie mortall man.

3. So can God in keeping silence, put his enemies to silence. But, that we may not suffer them freely to scorn his holy name, he delivereth vs out of his worde weapons against them. Wherefore if any man assaile vs with such words: why God hath from the beginning predestinate some to death, which when they were not, could not yet deserve the judgement of death: we

we in stedde of aunswer be maie againe on our side aske of them, what they think: that God oweth to man, if he will judge him by his owne nature. In such fort as we be all corrupted with sinne, we cannot but be harenfull to god: and that not by tyrannous crueltie, but by most vpright reason of justice. If all they whom the Lorde doeth predestinate to death, are by the estate of nature subjicet to the judgement of death: of what vnniustice against themselves, I beeche you, may they complain? Let all the sonnes of Adam come: Let them strive and dispute with their creator, for that by his eternall providence they were before their generation condemned to everlafting miserie. What shall they bee able once to mutter against this defence, when God on the other side shall call them to recknowledging of themselves? If they be all taken out of a corrupt maffe, it is no arcuicile if they be subjicet to damnation. Let them not therefore accuse God of vniustice, if by his eternall judgement they be appointed to death, to which they themselves doe feele whether they will or no, that they are willingly led of their owne nature. Whereby appeareth how wrongfull is the desire of their murmuring, because they doe of set purpose hide the cause of damnation which they are compelled to acknowledge in themselves, that the laying of the blame vpon God may acquite the. But though I do a hundred times confess, as it is most true; god is the author of it, yet they do not by & by wipe away the gillines which being engraven in their confciencs from time with oft recours, presenteth itselfe to their eies.

4. Againe they except & say: were they not before predestinate by the ordinance of God to the same corruption which is nowe allledged for the cause of damnation? When therefore they perish in their corruption, they do nothing but suffer the punishment of that miserie into which by predestination Adam fell and drew his posteritie headlong with him. Is not he therefore vniust, which doth so cruelly mocke his creatures? I graunt indeed that all the children of Adam fell by the will of God into that miserie of estate wherein they be nowe bounde: and this is it that I saide at the beginning, that al length we must alway returne to the determination of the will of God, the cause whereof is hidden in himselfe. But if followeth not by and by that God is subjicet to this flander. For we will with Paul answere them in this manner. O man, what art thou that contends with God? doeth the thing formed say to him that formed it? Why haft thou formed me so? Hath not the poter power to make of the same lump one vessell to honor, and another to dishonor? They will say that the righteousnesse of God is so not truely defended, but that we seek a shiff, such as they are wont to have that want a just excuse. For what else seemeth here to be said, than that God hath a power which cannot be hindered from doing ane thing whatsoever it be as he will himselfe? But it is farre otherwise. For, what stronger reason can be brought than when wee are commanded to thinke what a one God is? For howe should he commit any vniustice, which is judge of the worlde? If it properly pertaine to the nature of God to doe judgement, then he naturally loueth righteousnesse, and abhorreth vniusticenesse. Wherefore the Apostle did not, as though he were overtaken, looke about for holes to hide him; but shewed that the reason of the righteousnesse of God is higher than than that either it is to be measured by the measure of man, or may be comprehended by the slender capacitie of the wit of man. The Apostle in deed confesseth that there is such depth in the judgements of God, wherewith the mindes of men should be swallowed, if they endeavoured to pearce into it. But he teacheth also how hainous wrong it is, to binde the works of God to such a lawe, that so soon as we understand not the reason of them, wee may be bole to disallow them. It is a knowne saying of Salomon (which yet fewe do rightly understand) The great creator of all rendred rewarde to the foole, and rewarde to transgressors. For he richeth out concerning the greatnes of God: in whose will it is to punish fooles and transgressors, although hee doth not vouchsafe to let them have his spirit. And monstrous is the madness of men, when they so couet to make that which is vnmeasurable, subject to the finall measure of their reason. The Angels which stooke still in their vpreightnesse, Paul calleth clect. If their steadfastnes was grounded vpon the good pleasure of God, the falling away of the other poueth that they were forsoaken: Of which thing there can no other cause be alleged than reprobation, which is hidden in the secret counsell of God.

5 Go to; let there now be present some Manichee, or Celestine, a flanderer of the providence of God: I say with Paul that there ought no reason to be rendered thereof: because with the greatnesse of it, it farre surmounteth our vnderstanding. What marueile? or what absurditie is it? Would he have the power of God so limited, that it may be able to work no more, than his mind is able to conceive? I say with Augustine, that they are created of the Lord, whom he without doute foreknewe that they shoulde goe into destruction: and that it was so done because he so willed: but why he willed, it is not our part to ask a reason of it, who cannot comprehend it: neither is it meete that the wil of God should come downe into controverfie among vs, of which so oft as mention is made, the name of it is named the highest rule of righteousnesse. Why therefore is any question moued of vnirighteousnesse where righteousnesse clearly appeareth? Neither let vs be ashamed, after the example of Paul, so to stop the mouthes of the wicked, and from time to time so oft as they shalbe bole to boke against it, to repeate this, Who be ye miserable men, that lay an accusation to Gods charge, and doe therefore lay it to his charge, because he doth not temper the greatnesse of his workes to your dulnesse? As though they were therefore wrongfull, because they are hidden from vs. The vnmeasurablenesse of the judgements of God is by cleare experiences knowe to you, Yee knowe that they are called the deepe bottomlesse depth. Now ask of the narrowe capacities of your wit, whether they comprehend that which God hath decreed with himselfe. What good doth it you therefore with mad searching to plunge your sences into the bottomlesse depth, which reason itself teacheth you that it shall be to your destruction? Why are ye not at the leaste restrained with some fear of which both the historie of Job and the books of the Prophets do report of the incomprehensible wisdom, and terrible power of God. If thy minde be vnquieted, let it not greeue thee to embrace the counsell of Augustine. Thou being a man lookest for an aunwreath at my hande: and I also am a man. Therefore let vs both heare him that saith: O man, O man, what art thou? Better is a faithful full ignorance than rash knowledge. Seekest methinks thou shalt finde nothing but paine. O depth, Peter deth, the Thee beleeueth. O depth: Seekest thou a reason? I will tremble at the depth. Reason thou, I will wonder, dispute thou, I will beleue; I see depth, but I reach not the bottom. Paul: fretted, because he found wondering. He calleth the judgementes of God vnsearchable: & art thou come to search them? He faith that his wayes are impossible to be traced out; and doest thou trace them? with proceeding further wee shall nothing profite: For neither we shall satisfye their way wanton curiousnesse, neither doeth the Lorde neede any other defence, than which he hath vnde by his spirit, which spake by the mouth of Paul: and we forget to speake well, when wee cease to speake with God.

6 Their other objection also ariseth out of vn godlinesse, which yet tendeth not so directly to the accruing of God as to the excuting of the sinner. Howbeit the sinner which is condemned of God cannot bee justified without dishonour of the judge. Thus therefore prophane tongues doe barke against God, saying: why should God impute those things for sinne to men, whereof he hath by his predestination layde necessitie vpon men? For, what should they do? Should they wrastle with his decrees? But so should they do, it in vaine, sith they cannot doe it at all. Therefore they are not rightfullie punished for those things, whereof the cheefe cause is in Gods predestination, Here I will absteine from that defence, whereunto the Ecclesiastical writers do commonly flee, namely that the foreknowledge of God with itathdeth not but that man may be accounted the sinner: because God foreseeth the euils of man, not his own. For so the cauallion would not stay here, but will rather preeffe vs further with saying that God might if hee had woulde, haue provided remedie for those euils which he foreknew; & that sith he hath not so done, he hath of determined purpose created men to that ende that he should so behaue himselfe in earth: and if by the prouidence of God, man was created to this conditio, that he should do all those things that he doth: then he is not to be blamed for that which he cannot avoid, and which he enterprised by the will of God. Therefore let vs see howe this knot ought to be well loofed. First of all this ought to bee holden curntaine among all men which Solomon faith, that God hath created all things for himselfe, and the wicked man to an euill day. Behold, when the despising of all things is in the hand of God, when in his power remaineth the rule of saetic and death: he so ordereth them by his counsel and beck, that among men there are borne some adjudged even from their mothers wombe to death, which with their destruction may glorify his name. If any man aunswere, that there is no necessity layde vpon them by the prouidence of God, but rather that hee created them in such estate, because he foresaw their peruerse no to come: he neither faith nothing at all, nor altogether. The old writers are wont in deed sometimes to use this solution: but as it were doutingly. But the schole men reft vpon it, as though nothing could be obieccted against it. In deede I will willingly graunt, that foreknowledge alone bringeth no necessity to creatures, although all men do not so agree: for there be some that will haue it also to be the cause of things. But it seemeth to me that Valla, a man other-otherwise not much practiced in holy writings, sawe both more deeply and more wisely, which shewed that this contention is superfluous: because both life and death are rather the doings of God than of his foreknowledges.

If God did but foresee the successes of men, and did not also dispose and order them by his will, then this question should not without cause be moved, whether his foreseeing any thing auidoed to the necessitie of them. But if he doth none otherwise foresee the things that shall come to passe, than because he hath decreed that they should come to passe; it vaine to move controversie about foreknowledges, where it is certaine that all things doe happen rather by ordinance and commandement.

7 They say that this is not written in express words, that it was decreed of God, that Adam shoulde perish by his falling away. As though the same God, whose the scripture reporteth to do whatsoever he will, created the noblest of all his creatures to an uncertaine end. They say he had freewill, lie might shape to himself his own fortune; and that God decreed nothing, but to handle him according to his deserving. Ifso colde a dense bee received, where should the Almighty be of God, whereby he governeth all things, according to his secrete counsell, which hangeth vpon non other thing than it selfe? But predestination, whether they will or no, sheweth him selfe in Adams posterity. For it came not to passe naturally that all men should loose salvation by the fault of one parent. What hindreth them to confesse of one man, that which against their wills they confesse of all mankind? For why should they loose their labour with dallying shifts? The scripture crieth out that all men were in the person of one man made bound to eternal death. Sith this cannot be imputed to nature, it is plain that it proceeded from the wondrous counsell of God. But it is too much absurdfic that these good Patrones of the righteounes of God doe so stumble at a straw, & leape over great beames. Agamma I ask: how came it to passe, the fall of Adam did wrap vp in eternall death so many nations with their chilren beeing infants without remedy, but because it so pleased God? Heere their tongues which are otherwise so prating, must of necessity be dumme.
It is a terrible decree, I grant; yet no man shall be able to deny, but that God foreknow what ende man should have, ere hee created him, and therefore foreknowe it because he had so ordained by his decree. If any man here in-weigh against the foreknowledge of God, he rashly & vndiscreetly flubleth.
For what matter is there, I beseech you, why the heavenly judge should be accused for that he was not ignorant of that which was to come? Therefore if there be anie either iuft or colourable complaint, it toucheth predecstination. Neither ought it to seeme an absurditie which I say, that God foresawe not onelye the fall of the first man, and in him the ruine of his poste-ritie, but also disposed it after his owne will. For as it belongeth to his wife-dome, to foreknow all things that shalbe: so it belongeth to his power, to rule and gouerne all things with his hande. And this question Auguistine verie well discusseth, as he doth other, saying, Wee most holomely confesse that which we most rightly believe, that the God and Lorde of all thinges, which created all things verie good, & foreknewe that euill things shalbe spring out of good, and knewe that it more pertained to his almighty goodness even of evil things do well, than not to suffer them to be evil: that he so ordered the life of Angels and men, that in it he might first shew what free will could do, and then what the benefit of his grace and judgement of justice could do.

8 Here they run to the distinction of will and permission, by which they will have it granted that the wicked do perish, God only permitting but not willing it. But why should we say that he permitted it, but because he so willeth? Howbeit it is not likely that man by himselfe, by the only permission of God, without any his ordinance, brought destruction to himselfe: as though God appointed not, of what condition he would have the chief of his creatures to be. I therefore will not doubt to confess, simply with Augustine, that the will of God is a necessity of things, and that what hee willeth, it must of necessity come to passe: as those things shall truly come to passe which he hath foreseen. Nowe if for excuse of themselves and of the vngodly, either the Pelagians, or Manichees, or Anabaptists, or Epicurians (for with these foure sects we have to do in this question) shall object against vs, necessity, wherein they be bound by the predestination of God; they bring nothing fit to the purpose. For if predestination be nothing else but a dispensation of righteousness of GOD, which is hidden in decree, but yet without fault: Forasmuch as it is certaine that they were not unworthy to be predestinate to that estate, it is also as certaine that the destruction is most righteous which they enter into by predestination. Moreover their destruction so hangeth upon the predestination of God, that both cause and matter thereof is found in themselves. For the first man fell, because the Lord so judged it to be expedient: why he so judged, is unknowne to vs: yet it is certaine that he so judged for no other reason but because he sawe that thereby the glory of his name should be worthily set forth. When thou hearest mention of the glory of God, there thinke of his righteousness: For it must be righteous that deserve praise. Man therefore falles, the providence of God for ordaining it: but he falleth by his owne fault. The Lord had a little before pronounced, that all the things which he had made were very good. Whence therefore commeth that peruersenesse to man, to fall away from his God? Least it should be thought to be of creation, the Lord with his commendation allowed that which came from himselfe. Therefore by his owne euniversitie he corrupted the nature which he had receiued pure of the Lord, and by his fall he drewe his whole posteritie with him into destruction. Wherefore let vs rather beholde an evident cause of damnation in the corrupted nature of mankind, which is nearer to vs, than search for a hidden and utterly incomprehensible cause thereof in the predestination of GOD. Neither let it grieue vs so farre to submitte our wit to the unmeasurable wisdom of God, that it may yeelde in many secrets of his. For, of those things which it is neither graunted nor lawful to knowe, the ignorance is well learned: the croueting of knowledge is a kind of madness.

9 Some men perhaps will say, that I have not yet brought enough to subdue that wicked excuse. But I verily confess that it can never be brought to passe, but that vngodliness will alwaye grudge and murmur against it: yet yet I think that I have spoken so much as might suffice to take away not only all reason but also all colour of gainsaying. The reprobate would bee thought excusable in sinning, because they cannot escape the necessities of sinning: specially since such necessities is cast upon them by the ordinance of God. But we deny that they are thereby well excused, because the ordinance of God, by which they complains that they are destinate to destruction, hath his righteousnesse, unknown in decree to vs, but yet most certaine.

Whereupon we conclude, that they bear no euil which is not laide vpon them by the most righteous judgement of God. Then we teach that they do overeighthly, which to seeke out the beginning of their damnation, doe bend their eyes to the secret closets of the counsell of God, and winke at the corruption of nature, from whence their damnation springeth. And this withstandeth that they can not impute it to God, for that he witnesseth of his owne creation. For although man is creat by the eternal prudence of God to that calamitie, whereunto he is subject: yet the matter thereof he took of himselfe, not of God, forasmuch as he is by no other meanes so lost but because he went out of kinde from the pure creation of God into a corrupt & vnpure peruerfenesse.

10 Now the aduersaries of Gods predestination doe slander it also with a third absurditie. For when we impute it to nothing else but to the choice of the will of God, that they are made free from the vniuersal destruction, who he maketh heires of his kingdom, whereby they gather that there is with him accepting of persons, which the Scripture euerywhere doth enioy: and therefore, that either the Scripture disagreeth with it selfe, or that in the election of God there is respect of desuerings. First, the Scripture in another sense, enioeth, that God is an acceptor of persons, than as they judge it. For by the name of person, it signifieth not a man, but those things which being seene with eyes in man are wont to procure either favour, grace, and dignitie, or hatred, contempt, and shame; as, richesse, wealth, power, nobilitie, office, countrie, excellencie of beautie, and such other: on the other side, povertie, neede, balencesse, vilenesse, contempt, and such other. So Peter & Paul do teach that the Lord is not an acceptor of persons, because he puteth not difference betweene the Iew and the Grecian, to refuse the one and embrace the other for only respect of nation. So James speaketh the same wordes when he mindeth to affirme, that God in his judgement nothing regardeth richesse. But Paul in another place speaketh thus of God, that in judging he hath no consideration of freedome or bondage. Wherefore there shalbe no contrarietie if we shall say that God according to the will of his good pleasure without any deferuing chooseth to his fonnes whome he will, reiecting and refusing other. But the matter may thus be opened, that men may bee more fully satisfied. They aske how it commeth to passe, of two betweene whomo no deferuing putteth any difference, God in his electing passeth ouer the one and taketh the other. I on the other side doe ask them, whether they thinke that in him that is taken there is any thing that may make the minde of God to encline toward him. If they confesse (as there needs must) that there is nothing, it shall followe that God looketh not vpon man, but from his owne goodness fetcheth a cause why to doe good to him.

Whereas therefore God chooseth one man, refusing another, this commeth not of respect of me, but of his mercie alone, which ought to have liberty to shine forth, and vitter itself where, and when it pleaseth him. For we have in another place also shewed, that there were not from the beginning many called noble, or wise, or honourable, that God might humble the pride of flesh: so farre is it off, that his favour was bound to persons.

11 Wherfore many do falsifie and wickedly accuse God of partial vnrighteousnesse, for that he doth not in his predestination keepe one selfe course toward all men. If (say they) he finde all guiltie, let him equally punish all: if he finde them not guiltie, let him withhold the rigor of his judgement: But so they deal with him, as if either mercy were forbidden him, or when he would have mercie he be compelled altogether to give over his judgement. What is it that they require, if all be guilty, that all may together suffer one paine. We grant the gultines to be common, but we say the mercy of God helpeth some. Let it helpe all, say they. But we answere, that it is rightfull, that he should also be punishinge. But when they suffer not this: what do they els but either go about to spoil God of his power to have mercy, or at least to grant it him vpon this condition, that he vitterlie give over his judgement. Wherefore these sayings of Augustine do very well agree together. Sith in the first man the whole mane of mankind fell into condemnation, these vessels that are made to it honour, are not the vessels of their owne rightousnesse, but of the mercie of God: and whereas other are made to dishonour, the same is not to be imputed to vnrighteousnesse but to judgement, &c. That to those whom he refuseth, God rendreth due paine: to those whom he calleth, hee giueth undeferred grace: that they are delivered from all accusation, after the manner of a creditor, in whose power it is, to forgive to the one, &e. of the other. Therefore the Lorde also may give grace to whom he will, because he is merciful: and give it not to all, because he is a just judge. Hee may by giving to some that which they do not deserve, shewe his free grace: & by not giving to all, declare what all deserve. For wheres the Paul wrieth that God enclosed all vnder sinne, that he might have mercy vpon all, it is therewithall to be added that he is better to no man: because no man first gave to him, that hee may require like of him.

12 This also they often say, to overthowe predestination, that while it standeth, all carefulnesse and endeavoure of well doing falleth away. For who (say they) shall haue that either life or death is certainly appointed for him by the eternal decree of God, but that it will be by and by come into his mind, that it maketh no matter how he behve himself, Sith the predestination of GOD can by his worke bee nothing hindred or furthered? So shall all men diffolutely throwe forth themselves, and after a desperate manner runne headlong whither their lust shall carry them. And vitiy they saye not altogether falsifie, for ther be many swine, which with filthy blasphemies defile the doctrine of predestination: and by this pretence also do mock out all admonishments and rebukings, saying, God knoweth what he hath once determined to doe with vs: if he haue decreed our salvation, hee will bring vs to it at the time appointed: if he haue predestinat our death, we shoule
Of the maner how to receive traualie in vaine to the contrary. But the scripture, when it teacheth with how much greater reverence & religiousnesse we ought to think of to great a mysterie, doth both instruct the godlie to farre other sense, and well eserue these mens outrage. For it doth not speake of predestination to this ende, that we should be encouraged to boldnesse, and with unlawful rashnesse attempt to search the unattained secretes of God: but rather that being humbled and abased we should learn to tremble at his judgement, & reuerently to looke vp to his mercy. To this marke the faithful full will keuel themselves.

As for that filthy groning of swine, it is well confused of Paul. They say that they go carelesly forwarde in vices: because if they be of the number of the elect, their vices shall nothing hinder them, but that they shall at length be brought to life. But Paul telleth that we be to this end, that we should leade a holy and faultlesse life. If the mark that electio is directed unto to be holinesse of life, it ought more to awake & stirre vs vp cheerfully to practice that holinesse, than to seare for a cloking of sowerfulness. For how greatly do these things differ the one from the other: to cease fro vell doing, because election sifficeth to saluation: and that the appointed ende of election is that we should applye our selves to the endeavours of good doings. Away therefore with such sacrileges which do wrongfully miscurne the whole order of election. Where they stretch their blasphemies further, when they say that he which is reprobate of God, shall loose his laboure if he go about to make himselfe allowable to him with innocencie and honesty of life: wherein they are taken with a most shamelesse lye. For, whence could such endevour come but of election? For whosoever be of the number of the reprobate, as they are vessels made to dishonour, so they cease not with continuall wicked doings to prouoke the wrath of God against themselves, and by evident tokens to confirme the judgement of God which is already pronounced vpon them: so farre they from striving with him in vaine.

But other do maliciouslie & shamefullie slander this doctrine, as though it did ouerthrow all exhortations unto godly living. For which matter in olde time Augustine was burdened with a great malice. Which hee wiped away with his booke of correction and grace written to Valentine, the reading whereof will appease all godlie and trustable men: yet I will touch a fewe things, which (as I trust) shall satisfie them that be honest and not contentious. Wee have already seene howe open and loude a preacher of the free election Paul was: was hee therefore colde in admonishing and exhorting? Let these good zealous men compare their carnalnesse with his, and it shall be founde in them ife in comparison of his incredible heate. And truely this principle taketh away all doubtes, that we are not called to vnclannes, but that every man should potrifie his vessels in honour, &c. A gaine, that we are the handy worke of God created to good works, which he hath prepared that we should walke in them. Summarily, they that are even but meanly exercised in Paul, shall without long declaration easilly perceiue how fitly he maketh these things to agree, which they faile to disagree. Christ commandeth his men beleeue in him: Yet is his definittive sentence neither false nor contrary to this commandement, where hee saith: No man can come to mee, but he to whom it is given of my father. Let preaching therefore have haue his course, which may bring men to faith, and with continuall profiting holde them fast in perfeuerance. Neither yet let the knowledge of predestination be hindered, for they which obey may not be proude as of their owne, but may glorie in the Lord. Christ not for nothing faith: Who so hath cares of hearing, let him heare. Therefore when we exhorte and preache, they that haue cares doe willingly obey: but who so lacking cares, in them is fulfilled that which is written, That hearing they heare not. But why (faith Augustine) should some haue, and others none haue? Who hath known the minde of the Lord? Must that therefore be denied which is open, because that cannot be comprehended which is hidden? These sayings I haue faithfully reported out of Augustine: but because he had not the more authority than mine, goe, let vs bring forth the verie wordes that are read in his minde; if when this is heard, many are turned into dulnesse and sluggisnese, and being inclined from labour to lust doe go after their desires: ought that therefore to be accompted false which is spokenc of the foreknowledge of God? If God haue foreknowen, they shalbe good, that they not be good, in how great euilnesse & euilnesse are they now liue? And if he haue foreknowen, that they shall be euill, shal they not be euill in how great goodnes foruer they be now seene? that therefore those things which are truly spokenc of the foreknowledge of God, be for such causes either to be denied or to be left vnspokenc of, namely then when they be not spokenc of, men goe into errors? The rule (faith he) to kepe truth vnspoken of, is one thing, & the necessitie to spake truth is an other. As for the causes of leaving truth vnspokenc of, it were long to search them out all: of which yet this is one, that they be not made worse which understand it not, while we mean to make them more learned that understand it, who when we spake any such thing are in doe, do not made more learned, nor yet are made worse. But whè a true thing is in such case, that when we spake it, he is made worse that cannot conceive it: and when we spake it not, he is made worse that can conceive it: what thinke we now to be done? Is not the truth rather to be spokenc of, by him that may conceive it: that can conceive it: than to kepe it vnspokenc of, that not onely neither of them may conceive it, but also he that more understandeth may be worse? whereas if he did heare and conceive it, by him also many should lerne. And we will not say that which, as the Scripture witnesseth, we lawfully might haue spokenc. For we feare forsooth lest when we spake, he be offended that can not conceive it: but we feare not leaft while we hold our peace, he may conceiue truth be deceived with falshood. Which sentence he at the last shortly knitting vp, more plainely also confirmeth. Wherefore if the Apostles, and they, which followed them, the doctors of the Church did both, namely both godly preach of the eternall election of God, and holde the faithfull in awerder the discipline of godly life: why do thefe our aduersaries being confused with invincible violence of truth, thinke that they say well in saying that which is spokenc of predestination is not to be preached to the people although it be true. Yea it must in any wise be preached, he which hath cares to heare may heare. But who hath cares if he hath not received them from him that promiseth that he will give them? Truely let him that receiueceth not, refuse it: so that yet hee he which receiveth it, do take and drink, do drinke and liue. For as godlines is to be preached, that God may be rightly worshipped: so is also predestination, that he which hath ears to heare of the grace of God, may glory in God and not in himselfe.

14. And yet that holy man, as he had a singular desire to edifie, so tempereth the manner of teaching the truth, that offence be wisely avoyded so far as it lawfully may be. For he saith, that those things which are truly said, may also be conveniently said. If any man do thus preach to the people. If ye beleue not, the cause is for that ye are already predestinates of God to destruction; such a man doth not only cherish slothfulness, but also maintain wickedness. If any man also stretch his saying to a time to come, and say that they which heare shall not beleue, because they are reprobates: this shall be rather a cursing than a teaching. Such therefore Augustine not vnworthily biddeth to depart from the Church, as foolish teachers, and vn-lucky and ill-prophecying Prophets. In an other place he truely affirmeth that it is to be holden, that a man then profitteth with rebuking, when he hath mercy and helpeth which maketh to professe whom he will, even with-out rebuking. But why some thus, and some otherwise? God forbid that, that we should say, that the power of judging belongeth rather to the clay than to the potter. Againe afterwardes. When men by rebuking either come or returne into the way of righteousness, who worketh salvation in their hearts, but hee, which when any whosoeuer he be planted and watered, giuen the increase, whom when he will saue, no freewill of man resieth: It is therefore not to be doubted that the wils of men cannot resist y wil of God (which both in heauen and earth hath done whatsoever he would, and which hath also done those things that are to come) but that he may do what he will, forasmuch as euens of the verie wils of mens he doth what he will. Againe, when he will leade men to him, doeth he binde them with corporall bondes? Hee inwardly worketh, inwardly holdeth hearts, inwardly moteth hearts, and draweth them with their wille which he himselfe hath made in them. But, that which hee by and by addeth ought in no wise to be omitted; that because wee knowe not who belongeth or not belongeth to the number of the predestinate, we ought so to be affectioned that we would all men to be saued. So shall it come to passe, that whomsoever we find, we shall trauell to make him partaker of peace. But our peace shall rest upon the children of peace. Therefore for our part, we must applie holome and sharpe rebuking to all men like a medicine, that they perish not, nor destroy other, but it shalbe the worke of God to make it profitable to them whom he hath for-known and predestinates.

The xxiii. Chapter.

That election is established by the calling of God, but that the reprobate doe bring upon themselves the sure destruction whereunto they are appointed.

But, that the matter may more plainly appeare, we must intreate both of the calling of the elect, and of the blinding and hardening of the wic ked. Of the first of these, I have already spoken somewhat; when I confuted their error, which thinke that the generalnesse of the promises extendeth egaleally to all mankind. But this election which otherwise God hath hidden with himself, he doth not without choice at length disclose by his calling, which a man may therefore call the testifying of it. For, when he hath foreknowen, then he hath also foreappointed to be fashioned like the image of his sonne: whom he hath foreappointed, them he hath also called: whom he hath called, them he hath also justified, that in time to come he may glo-riify them. When the Lorde hath by electing already adopted his into the number of his children: yet we see how they enter not into possession of so great a benefite, but when they be called: on the other side, how being called do now enjoy a certaine communicating of his election. For which reason Paul calleth the spirit which they receive, both the spirit of adoption, & the seal: & earnest of the inheritance to come: namely because it doth with the testimonie thereof establish and seale to their hearts the assurednes of the adoption to come. For though the preaching of the Gospel spring out of the fountain of election: yet because it is also common to the reprobate, therefore it could not by itself be a sure proofe thereof. But God effectually teacheth his elect, that he may bring them to faith: as wee have before alleged out of the words of Christ, Who so is of God, he and none other seeth the Father. Againse, I have shewed thy name to the men whom thou haft given me: Whereas his faith in another place, no man can come to me, ynlesse my Father draw him. Which place Augustine wisely weyeth, whose words are these. If (as Truth saith) every one that hath learned, commeth: who focuer commeth not, certainly neither hath he learned. It doeth not therefore followe that he which can come, also commeth, ymlesse he have both willed and done it. But every one that hath learned of the Father, not only can come, but also commeth, when nowe there is present both the pro-fite of comming, and the affection of willing, and the effect of doing. Also in another place more plainly. What is this else, Every one that hath heard of the father, and hath learned, commeth to me, but there is none that hear-eth and learneth of the father and commeth not to me? For if every one which hath heard of the father and learned, commeth: truly every one that commeth not, hath not heard of the father, nor learned: for if he had heard and learned, he would come. This schoole is farre from the senses of the flesh: in which schoole the father is heard and teacheth, that men may come to the fonde, and a little after. This grace which is secretly given to the hearts of men, is received of no hard heart: for it is therefore giuèd, that the hardness of the heart may first bee taken away. When therefore the father is heard within, he taketh away the stone heart, and giueth a fleshy heart. For so he maketh the children of promise and vessels of mercy, which he hath prepared to glorifie. Why therefore doth he not teach all, that they may come to Christ, but because all whom he teacheth, by mercie he teacheth: whom he doth not teach, by judgement he doth not teach: because he hath mercie upon whom he will, and hardeneth whom he will. Therefore God assigneth them for children to himselfe, and appointeth himselfe father to them, whom he hath chosen. Nowe by calling he bringeth them into the householde, and shineth himselfe to them, that they may bee one together. But, when calling is joyned to election, in that manner the

Scripture sufficiently signifieth that in it nothing is to be required but the mercie of God. For if we ask, whom he calleth & for what reason he answered, whom he had elected. But when we come once to election, there the only mercie of God appeareth on every side. And here that saying of Paul truly hath place. It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth but of God that hath mercie. Neither yet that same so as they commonly take it, which part it between the grace of God, & the willing and running of man. For they expound it, that the desire and indeavour of man have in deed no force of themselves, vnlesse they be prospered by the grace of God: but when they are holpen by his blessing, then they affirm that they have also their parts in obtaining salvation. Whose caulation I had rather confute with Augustines words than mine owne: If the Apostle meant nothing else but that it is not of him only that willeth or runneth, vnlesse the Lorde be there present mercifull: we may contrariwise turne it against them and say that it is not of only mercie, vnlesse there be present willing & running. But if this be openly wicked, let vs not doubt that the Apostle giueth all to the mercie of the Lorde, and leaueth nothing to our willes or endeavours. To this effect speaketh that holy man. And I set not a straw by that nice subtlerie, that they say that Paul would not have so said vnlesse there had bene some indeavour and some wil in vs. For he did not consider what was in man: but when he sawe that some did assigne part of salvation to the endeavours of men, he simply condemned their error in the first part of the sentence, & in the second he challenged the whole summe of salvation of the mercie of God. And what other thing doe the Prophets trauel about but continually to preach the free calling of God?

2. Moreover the very nature also & dispensation of calling doth clearly sheweth, which consisteth not in the only preaching of the worde, but also in the inlightening of the Spirit. To whom God offereth his worde, is shewed vs in the Prophet: I am found of them that sought me not: I have openly appeared to them, that did not ask for me. To a people which hath not called upon my name I have saide, Lo I am present. And least the Iewes should thinke that this kindnesse belonged only to the Gentiles, hee doth also put them in remembrance from whence hee tooke their Father Abraham, when hee vouchsaued to ioyne him to himselfe, namely from mere idolatry, in which he was drowned with all his. When hee first sheweth with the light of his worde to men not desiring it, he therein sheweth an example plaine enough of his free goodnesse. Here therefore the unmeasurable goodnesse of God sheweth forth itselfe, but not vnto salvation to all: because for the reprobate there abideth a more grievous judgement, for that they refuse the testimonie of the wil of God. And God also, to set forth his glorie, withholdeth from them the effectual force of his spirit. Therefore this inward calling is a pledge of salvation, which cannot deceive vs. For which purpose maketh that saying of John, Thereby wee knowe that we are his children, by the spirit whch he hath giuen vs. And least flesh should glorie, that it did at the least auncwer to him when hee called and of his owne will offered himselfe, hee affirmeth that it hath no cares to heare, no eyes to see, but which hee hath made: and that hee marketh.

keth them, not according to every man's thankfulness, but according to his own election. Of which thing you have a notable example in Luke, where both Jews and Gentiles in common together heard the preaching of Paul & Barnabas. Whereas they were at that time all taught with one self-same word, it is safe that they beleued which were ordained to everlasting life. With what face may we deny that the calling is free, in which case the very last part election reigneth alone?

3 But here we must beware of two errors: because many make man a worker together with God, that he by his consent may make the election to be of force: so by their opinion, the will of man is above the counsell of God. As though the Scripture did teach, that it is only given vs that we may beleeve, and not rather faith it selue. Other some, although they do not so weaken the grace of the holy Ghost: yet being led by I wot not what reason, have election upon faith as though it were doubtfull, yea and vneffectual vntill it be confirmed by faith. It is in deed certain that it is confirmed, as toward vs: and we have already shewed you the secret counsell of God beginneth to shine out, which was before hidden: so that by this word you understand nothing else, than that it is approved which was vnknowe, & is as it were sealed with a seal. But it is falsely said, that election is then and not till then effectual, when we have embraced the gospell, & y there of taketh lively strength. We must indeede from thence fetch the certaintie of it: Because if we attempt to reach vnto the eternal ordinance of God, that deepe bottomlesse depth will swallowe us vp. But when God hath opened it vnto vs, we must clime vp higher, lest the effect should drown the cause. For what greater absurdity or shameful vnjustice is there, than that when the Scripture teacheth that we are enlightened as God hath chosen vs, our eyes should be so dased with this light, that they should refuse to looke vpon election? Yet in the meane time I deny not, that to the end we may be certaine of our salvation, we must beginne at the word, and that our affiance ought therewith to be contented, that we may call vpon God by the name of Father. For some quite contrary to right order, y they may be certified of the counsell of God (which is vnderstanding vnto vs, in our mouth & in our heart) do covet to flie above the cloudes. Therefore that rashness is to be restraine with sobrieetie of faith, that it may suffice vs that God in his outward word is a witnesses of his hidden grace: to that the conduit pipe out of which there floweth water largely for vs to drinke, doth not hinder but that the springhead may have his due honour.

4 Therefore as they do wrongfully, which hang the strength of election vpon the faith of the gospell, by which faith we feele that election pertaineth to vs: so we shall kepe the best order, if in seeking the certainty of our election, we sticke fast in these latter signes, which are sure witnesses of it. Satan doth with no tentation either more greecuously, or more dangerously astonish the faithfull, than when disquieting them with doubt of their election, doth also move them with a peruerse desire to secke it out of the waie. I call it seeking out of the waye, when a wretched man enterprise to breake into the hidden secretes of the wisedome of God, & to perceve eu'n to the highest eternity, to understand what is determined of himselfe at the judgement.

Deu. 30.14

Ye are not workers with God of our owne election, neither dooth it hang in suspense upon our faith.

The certainty of our election to be searched not in the bosome of God but in our selves according to that light which bee hath given us in his word.

Cap. 24. Of the maner how to receive faith of God. For then he throweth himselfe headlong to be swallowed vp into the depth of the vnumeasurable devouring pit: then he wrapeth himselfe with innumerable snares and such as he cannot winde out of: then he overwhelmeth himselfe with the bottomlesse depth of blinde darknesse. For so is it righthful that the foolishnesse of the witte of man be punished with so horrible ruine, when he attempteth of his owne force to rise vp to the height of the wisdom of God. And so much more deadly is this tentation, as there is none to which we are commonly all more bent. For there is most rarely any man to be found, whose mind is not sometime striken with this thought. Whence hast thou salvation, but of the election of GOD? And of election what revelation hast thou? which thought, if it have once taken place in any man, either perpetually vexeth the miserable man with terrible torments, or utterly dismayeth him. Truely I would have no furer argument then this experience to prove, howe wrongfully such men imagine of predestination. For the minde can be infected with no error more pestilent, than that which plucketh downe and thrusteth the conscience from her peace and quietnesse towards God. Therefore if we fear shipwrackes, we must diligently beware of this rocke, which is never striken upon without destruction. And though the disputing of predestination be esteemed like a dangerous sea, yet in passing through it there is founde a safe and quiet yea and pleasant aye, without horror and stinking a man doe withiuouly count to be in danger. For as they doe drown themselves in the deadly bottomlesse depth, whiche to be certified of their election doe enquire of the secret Counsell of God without his worde: so they which doe rightly and orderly search it in such sort as it is contained in the worde, receive thereof a singular fruitie of comfort. Let this therefore be our way to search it, that wee beginne at the calling of God, and ende in the same. Howbeit this withlandeth not, but that the faithfull may thinke that the benefits which they daily receive at the hand of GOD, doe descende from that secreete adoption: as they say in Esaie, Thou haft done maruels, thy thoughts are olde, true, and faithfull: forasmuch as by that adoption as by a toke, the Lords willis to conforme so much as is lawfull to be knowne of his counsell. But least anie man shoulde thinke this a weake testimonie, let vs consider how much both clearenesse and certainty it bringeth vs. Of which thing Bernearde speake eth sily. For after that he had spoken of the reprobate, he faith: The purpose of God standeth, the sentence of peace standeth upon the that fear him, both covering their euails, and rewarding their good thinges: so as to them after a marventously manner not onely good thinges, but also euaile do worke together vnto good. Who that accuse the elect of God? It sufficeth me to all righteousnesse, to have him alone merciful, to whom alone I have sinned. Al ye hath decreed not to impute to me, as so as if it never had bene. And a little after: O place of true rest, to which not vnworthily I may give the name of a bedchamber, in which GOD is scene not as troubled with wrath, not as withholden with care: but his will is proouded in him good, and well pleasing, and perfect. This fight doth not make afraide, but calmeth: doth not stirre vp vnquiet curiousnesse, but appeaseth it: doth not weary the senses, but quieteth them. Here is quiet truly taken, God being appeased, appeaseth all thinges: and

and to behold him quiet, is to be quiet.

5 First, if we seeke a fatherly kindnesse and faavourable minde of God, we must turne our eyes to Christ, in whom alone the soule of the father refeth. If we seeke salvation, life, and the immortalitie of the heauenly kingdom, we must then alfo flee to no other: forasmuch as he alone is both the founfaine of life, & author of salvation, & heire of the kingdom of Heauen. Now where to seeke election, but that being adopted of the heauenly father into the degree of children, we may by his fauour obtaigne salvation & immortalitie? Howsoever in seekeing thou toffe it and shake it, yet thou shalt finde that the uttermost marke of it extendeth no further. Therefore whom God hath taken to his children, it is not said that he hath chosen them in themselves, but in his Christ: because he could not love them but in him, nor give them the honour of the inheritance of his kingdom, vnlesse they had first bene made partakers of him. If we be chosen in him, we shall not find in ourselves the certaintie of our election: no, nor yet in God the father, if wee imagine him naked without the sonne. Christ therefore is the mirror, in whom we both muft, and without deceit may behold our election. For thus it is he into whose body the Father hath appointed to graffe all them whom from eternitie he hath willed to be his, that he may take for his children so many as hee acknowledgeth among his members: we have a witnesse plaine and sure enough, that wee are written in the booke of life, if we communicate with Christ. And that sure communion of himselfe hee gaue vs, when by the preaching of the Gospell hee testified that he was given to vs of the father, that hee with all his good thinges shoulde bee ours. Wee are saide to put on him, and to growe together into him, that wee may liue: because hee liueth. So oft is this doctrine repeated, The Father spared not his onely begotten sonne, that whoseuoeuer beleueth in him, may not perish. But he that beleueth in him, is saide to have passe out of death into life, in which sense he calleth himselfe the bread of life, which whose eateh, hee shal not die for euuer. Hee (I say) hath bee a witnesse to vs, that they shal be receiued of the heauenly father in place of his children, of whom hee hath bee ne receiued by faith. If wee couere any more than to bee accompted among the children and heires of God, then we may clime about Christ. If this be our uttermost marke: how much be wee mad in seekeing without him that which wee have alreadie obteyned in him, and which may bee found in him alone? Moreover if he is the eternall wisdome, the unchangeable truth, and fast setled counsell of the father: it is not to be feared leaft that which hee declareth to vs in his worde, should vary any thing bee it never fo little from that will of the Father which wee seeke: but rather hee faithfully openeth it vnto vs, such as it was from the beginning, & euer shalbe. The praeffe of this doctrine ought also to bee in vs in prayers. For though the faith of election doth incourage vs to call vpom God: yet when we make our prayers, it were vnorderly done to thrust it into the presence of God, or to covanent with this condition. Lorde, if I bee elected, heare me: forasmuch as hee willeth vs to be content with his promises, and no where else to seeke whether he will be intractable to vs or no. This wisdome shall deliver vs from many snares, if wee can skill to apply that to a right vse which hath bee nee rightly written: but let vs not undifferently draw hither and thither that which ought to have been restrained.

6 There is also for establishing of our assiance an other stye of election, which we haue saide to be joyned with our calling. For, whome Christ taketh being enlightened with the knowledge of his name into the bosome of his Church, them he is saide to receiue into the faith and protection. And whome soever he receiuet, they are saide to bee committed to him of the father, & deliuered to his trust, that they may be kept into eternal life. What meane we? Christ crieth out with a loude voice, that so many as the Father willeth to be saued, he deliuered them into his protection. Therefore if we lift to knowe whether God hath care of our saftie, let vs seeke whether he hath committed vs to Christ, whome he hath made the onely Saviour of all his. Nowe if we doubt whether we be receiued of Christ into his Faith & keeping, he preuenteth our doubting, when hee voluntarily offereth himselfe to be our sheepeheard, and pronounceth that wee shal be in the number of his sheape if we heare his voyce. Let vs therefore embrace Christ, being liberally set open for vs, and comming to meete vs, hee shal number vs in his flocke, and shal keepe vs inclosed within his folde. But there entreteth into vs a carefule of our state to come. For as Paul teacheth that they are called, which were before chosen: so Christ sheweth that many are called, but fewe are chosen. Yea and also Paul himselfe in an other place dihorthet vs from carefule: Let him that standeth (faith he) loooke that hee fall not. Again, Art thou graffed into the people of God? Be not proud, but seeke for God is able to cut thee off againe that he may graffe other. Finally we are sufficiently taught by experience it selfe, that calling and faith are of small value, yndee there be adiyned continuance which happeneth not in all men. But Christ hath deliuered vs from this care: for verily these promises haue respect to the time to come. All that my father giueth mee, shall come to me: and him that shall come to me, I will not cast him out of dores. Again, this is the will of him that sent me, the Father, that I loose nothing of all things that hee hath given mee, but may raise them vp againe in the last day. Again, My sheepe heare my voice, and they followe mee: I knowe them, and I giue them eternal life, and they shall not perish for ever, neither shall any man take them out of my hande. The father which gave them to me, is greater than all: & no man can take them out of the hand of my father. Now when he pronounceth, every tree which my father hath not planted, shall be plucked vp by the root: he signifieth on the contrarie side, that they can never be plucked from salvation, which haue roote in God. Wherewith agree the faying of John. If they had beene of vs, they had not at all gone out from vs. Hereupon also commeth that noble glorying of Paul against life and death, present things and things to come: which glorying must needs be grounded upon the gifts of continuance. Neither is it any doubt that he directeth this faying to all the faithfull. In another place the same Paul saith, He that hath begonne in you a good worke, shall end it even untill the day of Christ. As also David, when his faith fainted, leaned vppon this stay: Thou shalt not forsake the worke of thy handes. And nowe neither is this doubtful, that Christ when he prayeth for al the faithful, asketh the

The same thing for the which he asketh for Peter, that their faith may never faint. Whereas we gather, that they are out of danger of falling away, because the sonne of God, asking steadfast continuance for their godliness, suffered no deniall. What would Christ haue vs to learne hereby, but that we should truett that we shal perpetually be safe, because we are once made his?

7 But it daily happeneth, that they which seemed to be Christes, do againe revolt from him & fall. Yea and in the very same place where he affirmeth that none had perished of them which were given him of the Father, yet he excepteth the sonne of perdition. That is true indeede: but this is also as certaine, that such did never cleave to Christ with assurance of heart, with which I say that the assurednesse of our election is establishd. They went out from vs (faith John) but they were not of vs. For if they had been of vs, they had distaried with vs. Neither do I deny that they have like signes of calling as the elect haue: but I do not grant that they haue that sure establishment of election which I bid the faithful to fetch out of the word of the Gospel. Wherefore let not such examples mover vs but that wee quietly rest upon the promise of the Lord, where he pronounceth, that all they are giuen to him of the Father, which receive him with true faith, of whom saith he is their keeper & Pastor, none shall perish. Of Indus we shall speake hereafter.

Paul doth not couneil Christians from assurednes altogether, but from carelesse and loose assurednesse of the flesh, which draweth with it, pride, presumption, & disdain of other, and quencheth humility & the reuerence of God, and bringeth forgetfulness of grace receiued. For he speaketh to the Gentiles, whom he teacheth, that they ought not proudly and vngently to reproche the Jews for this, that the Jews being inherited, they were set in their stead. Feare also he requireth not wherewith they should be dismained & stagger, but which framing vs to the humber receiuing of the grace of God, should abate nothing of the affiance thereof, as we haue saide in another place. Beside that he doth not there speake to euerie man particularly, but to the sects themselves generally. For where the church was diuided into two parts, & enueied brest dissention, Paul putte in the Gentiles in mind that their being supplied into the place of the peculiar and holy people, ought to be to them a cause of feare & modestie. And among them there were many puffed vp with glory, whose vaine boasting it was profitable to beat downe. But we haue in another place shewed, that our hope is extended to the time to come even beyond death, and that nothing is more contrary to the nature of it, than to doubt what shall become of vs.

8 That saying of Christ, of many being called but fewe chosen, is verie ill taken after that maner. There shalbe nothing doubtful if we hold fast that which ought to be cleare by the things aboue spoken, that there are two sortes of calling. For there is an universal calling whereby through the outward preaching of the word, God calleth altogether to him, even them also to whom he setteth it forth vnto the favor of death, & vnto matter of more grievous condemnation. The other is a speciall calling which for the most part the vouchedsafeith to give only to the faithful, when by the inward enlightening of his spirit he makest yt the word preached is setled in their hearts. Yet sometime he makest them also partakers of it whom hee enlighteneth but
but for a time, & afterward by the deferving of their unthankfulness for sake keth them, and striketh them with greater blindnesse. Now when the Lorde saw the gospell to be published farre and wide, and to be despised of many, but to be had in due price of fewe: he describeth to vs God vnder the person of a king, which preparing a solemn feast sendeth his messengers round about to bid a great multitude to be his geftes, and yet can get but a few, because every one alleageth letts for his excuse. So that at length he is compelled upon their refusal, to call out of the high waies every one that he meeteth. Hitherto every man seeth that the parable must be vnderstood of the outward calling. He addeth afterward that God doth like a good maker of a feast, which goeth about the tables, to cheer his geftes. If he finde any not clothed with a wedding garment, he will not suffer him with his uncleanliness to dishonest the solemnity of the feast. This parte of the parable, I grant, is to be vnderstoode of them which enter into the Church by the profession of faith, but are not clothed with the sanctification of Christ.
Such dishonors and as it were botches of his Church, the Lord will not suffer for ever: but, as their filthinesse deferueth he wil cast them out. Therefore fewe are chosen out of a great number of them that are called, but yet not with that calling by which we say that the faithfull ought to judge their election. For, that generall calling is also common to the wicked: but this speciall calling bringeth with it the spirit of regeneration, which is the earnest and seal of the inheritance to come, wherewith our hearts are sealed up against the day of the Lorde. In a summe sixt hypocrites boast of godlinesse as well as the true worshippers of God, Christ pronounceth that at length they shall be cast out of the place which they wrongfully possesse: as it is said in the Psalm, Lorde, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle? The innocent in handes, and the man of a pure heart. Againe, in another place.
This is the generation of them that secke God, of them that secke the face of the God of Jacob. And fo doth the Spirit exhorte the faithful to sufferance, that they take it not grievously that the Israelites be mingled with them in the Church: for at length their visor shall be plucked from them and they shall be cast out without shame.

9. The same reason is of the exception even now alleaged, where Christ faith, none perished but the sonne of perdition. It is in deed an unproper speech, but yet not darke. For he was not accounted among the sheepe of Christ, for that he was one in deed, but because he kept the place of one, and where in another place the lord affirmeth that he was chosen with the Apostles, that is spoken only in respect of the ministerie. Twelve (faith hee) hau e choosen, and one of them is a Diucl: that is, he had chosen him to the office of an Apostle. But when he speakeyth of choosing to saluation, hee denieth him farre away from the number of the choosen, saying: I speake not of all: I knowe whom I have chosen. If a man do in both places confound the wordes of Chooseng, he shall miserably entangle himselfe: if hee make diftere, nothing is more plaene. Therefore Gregorie teacheth verie ill & pe-silently when hee faith that wee know none of our calling, but are vnเคร aine of our election: whereby hee moueth all men to feare and tremble: v-sing also this reason, but because we know what we be to day, but what wee
The grace of Christ. Lib. 3.

For, because he hanged election upon the merites of works, he had matter enough: and more to discourage the minds of men: but he could not strengthen them, which did not remove them from themselves to the assiance of the goodnesse of God. Hereof the faithfull have some raft of that which we have determined at the beginning that predestination if it be rightly thought vp, bringeth not a shaking of faith, but rather the best strengthening of it. And yet I deny not, the holy ghost framed his talke to the small mesure of our sense. As when he faith, In the secret of my people they shall not be, & in the royle of my seruants they shall not bee written. As though God did begin to write in the booke of life, them whom he reckoneth in the number of his: whereas yet we know: euery the witnesses of Christ, that the names of the children of God are from the beginning written in the booke of life. But in these words is only expresse the casting away of them which seemed the chiefe among the elect: as it is saide in the Psalme. Let them be blotted out of the booke of life, and let them not bee written with the righteous.

10 But the elect are neither immediately from the wombe, nor all at one time, by calling gathered together into the flock of Christ, but as it pleaseth God to distribute his grace to them. But ere they be gathered together to that chiefe shepheard, they are scattered abroad and stray in the common deserte, & differ nothing from other, sauing that they be defended by the singular mercie of God, from falling into the extreme headlong downe fall of death. Therefore if you looke upon themselfes, you shall see the offpring of Adam, which sauoureth of the common corruption of the whole maffe. That they be not carried into extreme & despaired vngodlines, this commeth not to passe by any goodnesse naturally planted in them, but because the eye of God watcheth, & his hande is stretched out to their salvation. For they that drame that from their verie nariuitie there is planted in their hearts, I wote not what fede of election, by the vertue whereof they are alway enclined to godlinesse and to the feare of God, they both are not holpen to proue it by the authoritie of Scripture, & also are confunted by experience it selfe. They doe in deede bring forth a fewe examples to proue that the elect euin before their enlightning, were not utterly strangers to religion: that Paul in his being a Pharisee lusted vnreproouable, that Cornelius was by almes and prayers accepted of God: and such other. Of Paul, we graunt to them: of Cornelius, we say that they are deceived. For it appeareth that he was then alreadie enlightened and regenerate, so that hee wanted nothing but the cleare recuelling of the Gospell. But what will they wring out by these few examples? that all the elect are alway endued with spirit of godliness? No more than if a man by shewing the uprightness of Aristides, Socrates, Zeno, Chrysippus, Camillus, and other, shoulde thereof gather that all they that are left in blindness: of idolatrie, were desirous followers of holiness and honestie. Yea and the Scripture in more places than one, openly crieth out against them. For, the state which Paul describeth of the Ephesians before their regeneration, sheweth not one graine of this fede. Ye were (faith he) dead with faultes and sinnes, in which.

So Peter also should have exhorted his to thankfulness for the perpetual seede of election. But he contra riwise putteth them in minde that the time past sufficed to make an ende of the lustes of the Gentiles. What if we come to examples? what budde of rightousnesse was there in Rahab the harlot, before faith? in Manasse, when Hierusalem was dipped and in a manner drowned in the bloud of the Prophets in the Theefe, which among his last gaspings began to thinke of repentance? Away therefore with these argumentes, which silly curious men do rashly devote to themselves without the Scripture. But let that abide certaine with vs, which the scripture hath, that al haue strayed like lost sheepe, euerie one hath swued into his owne way, y is, perdition. Out of this golfe of perdition, whom the Lord hath determined once to plucke foorth, them he differeth till his sittimes; only he prospereth them, that they fall not vnto unpardonable blasphemie.}\n
and sometime by the preaching of it he more blindeth and amaseth them. Of the first maner, whereas there be innumerable examples, let vs choose out one more cleare & notable than all the rest. There passed away about foure thousand yeares afore Christ, in which he hid from all the Gentiles the light of his health bringing doctrine. If any man answere that he therefore made them not to enjoy so great a benefit because he judged them unworthy, they which come after shall not be proued any more worthie. Of which thing, beside the experience, Malachie is a substantiall witness, which reproving insidicte mingled with grosse blasphemies, yet declareth there shal come a redeemer. Why therefore is he rather given to these than to those? He shall trouble himselfe in vaine, that shal here search for a cause higher than the secret and unsearchable counsell of God. Neither is it to bee feared least any scholler of Porphyrie, shoulde freely gnawe at the righteousnesse of God while wee aunswere nothing in defence of it. For when wee say that none perih vndeferring, & that it is of the free bountifulnesse of God that some be delievered, there is largely enough said for the setting forth of his glory, so that it needeth not our shiffting. The soueraigne judge therefore makest a way for his predestination, when whom he hath once receiued, them being deprived of the communicating of his light hee leaueth in his glory. Of the other maner there are both daily examples, and also many contained in the Scripture. One selfsame preaching is commonly made to a hundred, twentie receive it with readie obedience of faith: the rest doe either set naught by it, or scorn it, or hisse it out, or abhorre it. If any man answere that this diversitie proceedeth of their malice and perversite, he shall not yet satisfie vs: because the others wit also shoulde bee possest with the same malice, vnlesse God did amende it with his goodnesse. Therefore we shall still be encombrd, vnlesse wee call to minde that which Paul I. Cor. 4.7. faith, Who maketh thee to differ? Whereby he signifieth that some excell another some, not by their owne vertue, but by the onely grace of God.

13 Why therefore doth he in grauing grace to those passe ouer these? Of those Luke thouweth a cause, Because they are ordered to life. Of these, what shall we thinke, but because they are the vessels of wrath vnto dishonor? Wherefore lett it not grieue vs to say with Augustine, God (faith hee) might turne the will of the euid into good, because he is almightie. He might in deede. Why therefore doeth he not because hee woulde not. Why hee would not, is in himselfe. For we ought to bee no more wise than we ought to be. And that is much better, than to shifft with Chrysostome, and say that he dreweth him that is willing, and reacheth his hand, that the difference may not seeme to stonde in the judgement of God, but in the onely will of men. Truely it so stonde not in the proper motion of man, that euell the godly and they that feare God haue neede of a singular instruction of the spirit. Ag. 16.14. Lidia the purple seller feared God, & yet it behoved that her heart should be opened, that she might harken to the doctrine of Paul, and profite in it. This is not spoken of one woman alone, but that wee should knowe that the profiting of every man in godliness is the secrete worke of the spirit. This verilie cannot bee brought in question, that the Lorde sendeth his word to many, whose godliness hee will haue to be more enforced. For, to what what purpose doth he bid so many commandments to be carried to Pha-exus? was it because he hoped that with often repeated messages he would be appealed? No, but before he began, he foreknewe and foretold the ende.
Go (said he to Moses) and declare to him my will: but I will harden his heart, that he obey not. So when he stirreth vp Ezekiel, he warneth him aforehande that he sendeth him to a rebellious and stubborne people: to the end that he should not be afraid if he perceive himself to sing to deafe men. So he foretellleth to Jeremie, that his doctrine should become a fire, to destroy and waste the people like stubble: But the prophesie of Esaie yet more enforcing it. For he is thus sent of the Lorde: Go and saye to the children of Israel: With hearing heart ye, and understand not: With seeing see ye, and know ye. Make obstatute the heart of this people, and make haue their eares, and ouerplaiette their eyes. least peradventure they may see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, that being turned they may be healed. Behold he directeth his voice to them, but that they may waxe more deaf: he lighteth a light, but that they may be made more blinde: he sheweth forth doctrine, but that they may be made more dull: he layeth to them a remedy, but not that they may be healed. And John alleging this prophesie, affirmeth that the Jews could not beleue the doctrine of Christ, because this curse of God lay upon them. Neither can this also be in controversy, that whom God will not haue to be enlightened, to them he delivered his doctrine wrapped vp in darke speeches, that they may nothing prospire thereby but to bee thrust into greater dullnesse. Christ also testifieth, that he doth therefore expend onely to the Apostles the parables in which he had spoken to many multitude, because to them it was given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God, but to the common people not so. What meaneth the Lorde (wilt thou say) in teaching them, of whom he prospirideth that he may not be understanded: Consider whence is the fault, and thou wilt cease to aske. For in the word howe great darkenesse fucuer there be, yet there is alway light enough to conclude the conscience of the wicked.

14 Now remaineth for vs to see, why the Lorde doeth that which it is plaine that he doth. If it be answered that it is so done because men have so defeated by their vngodliness, wickednesse, & vnthankfulness: the same shall in deed be well and truly saide: But because there appeareth not yet the reason of this diuersitie, why when some are bowed to obedience, others continue hardened, in searching it we must needs goe to that which Paul hath noted out of Moses, namely that God hath rayfed them vp from the beginning, that he might shewe his name in the whole earth. Wheras therefore the reprobate do not obey the word of God opened vnto them, that shall be well imputed to the malice and peruersenesse of their heart, so that this be therewithall added, that they are therefore given into this peruers-nesse, because by the righteous but yet vnsearchable judgement of God they are raised vp to see forth his glorie with their damnation. Likewise who it is said of the foones of Helie, that they hardenened not to hollesome warnings, because the Lord willed to kill them: it is not denied that the stubbornnesse proceeded of their owne naughtinesse: but it is therewithall touched why they were left in stubbornness, when the Lord might have softened their hearts, namely because his unchangeable decree had once appointed them to destruction. To the same purpose serveth that saying of John, When he had done so great signs, no man believed in him: that the word of Ezechiel might be fulfilled, Lorde, who hast believed our saying? For though he do not excuse the stiffnecked from blame, yet he is content with that reason, that the grace of God is unchangeable, till the holy ghost bring raft. And Christ all else alleging the prophecy of Ezechiel. They shall all be taught of God, tendeth to no other end but to prove that the Jews are reprobate and strangers from the Church, because they are obstinate, and he bringeth no other cause thereof, but for that the promise of God doth not pertain to them. Which thing this saying of Paul confirmeth, that Christ which to the Jews is an offence, and to the Gentiles foolishness, is to the called the strength and wisdom of God. For when he hath told what commonly happeneth so oft as the Gospel is preached, namely, that some it maketh more obstinate, and of some it is dispised, hee faith that it is had in price of them once which are called. Hee had in deed a little before named them believers, but heem meant not to take away the due degree from the grace of God which goeth before faith, but rather he addeth this second saying by way of Correction, that they which had embraced the Gospel shoule give the praise of their faith to the calling of God: As also a little after he teacheth that they are chosen of God. When the vungodlie heated these things, they erie out that God with inordinate power abuseth his poor creatures for a sport to his crueltie. But we which know that all men are so many wais endangered to the judgement of God, that being asked of a thousande things they can not satisfie in one, doe confesse that the reprobate suffer nothing which agreeth not with the most just judgement of God. Whereas we do not clearglie attain the reason thereof, let vs not be discontent to be ignorant of somewhat, where the wisdome of God lifteth vp it selfe into so great height.

15 But forasmuch as there are a few places of scripture wont to be objected, in which God seemeth to deny that it is done by his ordinance that the wicked doe perish, but by this that, he crying out against it, they wilfully bring death upon themselves; let vs brieflie declaring these places, shew they make nothing against the sentence above set. There is brought forth a place of Ezechiel, that God will not the death of a sinner, but rather that he may be turned and liue. If they will extende this to all mankinde: why doth he not move manie to repentance, whose minds are more pliable to obedience, than theirs which at his daily allurements waxe harder and harder. With the Sodomites (as Christ witnesseth) the preaching of the gos- pel and miracles would have brought forth more fruitie than in Israie. How commeth it to passe therefore, if God will all to be faued, that he openeth not the gate of repentance to those miserable men that would have beene more readie to receive grace? Herby we see that the place is violently wrested, if the wil of God whereof the Prophet maketh mention, be sette against his eternal counsel, whereby he hath seerted the elect from the reprobate. Nowe if wee seeke for the true natural meaning of the Propheters: his purpose

1 Corinthians 1:23.
Cap. 24. Of the maner how to receive purpose is to bring hope of pardon to the penitent. And this is the sum, that it is not to be doubted but that God is ready to forgive so soon as the sinner turneth. Therefore he willeth not his death, in so much as hee willeth his repentance. But experience teacheth that he so willeth them to repent who he generally calleth to him, that yet he toucheth not all their heartes. Yet is it therefore to be saide that he dealth deceitfully, because although the outwarde voyce doe but make them vnexcusable which heare and doe not obey it, yet it is truely accounteed the testimonie of the grace of God, by which testimonie he reconcileth men to himselfe. Therefore let vs holde this for the meaning of the Prophet, that the death of a sinner pleaseth not God: that the godly may have afliance, that so soone as they shall be touched with repentance, there is pardon ready for them with G O D, and the wicked may feele that their fault is doubled, because they answer not to so great mercyfull kindenesse and gentlenesse of God. The mercy of God therefore will alway meece repentance, but to whom repentance is gien, both all the Propheteres, and Apostles, and Ezekiel himselfe doe plainly teache. Secondly there is alleaged a place of Paul, where he faith that God willeth al men to be saued, which although it have a diverse meaning fro the other, yet in some thing they agree together. I answer, firt that by the rest of the text it is made plaine how he willeth. For Paul couples together, that he will eth them to be saued, and to come to the acknowledging of the truth. If they will have this to be determined, by the eternal counsell of GOD that they receive the doctrine of salvation, what meaneth that saying of Moses, What nation is so noble, that God commeth neare to it as hee doth to thee? Howe came it to passe that God restrained from many peoples the light of the Gospel, which other enjoyed? Howe came it to passe that the pure knowledge of godlinessse never came to some, and some scarcelye tasted so much as any darke principles of it? Hereof it shall nowe bee easie to gather, where to Paul tendeth. He had commanded Timothy to make solemn prayers in the Church for kings and princes. But when it seemeth somewhat an absurditie that prayers should be made to GOD in a manner delpeere (because they were not onely strangers from the body of Christe, but also endued with all their forces to oppresse his kingdom); hee added, that the same is acceptable to GOD which willeth all men to be saued. Whereby verilie hee signifieth nothing else but that he hath stopped vp the way vnto salvation to no degree of me: but rather that he hath so poured out his mercy that he willeth no man to be voyde of it. The other sentences do not declare what God hath by his secrete judgement determined of all men; but doe shewe that there is pardon ready for all sinners which doe onely turne themselves to require it. For if they more stiffely stande vpon this that it is sayde that he will haue mercy vpon all, I will on the contrarie side answer them with that which is written in an other place. That our God is in heaven where hee doeth whatsoever he will. This word therefore must so be expounded that it may agree with the other, I will haue mercy vpon whom I will haue mercy, and I will shewe mercy to whom I will shew mercy. He that chooseth out them whom he will haue mercie on, doth not give it to all. But sith it clearly appeareth ppeareth that in that place is spoken not of all particular men, but of degrees of men, we will make no longer disputing about it. Howbeit it is also to be noted, that Paul doth not affirm what God doth alway & every where & in all men, but leaveth it to him at his liberty at length to make kings & magistrates partakers of the heavenly doctrine, although by reason of their blindness they doe nowe rage against it. They seeme to preffe vs more strongly with objecting the place of Peter, that God willeth none to perish, but receiveth all to repentance. But the vndoing of this knot doth by and by offer it selfe in the second word, because the will to receive can not bee understood to be any other than that which is every where taught. Truely the turning is in the hande of God: whether he will turne all or no, let his selfe be asked, when he promiseth that he will giue to a certaine fewe men a fleshy heart, leaving to othersome a stone heart. It is true in deed, that vnlesse we were ready to receive them which call upon his mercy, this saying should be false. Turne to me, & I will turne to you. But I say that none of all mortall men doth come to God but he is presunt of God: And if repentance were in the will of man, Paul would not say, If peraduenture he give them repentance. Ye vnlesse the same God which with worde exhorteth al men to repentance, did with secret mouing of his spirite bring the chosen to it: Jeremij would not say, Turne me, Lord, and I shall be turned: for when thou hast turned me, I have repented.

16 But (thou wilt say) if it be so, there shalbe small truth in the promifes of the Gospell, which when they testifie of the will of God, affirm that he willeth that which is against his inuiolable decree. Not so. For howsoever the promises of salua:tion be vniuersall, yet they nothing disagree with the predestination of the reprouable, so that we direct our minde to the effect of them. We knowe that then and not till then the promisses are effectuall to vs, when we receiue them by faith, on the other side when faith is made voide, the promise is therewithall abolishe: If this be the nature of them, let vs then see whether these things disagree together: that it is said that God hath from eretnity ordeined whome he will embrace with love, and upon whom he will exercise wrath: and that he promiseth salua:tion to all without difference. Truely I say that they agree very well. For in so promis:ing he meanteth no thing else than that his merie is set open for all which doe couet and crave it: which thing none doe but they whom he hath en:lightned. And them he enlightneth whom he hath predestinate to salua:tion. They (I say) have the truth of the promisses firme and vstable, so as it can not bee saide that there is any disagreement betweene the eternall election of God, & the testimonie of his grace which he offereth to the faith:full. But why nameth he all? verily that the consiences of the godly may the more safely rest, when they understande that there is no difference of sinners, so that faith be present: and that the wicked may not confall for their excuse, that they want a fatory whereunto they may withdraw themselves from the bondage of sinne, when with their owne vnhankfulnes they refuse it being offered them: Therefore when the mercy of God is by the Gospell offered to both sorts, it is faith, that is to say the enlightning of God, which maketh difference between the godly and vngodly, so as bene sort seeleth the effect.

effectualnesse of the Gospel, and the other sort obtayne no fruite thereof. The enlightning it selfe also hath the eternal election of God for the rule thereof. The complaint of Christ, which they allege, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, howe oft haue I willed to gather together thy chickens, but thou wouldest not make them nothing for them. I graunt that Christ there speakeith not only in the person of man, but also reprocheth them that in all ages they haue refused his grace. But we must define that will of God which is entreated of. For neither is it vnknowne, how diligently God endeavored to keep still that people, & with how great stiffnesse they even from the first to the last being given to their wandering desires refused to be gathered together: but it followeth not thereof that the counsell of God was made vnde the malice of men. They answere and say that nothing lefse agreeth with the nature of GOD than to haue a double wil in him. Which I grant to them, so that they falsely expounde it. But why doe they not consider so many testimonies, where God putting vpon him the affections of man descendeth beneath his owne maiesty? He faith that he hath with stretchet out armes called y rebellious people, that he hath early and late traualled to bring them backe to him. If they will apply all these things to God, and not consider the figure, there shall arise many superfluous contentions, which this one solution bringeth to agreement, that the proprie of man is figuratively applied to GOD. Howe be it the solution which wee haue brought in an other place largely sufficeth, that although the will of God be, as to our sense manifolde: yet he doth not in himselfe diuersely will this and that, but according to this wifedom, which is diuersely manifolde (as Paul calleth it) he amaseth our senses, til it shall be given vs to know that he maruculously willeth that which now seemeth to be against his will. They also mocke with cauillations, that if God is the father of all, it is vnrighteous that he should differit any that hath not before with his owne fault determinded this punishment. As though the liberalitie of God stretcheth not euon to hoggnes & dogges, But if they speake only of mankinde, let them answere why God bound himselfe, to one people, to be the father thereof: and why also out of the same people he picked a small number as it were a floure. But their owne lust of euill speaking hindereth these railers that they consider not that God so bringeth sooth his sunne to shine vpon the good and euill, that the inheritance is layde vp for a fewe, to whom it shall one day be faide, Come ye blessed of my Father, possess the kingdom &c. They obiect also that God hateth none of these things that he hath made. Which although I graunt them, yet this remaineth safe which I teache, that the reprobates are hatefull to God, and that verie rightfully, because they being destitute of his Spirit cannot bring forth nothing but cause of curse. They say further, that there is no difference of the Iewe and the Gentile, and therefore that the grace of God is without difference sette before all men: namely if they graunt (as Paul determineth) that GOD calleth as wel out of the Iewes as out of the gentiles, according to his good pleasure, so that he is bound to no man. After this manner also is that wipe away which they obiect in an other place, that God hath enclosed all things vnder sinne, that he may haue mercie vpon all: namely because he will that the saluation of all them that are saved be ascribed to his mercie, although this

Although Christ the son of righteousness, having overcome death, rising by the Gospel, giveth vs the light of life (as Paul writeth) whereby also it is said that by believing we have passed from death into life, being now not strangers but citizens of the Saints, and of the household of God, which hath made vs to sit with the only begotten Son of himself in heavenly places, that nothing may be wanting to perfect felicity: yet least it should be grieved vs to be exercised under this hard warfare, as though we had no fruit of the victory which Christ hath gotten, we must hold fast that which is in another place taught of the nature of hope. For, because we hope for those things which appear not, & (as it is said in another place) faith is a demonstration of things invisible: so long as we are enclosed in the prison of the flesh, we are wayfaring from the Lord. For which reason the same Paul faith in another place that we are deade, and that our life is hidden with Christ in God, and that when he which is our life, shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory. This therefore is our condition, that with living soberly and justly & godly in this world, we look for the blessed hope, and the coming of the glory of the great God, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Here we need a singular patience, that we be not wearyed and either turne back our course or forsake our standing. Therefore whatsoever hath beene hitherto set out concerning our salvation, requireth mindes lifted vp to heaven, that we may love Christ whom we have not scene, and believing in him may rejoice with unspeakeable and glorious joyfulness till we receive the end of our faith, as Peter calleth vs. After which manner, Paul faith that the faith and charitie of the godly hath respect to the hope which is laide vp in heaven. When wee thus with our eyes fastened upon Christ doe hang of heaven, and nothing withhold them in earth from carrying vs to the promised blessedness: then is that truely fulfilled, Our heart is where our treasure is. Hereupon commeth that faith is so rare in the world, because nothing is more harde to our dulleth, than through innumerable steppes to climb vp about vs with enduring forward to the price of our heavenly calling. To the great heape of miseries wherewith wee bee almost overwhelmed, are added the mockinges of vngodly men, wherewith our simplicitie is rayled at, when voluntarilie forsaking the allurementes of present good things, wee seeme to follow the blessedness hidden from vs, as it were a fleeing shadowe. Finally aboue and beneath vs, before vs Vv.

and behinde vs, violent tentations beseege vs, to the substeining of the seare whereof our courages shoule bee farre too weake, vnlesse being vncumbred of earthly things they were fast bounde to the heavenly life, which in seeming is farre from vs. Wherefore onely hee hath soundly profited in the Gospell, which is enured to a continually meditation of the blessed resurrection.

2 Of the soueraigne ende of good things, the Philosophers have in olde time curiously disputed, and also struied among themselves: yet none except Plato, acknowledged the soueraigne good of man to bee his conioying with God: But what manner of conioyning that was, he could not perceive to much as with any small oft, and no man, fith hee had never learn-ed of the holy bond thereof. To vs the onely & perfect felicitie is known -even in this earthly waifaring: but, such as daily more and more intickles
-our hearts with desire of it, till the full enjoying may satisfie vs. Therefore
-1 saide that none receive fruite of the benefits of Chrift, but they that lift vp -their minds to the resurrection. For, Paul setteth vp this mark to the faith-full, toward which he faith that he endevoureth, and forgetteth all things till he come to it. And so much the more cheerfully ought we to trauaile -toward it, least this world wilholde vs, wee suffer greeuous punishment -for our slothfulness. Wherefore in an other place he marketh the faith-full with this marke, that their conversation is in heauen, from whence alio
-they looke for their Sauior. And that their courages shoulde not faynt in -this race, hee ioyneth all creatures companions with them. For, because ev-ery where are scene deformed ruines, hee faith that all things in heauen & -earth do endevoure to the renewing. For, fith Adam by his fall dissolued the -perfect order of nature to the creatures, their bondage is painful & gree-
-uous, whereunto they are subiect by reason of the finne of man, not for that -they are indued with any feeling, but for that they naturally couet the per-fest estate from which they are fallen. Therefore Paul faith that they
-grone, and are as in paine of childe bearing, that wee to whom are giuen
-the frutes of the Spiriite, may be ashamed to pine away in our corruption, and not at the leaft to followe the dead elements, which beare paine -of anothers finne. And the more to pricke vs forward, hee calleth the last -cornning of Chrift our redemption. It is true in deede that all the parts of -our redemption are already fulfilled: But because Chrift hath once beene -offered for finnes, he shall be seene againe without finne vnto salvation. With -what miseries souer we be presse, let this redemption sustaine vs even until the performance of it.

3 The verie weight of the thing is selue shal yet what our endeour. For -never doeth Paul without cause affirm that the whole Gospell is voide & deceitfull, vnlesse the dead doe rife againe: because our state shoulde bee
-more miserable than the state of all men, namely fith wee lying open to the -hatreds and reproches of many, are euerie houre in daunger, yea and are
-as sheepe appointed to the slaughter: and therefore the authentic thereof -should fall away not onely in one part, but also in the whole sum which both -our adoption and the effect of our saluation conteineth. And so let vs bee -headfully bent to the most earnest thing of all, that no continuance of time may make vs wearye. For which purpose I have deferred to this place which I had brefflie to entreate of it, that the readers may learne, when they have receiued Christ the authour of their salvation, to rise vp higher, & may knowe that he is clothed with heavenlie immortalitie and glorie, that the whole bodie may be made like fashioned to the head, as also the holly ghost oftentimes setteth foorth in his person an example of the resurrection. It is a thing hard to bee beleued, that bodies when they have beene consumed with rottenesse, shall at their appointed time rise vp againe. Therefore where manie of the Philosophers have affirmed soules to be immortal the resurrection of the flesh hath beene allowed of fewe: wherein although there was no excuse, yet we are thereby put in minde, that it is too hard a thing to draw mans lenies to beleue it. That faith may overcome so great a stoppe, the scripture ministreth two helps: the one is in the likenesse of Christ, the other is the almightinesse of God. Nowe so oft as the resurrection is thought of, let the image of Christe come into our minde: which in the nature that hee tooke of vs, so ranne out the race of mortall life, that nowe having obtained immortalitie, he is to vs a pledge of the resurrection to come. For in the natures where with wee are besieged, wee carie about his mortifying in our flethe, that his life may be openlie shewed in vs. And we may not feuer him from vs, neither can wee possiblie, but that hee must be torne in sunder. Whereupon commeth that argument of Paul, If the dead do not rife againe, then neither is Christe rifen againe, because verifie he taketh that principle for confessed, that Christe was not made subject to death, nor obtained victorie of death by rising againe, privatiely for himselfe: but, that that was begun in the head in which must needs be fulfilled in all the members, according to the degree and order of euerie one. For it were not right that they should in all points be made egual with him. It is saide in the Psalme, Thou shalt not suffer thy meeker one to see corruption although a portion of this trust pertaine to vs according to the measure of gift, yet the full effect hath not appeared but in Christ, which being free from all rosting hath receiued againe his bodie whole. Nowe leaft the fellowship of blessed resurrection with Christe shoulde bee doubtfull to vs, that we may be contented with this pledge, Paul expresliy affirmeth that he therefore stretteth in heaven, and shall come at the last day a judge, that hee may make our base and vile bodie like fashioned to the glorious bodie. In an other place also hee teacheth, that God raieth not vp his sonne from death to the intent to shewe a token of his power: but to stretch out the same effuential force of the spirite toward vs which are faithful: whom he therefore calleth life, while he liueth in vs, because he was giuen to this ende that hee should make alie that which is mortall in vs, I knit vp in a briefe abridgment those things which might both be more largelie handled, and are worthie to be more gorgeouslie set out: and yet I trust that the godlie readers shall in few words find matter enough which may suffice to edifie their faith. Christ therefore is risen againe, that hee might haue vs companions of the life to come. Hee was raieth vp of the father, in so much as hee was the head of the Church, from which he doth in no wise suffer himselfe to be plucked away. Hee was raieth vp by the power of the Spirite, which is common to vs. Vv 2.

Finally he was raised vp, that he should be resurrection and life. But as we have saide that in this mirrour, there is to be seene of vs a lively image of the resurrection, so let it be to vs a sure substance to stay our minde, so that yet we be not lothfull or weari of long tarrying,because it is not our part to measure the seasons of times by our will, but patiently to rest, till God at his owne fit time repair his kingdome. To which purpose seemeth that exhortation of Paul: The first fruites is Christ: and then they that are Christes, cewrie one in his order. But that no question should be made of the resurrection of Christ, vpon which the resurrection of vs al is founded, we see by how manie and how divers means hee hath made it approacht by witnesses to vs. Fine nosed men will laugh at the historie which the Evangelists rehearse, as at a childish mockery. For of what importance shal the message be which scarefull silly women bring, and afterward the disciples conforme being in a manner astonished? Why did not Christ rather set vp the triumphant ensignes of his victorie in the midst of the temple & the market place? Why came he not forth terrible into the fight of Pilate: Why doth he not also prove himself to the priestes, & to whole Jerusalem that he is risen vp alive again? As for the witnesses which hee chofe, prophane men will scarcely grant them to be sufficient. I anfwer that although in these beginnings the weakeenesse thereof was contemptible, yet all this was governed by the wonderful providence of God: that partly the loute of Christ and zeale of godlinesse, and partly their owne hardnes of beleefe should carry them in haft to the sepulchre which had lately been dismaied for feare, that they might not only be seeing witnesses of the thing, but also should heare of the Angels that which they sawe with their eyes. Howe shall we suspect their credite, who thought it to be a fable which they had heard of the women, till they were brought to the present sight of the thing it self? As for all the people and the Ruler himself, after they had byn largely conuinced, it is no maruel if as wel the fight of Christ, as other signes, was not granted them. The sepulchre was seald vp, the watchmen watched it, the thirde daie the bodie was not founde, The soldierrs corrupted with mony scattered a rumor that his disciples had stolen him awaie, As though they had had power to gather a band together, or had armure, or were practis'd men to enterprise any such feate. If the soldiers had not courage enough to drive them away, why did they not pursueth the, that with the helpe of the people they might have taken some of them? Pilate therefore with his ring truely seald the resurrection of Christ: & the watchme which were set at the sepulchre both in their holding their peace & in their lying, were made publishers of the same resurrection. In the meane time the voice of Angels founded, He is risen, he is not here. The heavenly glistering plainly shewed that they were not men but Angels. Afterward, if there remained any doubting, Christ himselfe tooke it away. The disciples saw him other than once, and also felt his feete and his hands, and their hardnes of beleuing not a little profited to the strengthening of our faith. He disputeth among them of the mysteries of the kingdome of God, and at the last in their fightes beholding him, he ascended into heauen. And not onely this sight was shewed to the xi Apostles, but also he was seene at once of moe than fute hundred bre-

brethren. Nowe when he sent the holy Ghost, hee shewed a sure proffee not onely of life, but also of the soueraigne power: as hee had faide before, It is profitable for you that I go: otherwase the holy Ghost shall not come. But now Paul was overthrowen by the way, not by the strength of a dead man, but hee felte him whom he persecuted to have nost high power. To Stephen hee appeared for another ende, namely that with assurcne of life hee might overcome the feare of death. To discrede so many authentike witnessses, is not onely a parte of distrustfulnesse, but also of frowarde and furious flubbornesse.

4 Thus which wee have faide, that in prouing the resurrection our senses must be directed to the infinite power of God, Paul briefely teacheth, that he may make (faith he) our vile bodie like fashioned to body of his brightnesse, according to the working of his power, by which hee may subdue all things to himselfe. Wherefore nothing is more vnmeet, than here to have respect what may naturally be done, where an inestimable miracle is for before vs, which with the greatestnesse thereof swallowed vp our senses. Yea, Paul by setting forth an example of nature, reprowe thee their dullest which denie the resurrection. Thou fool (faith he) that which thou sawest is not quickened vnlesse it first dye, &c. Hee faith that in seed is seen a forme of the resurrection, because out of rottennesse groweth corne. Neither were it to hard a thing to believe, if we were as heedefull as we ought to be to the miracles which through out all the coasts of the world doe offer themselves to our eyes. But let vs remember that none is truely perswade of the resurrection to come, but he which being rauished into admiration, giveth to the power of God his glorie. Ely lifted vp with this affiance, crieth out, Thy dead shall live, my carcasse shall rise againe. Awake ye, & praiye ye dwellers of the dust. In despaired case he lifted vp himselfe to God the author of life, in whose hand are the ends of death, as it is said in the Psalme. Iob also being liker to a carrion than to a man, trusting vpon the power of God sticketh not as though hee were whole & sound to lift vp himselfe to that day, saying, I knowe that my redeemer liueth: and in the last day hee shall rise vpon the dust (namely to shewe forth his power therein) and I shall againe be compassed with my skinne, & in my flesh I shall see God, I shall see him, and none other. For albe it that some do suttellely wrest these places, as though they ought not to be understand of the resurrection, yet they strengthen y which they couet to overthrowe: because the holy men in their euils seek comfort from no where else, than from the likeness of the resurrection. Which better appeareth by the place of Ezechiel. For when the Iewes beleued not the promise of their returnde, and objected that it was no more likely that a way shoulde bee made open for them, than that dead men shoulde come out of their grave; there was a vision shewed to the Prophet, a field full of drie bones: those the Lorde commundeth to take againe flesh and sinewes. Although vnder that figure he raiseth vp the people to hope of returne; yet the matter of hoping hee gathereth of the resurrection: as it is to vs an examplar of the deliverances which the faithfull doe seale in this world. So Christ when hee had taught that the voyce of the Gospell giueth life: because the Iewes receiued not this, he by and by saide. John 5.27

Cap. 25. Of the manner how to recieve

further: Maruell not at this, because the houre commeth in which all that are in the graves shall heare the voice of the sonne of God, and shall come forth. Therefore after this example of Paul, let vs therefore, as in the midst of battells, where he which hath promis'd life to come, is mightie to keepe that which is left with him: and so let vs glory that a crowne of righ'teousnesse is dyes vp for vs, which the iust judge shall deliver vs. So shall it come to passe, that whatsoever greues us suffereth, they shall be to vs a shewing of the life to come, because it agreeth with the nature of God to render affliction to the wicked which affliet vs: but to vs which are vnjustly affliet, rest at the appearing of Christ with the Angels of his power, in a flame of fire. But that is to bee holden which he addeth by & by afterward, that he shall come that he may be glorified in his saints, and make wonderfull works on all them that have beleued, because the GoSpell hath beene beleued.

5 But although the mindes of men ought to have beene continually occupied in this studie, yet as though they would offer purpose destroy all remembrance of the resurrection, they have called death the uttermost bond of all things and the destruction of man. For ruly Salomon speaketh of the common and received opinion, when hee faith that a living dogge is better than a dead Lyon. And in another place: Who knoweth whether the soule of a man goe vpwarde, and the soule of a beast goe downwarde? But in all ages this brutish sensellese error hath beene common in the worlde, yea and hath broken into the Church it selfe: for the Sadduces have presumed to profess openly that there is no resurrection, yea & that soules are mortal. But that this gross ignorance should not helpe to excuse any man, the infidels eu'n by verie infinit of nature haue alway had an image of the resurrection before their eyes. For to what purpose serveth that holy & inviolable manner of burying, but to be an earnest of newes life? Neither may it bee answered that this spring of error: because the religioussesse of burial was alway in vre among the holy Fathers, and God willed the same manner to remaine among the Gentiles, that an image of the resurrection set before them might awake their drownes. But although that ceremonial wate his yse of profiting, yet it is profitable for vs if we wisely mark the ende of it, because it is no slender consutation of vnbeliefs, that altogetherprofess that which no man beleued. But Saran hath not onely astonisht the senses of men, so that they haue buried with the bodies the remembrance of the resurrection, but also hath practised to corrupt this parte of doctrine with divers fained inventions, that at length it might utterly die. I passe over how in Pauls time Satan began to pincht at it: but in a little after there followed y Millenaries, which limitted the raigne of Christ to a thousand yeres. This error is so childish, y it needeth not or is not worthie of any consutation. Neither doth y Revelation make on their side, by which it is certaine that they colored their errors for as much as in the place where he mentioneth y number of a thousand, he entreateth not of the eternal blessednesse of the church, but only of the divers troubles which were to come vpon the church while it yet travelled in earth. But the whole Scripture cryeth out that there shall be no ende of the blessednesse of the elelote, nor of the punishment of the.
the reprobate. Now of all things which both are hidden from our sight and disfarce passe the capacitie of our minde, either wee must fetch the credite out of the certaine oracles of God, or we must utterly cast it away. They which asigne to the children of God a thousand yeres to enjoy the inheritance of the life to come, do not marke how great a dishonor they doe both to Christ and his kingdom. For if they shall not be cloched with immortallitie: then neither is Christ himselfe, to whose glory they shalbe newly fashioned, received into the immortal glorie. If their blessedneffe shall have any end: then the kingdom of Christ, upon the stedfastnes whereof: it standeth, endureth but for a time. Finally, either they are most vnskilful of all matter concerning God, or they go about with crooked maliciousnes to overthrow the whole grace of God & power of Christ, the fulfilling wherof is no otherwise perfect, but when sinne being blotted out & death swallowed vp, eternal life is fully restored. But very blind men may see how fondly they plaie the foole: which feare that they shoulde ascribe to God too great cruelty if the reprobate be condemned to everlafting paines. The Lorde forboth shall doe wrong, if he deny his kingdom to them which haue by their unthankfulness made themselves vnworthy of it. But (fay they) their sinnes endure but for a time. I graunt: but the majestie, yea and the righteousnes of God which they haue offended by sinning, is eternal. Worthy therefore the remembrance of iniquitie dieth not: But so the pain exceedeth the measure of the fault. This is a blasphemie not to be suffred, why the majestie of God is so little set by, when the desparing thereof is esteemed at no greater value than the destruction of one soule. But let vs leave these trifles, least contrary to that which we haue before saide, we may seeme to judge their dotages worthy of confutation.

6 Beside these there haue bin two other doting errors brought in by me peruerstely curious. The one forth thought, as though the whole man died, that the soules shall live againe with the bodies. The other forasmuch as they graunt that the soules be immortall spirites, saie that they shalbe clothed with new bodies: whereby they denies the resurrection of the flesh. Of the first sore: becaus I haue touched somwhat in speaking of the creation of man, it shalbe enough for me to warne the readers againe, howe beastly an error it is to make of a spirit fashioned after the image of God, a vanishing blast which doth nothing but quicke the body in this fraile life, and to bring the temple of the holy Ghost to nothing. Finally, to spoile that parte of vs wherein diuinitye chiefly shineth & markes of immortalitie appeareth, to spoile it (I say) of this gift: so that the estate of the body should be better and more excellent than the estate of the soule. The scripture teacheth far otherwise, which compareth the body to a cought, out of which it saith that we remove when we die, because it esteemeth vs by that part which maketh vs differing from brute beastes. So Peter being nigh to death, saith that the time is come, when he must lay away his tent, And Paul speaking of the faithfull after that he hath saied: That when our earthly house shalbe dissolved, there is a building for vs in heauen, adiogneth that we are wayfaring from the Lorde so long as wee abide in the bodie, but doe desire the presence of God in the absence of the bodie. If the soules do not ouerlive the bodie.
dies, what is it that hath God present when it is seuered from the body? But the Apostles takeeth away all doubting, when he teacheth that we are joyned in fellowship to the spirites of the righteous. By which words he teacheth, that we are joyned in fellowship to the holy fathers, which even beeing dead do keepe the same godlineesse with vs, so that we cannot be the members of Christ vnlesse we growe together with them. Vnlesse also the soules being vncladed of the bodies, diu'd keepe their substance and were able to receive blissed glorie, Christ would not haue saide to the thesse: This day shall be with me in paradize. Having so cleare testimonies, let vs not doubt after the example of Christ when we are dying, to commend our soules to God, or after the example of Stephen to commit them to Christ to keep, which not unworthily is called a faithfull shepheard and Bishop of them. To enquire of their meanse state, is neither lawfull nor expedient. Manie do much conuerse themselfes with disputing what place they keepe, and whether they do now enjoy the heavenly glorie or no. but it is folly & rashnes, to search deepeler of unkonwne thinges, than God doeth giue vs leave to knowe. When the Scripture hath saide that Christ is present with them, and receiued them into paradize that they maie enjoye comfort, on the other side that the soules of the reprobate does suffer such paines as they haue deserved: it goeth no further. What teacher or maister shall nowe open to vs that which God hath hidden: Of the place, the question is no lesse fonde & vain: forasmuch as we know that there is not the same dimension of the soule which is of the bodie, Whereas the blessed gathering together of holy spirites is called the bosome of Abraham, it is enough for vs after this wayfaring to be received of the common father of the faithful, that he maie communicate with vs the fruit of his faith. In the meane time sith the Scripture euery where biddeth vs to hang upon the expectation of Christs comming, and differreth the crowne of glorie till then: let vs bee content with these bonides appointed vs of God: namely, that the soules of the godlie hauing ended the labour of their weare, go into a blessed rest, where with happy joyfulnesse they looke for the enjoying of the promis'd glorie, and that so all things are holden in suspens till Christ the redeemer appeare. As for the reprobate, it is no doubt that they have the same estate which Iude asigneth to the diuels, to be holden bound with chains, till they be drawn to the punishment whereunto they are condemned.

7 No lesse monstrous is their error, which imagine that soules shall not receive againe the same bodies wherewith they are nowe clothed, but that haue newe and other bodies. And the reason of the Manichees was very truethfull, that is, that it is not meete that flesh which is vnclene should rise againe. As though there were no vncleneesse of soules, which yet they debarred not from the hope of everlasting life. It was therefore all one as if they should say that that which is infectted with the filth of sinne cannot be cleansed by God. For I now passe over that dogme, that flesh was naturally vnclene, because it was create of the Diuel. Onely I shewe that whatsoever is now in vs vnworthie of heaven, it hindereth not the resurrection. And first whereas Paul biddeth the faithfull to cleanse themselves from all defiling of the flesh and of the Spirite, thereupon followeth the judgement which which he in another place pronounceth, 'therefore man shall receive by his body either good or evil. Wherein agreeeth that which he writeth to the Corinthians, that the life of Jesus Christ may be openly shewed in our mortal flesh. For which reason in another place he doth no lese prays that God preserue the bodies whole unto the day of Christ, than the soules and spirites. And no marvel, because it were a most great abjuriditie that the bodies which God hath dedicate to bee temples to himselfe, should fall away into rottennesse without hope of rising again. What saie we to this, that they are also the members of Christ that God commandeth all the partes of them to be sanctified to himselfe? that hee will with his name to bee praysed with tongues, pure handes to be lifted vp to him, sacrifices to bee offered? What madenesse is it therefore that that parte to which the heauenly judge hath vouchsafed to grant so great honour, should be brought from a mortal man into dust without any hope of restoring? Likewise when Paul shorteth vs to suffer the Lord as well in bodie as in soule, because both belong to God, verily he suffereth not that which he calengeth to God as holy, to bee adjudged to eternall rottennesse. Neither is there a plainer determination of the Scripture for any thing, than for the rising againe of this flesh which we bare. This corruptible (faith Paul) must put on vn corruption, and this mortal must put on immortalitie. If God did make new bodies, where is this changing of quality? if it had been said ye we must be renued, the doubtfull speech paraduence mought haue given occasion to their cauallation. But nowe when pointing with his finger to the bodies whereby we are cloathed, he promiseth them vn corruption, he plainly enough denieth anye newe bodies to be made. Yea he could not (faith Tertullian) speake more plainly, unless hee had holden his owne skinne in his hande. And they can by no caussian escape from this, that wherein in an other place he faith 'Christ shalbe the judge of the world, he alleageth this testimonie of Esaias, Esa.49.18. live (faith the Lord) euery knee shall bow to me: forasmuch as he plainly pronounceth that they to whom he speaketh shall subject yeld an account of their life, which could not agree, if newe bodies should be brought before the judgement. Now in the wordes of Daniel there is no doubtfulnesse: And manie of them that sleepe in the earth of dust, shall awake, some to eternall life, and some to reproches and to everlafting contempt; such the fettewed of newe matter out of the foure elements to make me, but calleth dead men out of their graves. And this very plain reale teacheth. For if mortality which taketh beginning at the fall of man, be accidental: then the repairing which Christ brought, pertaineth to the same bodye which beganne to bee mortal. And truely, whereas the Athenians laughed when Paul affirmed the resurrection, thereupon we may gather what manner of resurrection he preached: and that same laughing not finally availleth to strengthen our faith. The saying of Christ ifo is worthy to be noted: Fear not them which kill the body, & can not kil the soule: but feare him which can throwe both the soule and the body into hell fire. For there is no cause to feare, vnlesse the body which we now beare be subject to punishment. And no lese plaine is an other saying of the same Christ. The house commeth, when all they that are in graves, shall heare the voyce of the soune of God, & shall come forth; forth: they that have done good, into the resurrection of life: but they that have done evil, into the resurrection of judgement. Shall we say that souls rest in the graves, that they lying there may beare Christ? and not rather that at his commandement the bodies shall returne into the lineallines which they had left? Moreover if we shall have new bodies gisuen vs, where is the like fashioning of the head & the members? Christ rase againe: was it with forging to himselfe a newe body? No, but as hee had saide before, Destroy this temple, & in three daies I will build it vp: he rasse againe the same body which he had before borne mortal. For he had not much profted vs, if a newe body being put in place, the olde body had beene destroyed, which was offred vp for a sacrifice of satisfactory cleansing. We must al.so hold fast that fellowship which the Apostle preacheth: That we rase againe, because Christ hath risen againe: for nothing is lesse probable than that our flesh in which we bear about the mortifying of Christ, shoule be depur'd of this resurrection of Christ. Which verily appeareth by a notable example, when at the rising againe of Christ many bodies of the Saintes came out of the graves. For it cannot be denied that this was a forshewing, or rather an earnest of the last resurrection which wee hope for: such as was before in Enoch and Elias, whom Terrilien calleth New poftfessors of the resurrection: because they being in body & soule deliuered from corrupcion, were received into the keeping of God.

8 I am ashamed in so cleare a matter to spend so many wordes: but the readers that contentedly bear this trouble with me, that no hole may be openc for frowarde and bolde wittes to deceive the simple. The flesch spirits with whom I now dispute, bring forth a fained invention of their own brain that at the resurrection there shalbe a creation of new bodies. What reason moueth them to thinke so, but because it seemeth to them incredible, that a canion consumed with so long rotteneffe should returne into his auncient state? Therefore onelee vnbeliefe is the mother of this opinion. But vs on the other side: fpirit of God ech where in the Scripture exhorteth to hope for the resurrection of our flesch. For this reason baptism(e as Paul wittnessth) is to vs a seal of the resurrection to come: and likewise the holy Supper allureth vs to the trust thereof, when we receive with our mouth the signes of spirituall grace. And truely the whole exhortation of Paul,that wee give our members to be weapons vnto the obedience of righteounnesse, shoule be cold vnlesse that were ioyned which he addeth afterarde. He that hath raised vp Christ from the dead, shall quicklie also your mortal bodies. For what should it profitte to applye our feete, handes, eyes, and tongues vnto the service of GOD? vnlesse they were partakers of the fruite and reward? Which thing Paul plainly confirmeth with his owne wordes, saying: The bodie not to fornication, but to the Lorde: and the Lorde to the bodie. And hee that hath raised vp Christe, shall also raise vp vs by his power. More plaine are those wordes which followe: that our bodies are the temples of the holy Ghost and the members of Christ. In the meane time we fee howe he ioyneth the resurrection with chastitie and holinesse, as a little after he saith that the price of redemption pertaineth also to the bodies. Nowe it were not reasonable that the body of Paul, in which hee hath hath borne the prints of Christ, & in which he honorably glorified Christ, should looke the reward of the crowne. Whereupon also came that glorying. We looke for the redeemer from heaven, which shall make our vile body like fashioned to the bodie of his brightnes. And if this be true, that we must by many afflictions enter into the kingdom of God, no reason sufficient to debarre the bodies from this entry which God both exerciseth under the standard of the cross, and honoureth with the praise of victorie. Therefore of this matter there arose among the saints no doubting, but that they hoped to be companions of Christ, which remoueth into his own person all the afflictions wherewith we are prooued, to teach that they bring life. Yea and under the lawe he exercised the holy fathers in this faith with an outward ceremony. For to what purpose served the viage of burying, as we have already shewed, but that they should know, that there is newe life prepared for the bodies that are laid vp? Hereunto also tended the spices & other signes of immortalitie, wherewith under the law the darknes of faith was holpen even as it was by the sacrifices. Neither was that maner breede by superstition, forasmuch as we see that the Spirit doeth no leffe diligently rehearse burials than the chiefe mysteries of faith. And Christ commendeth that worke as a speciall worke, truly for none other reason but because it lifteth vp our eyes from beholding of his grace which corrupteth & destroyeth all, to the sight of the renewing. Moreover the so diligent observing of the ceremonie which is praiised in the Fathers, sufficiently proueth that it was to them a rare and precious helpe of faith. For neither would Abraham have so carefully provided for the burying place of his wife, vnsleepe there had bene set before his eyes a religion and a profite hyer than the world, namely that garnishing the dead body of his wife with the signes of the resurrection he might confirme both his owne faith and the faith of his householder. But a clearer proofe of this thing appeareth in the example of Jacob, which to ralifie to his posteritie that the hope of the promised lande was not euon by death fallen out of his minde, commanded his bones to be carried thither. I beseech you, if he was to be clothed with a newe body, shoulde he not haue giuen a fond commandement concerning duft that should be brought to nothing? Wherefore if the authoritie of the Scripture bee of any force with vs, there can be required of no doctrine either a more cleare or more certaine proofe. For this euon children undersetand by the words of resurrection, and raisinge vp againe. For neither can we call it the resurrection of that which is nowe first created, neither shoulde that saying of Christ stand fast, Whatsoever the Father hath giuen mee, it shall not perish but I will raise it vp in the last day. To the same purpose serveth the word of sleeping, which pertaineth onely to the bodies. Whereupon also burying places were called Cemeteria, sleeping places. Nowe it remaineth that I speake somewhat of the manner of the resurrection. I vs this word, because Paul calling it a mysticke, exhorteth vs to sobrietie, and bridleth the libertie to dispute like Philosophers treuely and stuffe of it. First we must hold, as we haue said, that wee shall rise againe in the same flesh which wee beare, as touching the substance, but the qualitie shall be other. As when the same flesh of Christ which had bene offered for sacrifice, was raised vp againe, yet it excelled.

Cap. 25. Of the maner how to recee\^e celled in other qualities as if it had bene altogether another *flesh. Which thing Paul declareth by familiar examples. For as there is all one substance of the flesh of a man, & of a beast, but not all one quality: as all firres have like matter, but not like brightness; so he teacheth that though we shall kepe still the substance of our body, yet there shall be a change, that the state of it may be much more excellent. The bodie therefore, that we may be rased vp againe, shall not perish nor vanish away: but putting of corruption, it shall put on vn-corruption. But forasmuch as God hath all the elements ready at his beck, no hardinesse shall hinder him, but he may command both *earth and waters and fire, to render that which seemeth to be consumed by them. Which also E*sayeth though not without a figure, where he faith, Be*hold, the Lord shall go foorth of his place, that he may visit the iniquity of the earth: and the earth shall discover her bloude, & shall no more hide her dead. But there is to be noted a difference betweene them that haue bin deade long before, and those whom that day shall finde alieue. For we shall not all sleepe (as Paul faith) but we shall all be changed; that is to say, it shall not be of necessitie that there be a distance of time betwene death & the beginning of the second life; because in a moment of time, & in the twinkling of an eye the sound of the trumpet shall pierce, to rase vp the dead vn-corruptible, & with a loudaine change to fashion againe the living into the same glory. So in another place he comforteth the faithfull which must die: because they which shall then remaine alieue shall not go before the dead, but rather they shall first rife againe which have slept in Christ. If any obiect that saying of the Apostle, that it is appointed to all mortall men once to die, it is easie to answere it with saying that when the state of nature is changed, it is a kinde of death, and is fitly so called. And therefore these things agree well together, that all shall be raued by death when they shall put of their mortall body: & yet that it is not necessarie that there be a severing of the body and the soule where there shall be a sudden changing.

9 But here ariseth a harder question: by what right the resurrection which is the singular benefit of Christ is common also to the wicked and the accrue\^ed of God. We knowe that all were in Adam condemned to *death. Christe came the resurrection & life. Came he to give life to all mankind universally without choice? But what is more against reason than that, that they shoule by their obstinate blindness obtaine that which the godly worshippers of God do obteyne by onely faith? Yet this remaineth certaine, that there shall be one resurrection of judgement, and another resurrection of life, and that Christ shall come to sever the Lambs from the goats. I answer, that this ought not to seeme strange, the likenes of which we see in daily experience. We see that in Adam wee were depreied of the inheritance of the whole world, and that we are by no lesser just reason debarred from common food, than from the eating of the tree of life. Whence then commeth it to passe, that God doth not onely make his Sunne to rife upon the good & euill, but also as touching the vies of this present life, his inestimable liberalitie continually floweth forthe to them with large plentiousnesse? Hereby verily wee knowe that those things which properly belong to Christ and his members, do alfo overflowe to the wicked, not that it is their rightfull possession, but that that they may be made the more inexcusable, So the wicked do sometimes finde God beneficent, by more than mean prooves, yea such as sometime doe darken all the blessings of the goodlie, but yet doe turne to their greater damnation. If any man object, that the resurrection is not fitly compared to fading and earthly benefite: heere also I asssure that so soone as they were estranged from God the fountain of life, they deliuered the death of the Diumell, whereby they should be utterly destroyed: Yet by the marvellous counsel of God there was founde a mean state that out of life they might live in death. No more absurd it ought to seeme, if the resurrection happen to the wicked, which draweth them against their willes to the judgement state of Christ, whom now they refuse to heare for their master and teacher. For it were a small paine to be consumed away with death, if they were not to suffer punishment for their obstinate, brought before the judge, whose vengeance they haue without ende and measure proouced against themselves. But although we must hold that which wee have saide, and which that notable confession of Paul before Felix containeth, that he looketh for the resurrection of the righteous & wicked: yet the Scripture often times setteth forth election together with the heavenly glory to the only children of God: Because Christ properly came not to the destruction, but to the salvation of the world. Therefore in the Creadore there is made mention of the blessed life only.

10. But forasmuch as the prophetic of death swallowed vp by victorie, that then and not till then be fulfilled: let vs alway haue in minde the eternal felicitie, the ende of the resurrection: of the excellencie whereof, if all things were spoken which the tongues of men were able to speake, yet fearely the smalllest parcel thereof should be expressed. For bowsoever we truely heare that the kingdom of God shall be stuffed full with brightnesse, joy, felicitie, and glorie: yet those things that are spoken of are most farre remooued from our sense, and remaine as it were wrapped in darknesse, yet till that day come when he himselfe shall gie vs his glory to be seen face to face. We knowe (faith John) that we are the children of God, but it hath not yet appeared. But when we haue like to him, then we shall see him such as he is. Wherefore the Prophets, because they could by no words express the spiritual blessednesse in it selfe, did in a manner grossly portray it out vnder bodily things. But forasmuch as the seruentnesse of desire muste with some tafft of that sweetnesse be kindled in vs, let vs chiefly continue in this thought, that if God do as a certaine fountain which cannot be drawn drye, containe in him the fulnesse of all good things, nothing is beyond him to be coveted of them that tende toward the soueraigne good & the full perfection of felicitie: as we are taught in manie places.

Of the manner how to receive himselfe to them to be enjoyed, and (which is better) will after a certaine manner grow into one with them: let vs remember that under this benefite is contained all kinde of felicite. And when we have much profited in this meditation, let vs acknowledge that wee yet stay beneath at the bottome of the roorees if the conceiving of our minde be compared with the higheffe of this mysterie. Wherefore in this behalfe wee must kepe sobrieter, least with how much greater boldnes we shall fly vp on he being vnmindful of our owne small measure, to much more the brightnesse of the heauenlye glorie ouerwhelme vs. We feele also howe the vnmeasurable greatinesse to knowe more than is lawfull, tickleth vs: from whence both tritling & hurtfull questions doe spring from time to time: tritling I call those of which there can no profite be gathered. But this seconde kind is worse, because they which give themselves to them, doe entangle themeselues with pernicious speculations, and therefore I call them hurtfull. That which the Scriptures doe teach, ought to be out of all doubt with vs: namely that as God diversly distributing his gifts to the Saintes in this world, doeth unequally enlighten them, so the measure of glorie that not be equall in heauen where God shall crowne his gifts. For neither doth this belong indifferently to all which the Paul faith. Ye are my glorie and crowne in the day of Christ: nor also that saying of Christ to the Apostles: Ye shall sit judging the twelve tribes of Israel. But Paul (which knew that as God enricheth the holy ones with spiritual gifts in earth, so hee beautifieth them with glorie in heauen) doeth not that there is a peculiar crowne layde vp for him according to the rate of his labours. And Christ to set forth to the Apostles the dignitie of the office which they did beare, telleth them that the fruit of the same is laide vp for them in heauen. So Daniel also faith, But the wife shall shine as the brightnesse of the firmament, and they which justify many, as Stars to the worldes ende and for ever. And if a man heedfully consider the Scriptures, they doe not onely promise eternalall life to the faithfull, but also speciall reward to every one. Whereupon commeth that saying of Paul, The Lorde render to him in that day. Which the promise of Christ confirmeth, Ye shall receive a hundred foldes in the eternall life. Finally, as Christ beginneth in this world the glorie of his bodie with manifold diversitie of gift, and encreaseth it by degrees: so he shall also make it perfect in heauen.

Curious questions concerning the different degrees of blesse"dnes.

But as all the godly will receive this with one consent, because it is sufficiently testified by the worde of God: so on the other side leaving crabbed questions, which they shall know to be a hinderance to them, they will not passe their appointed boundes. As for my part, I doe not onely privately forbear superfluous searching of vnprofitable things, but I also thinke that I ought to beware that I do not with answering nourish the lightnesse of other. Men hungry of vaine knowledge doe ask howe great and the distance betweene the Prophets and the Apostles, and againe betweene the Apostles and the Martyrs: howe many degrees Virgins differ from married folkes: finally, they leave no corner of heauen vnsearched. Then it commeth to their minde to enquire to what purpose serueth the repairing of the world. Why the children of GOD shall need nothing of all this this so great and incomparable plenty: but shall be like to the Angels, whose not eating is a signe of the eternall blessednesse. But I answere that in the very sight there shall be great pleasantnesse, so great sweetnesse in the onely knowledge without any vfe, that this felicite shall farre passe all the helps where with we be now holpen. Let vs imagine our felues to be set in the most wealthe coast of the world, and where we shall want no pleasure: yet who is there whom his sickness do not sometime hinder, and not suffer to vse the benefits of God? Who is there whose course his owne intemperance doth not oft breake in sunder? Whereupon followeth that a cleare enjoying and pure from all faults, although there be no vfe of corruptible life, is the perfection of felicitie. Some go further & aske whether drosse & other corruptions in mettles, be not farre from restoring and are contraire to it. Which though in some respects I graunt them, yet I looke with Paul for the repairing of these faults which tooke their beginning at sinne, toward which repairing they gone and are in travaile. Yet they proceede further, and aske what better estate is prepared for man, sith the blessing of issue shal be at an ende. This knot is also cafe to bee loosed. Whereas the Scripture so honorably setteth out that kinde of blessing, that is referred to the encreases wherewith God continually draweth forward the order of nature her marke: but in the perfection it is knowen that there is another maner. But sith the vnware are easily taken with allurements, and then the maze draweth them in deeper, & at length when every mans devises please himselfe there is no end of straining: therefore let this be a short way for vs, to bee contented with the glasse & darke speech vntill we shall see face to face. For fewe of a great multitude care which way they may go to heaven: but all do before their time couet to know what is done there. All being commonly sluggish and flowe to enter into battailes, do already paint out to themselves imagined triumphes.

12 Now because no description can match the grievousnes of the vengeance of God vpon the repobars, their tormentes and paines are figured to vs by bodily things, namely by darkenesse, weeping, gnashing of teeth, vnquenchable fire, and a worme endlessely gnawing the hearte. For by such manners of speech it is certaine that the holy Ghost meant to trouble all our senses with horrour: as when it is saide that there is prepared from eternitie a depe Hell, that the nourishmentes thereof are fire and much woode: that the blast of the Lorde, as a streame of brimstone, doth set it on fire. As by such things we must be holpen after a certaine manner to conceive the miserable state of the wicked, so we ought chiefly to fasten our thought vpon this howe wretched a thing it is to be estranged from the fellowship of God: and not that onely, but also to seele the maiestie of God so bent against thee, that thou canst not escape but be fast strained of it. For first his displeasure is like a most violent fire, with touching wherof all things are devoured and swallowed vp. Then, all creatures to ferue him to execute his judgement, that they to whom the Lord shall so shewe his wrath, shall seele the heauen, earth, sea, and bests, as it were with cruell indignatio enflamed against them and armed to their destruction. Wherefore it is no small thing that the Apostle pronounceth, when he faith that the unbelieving shall suffer eternall punishment by dying from the face of the Lord, & from the glorie of his power. And so oft as the Prophets do caft vs in feare, with bodily figures, although they speake nothing excessively for our dulnes, yet they addc forethewinges of the judgement to come, in the Sunne and the Moone and the whole frame of the worlde. Wherefore the vnhappy con-

The winde, from feeling themselves to be torne in pecces by God being angrily bent against them, from being pearced and launced with deadly stings, from trembling at the lightning of God, & being broosed with the weight of his handes, so that it is much more eafe to enter into all bottomlesse depths and devouing pittes, than to stand one moment in those terrours. What & how great then is this, to be pressed with everlafting and neuer ceasing siefe of him? Of which thing the 90. Psalme containeth a notable sentence: that although with only sight he scatter abroad all mortal men and bring them to nought, yet his worshippers, how much more fearefull they are in the world, so much more he enforceth them and pricke th them forward index with the crosse, untill he be all in all.

THE FOURTH BOOKE OF THE INSTITUTION OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION, which intreateth of the outward means or helps, whereby God allureth vs into the fellowship of Christe and holdeth vs therein.

The first Chapter. Of the true Church, which we ought so kepe unitie, because it is the mother of all the godly.

Hat by Faith of the Gospel Christ is become ours, and we be made partakers of the salvation brought by him & of eternal blessednes, is already declared in the last book. But becauсе our rudenes, & slowness, yea and vanity of wit, do need outward helps wherby Faith in vs may both be engedred, and grow and encrease in proceeding toward the mark wherunto it tendeth: God hath also added the thery to provide for our weak-

nes. And the Preaching of the Gospel might flourish, he hath left this treasure with his church. He hath appointed Pastors & teachers, by whose mouth he might teach them: he hath furnished the with authority, finally he hath left nothing undone that might auaile to the holy content of faith and right order. First of all he hath ordeined Sacraments, which we find by experience to be more than profitable helps to nourish & confirm Faith. For because beeing enclosed in the prison of our fleth, wee do not yet attaine to the degree of Angels, God applying himself to our capacity according to his wonderful To Salvation.

wonderful prudence, hath appointed a mean whereby we being far distant from him might come unto him. Wherefore the order of teaching requireth that now we entreat of the Church, and of the government, orders & power of it, & then of the Sacraments, & lastly of the civil order: & thereby that we call away the godly readers from those corruptions wherewith Satan in the Papacie hath depraved all things that God hath appointed for our salvation. I will begin at the Church, into whose bosome God will have his children to be gathered together, not only that they should by her helpe & ministry be nourished while they are infants & young children, but also be ruled by her motherly care till they growe to ripere age, & at length come to the mark of faith. For it is not lawful that those things be seuered which God hath conioyned, that to whom he is a Father, the Church bee also their mother: and that not only vnder the law, but also since the coming of Christ, as Paul witeneth, which teacheth that we are the children of the new and heavenly Hierusalem.

2 In the Creede, where we professe that wee beleue the Church, that is not spoken only of the visible Church whereof we nowe entreat, but of all the elect of God, in whose number they are also comprehended that are departed by death. And therefore this word Beleue is there set, because of times there can no other difference be noted betwixt the children of God and the vngodly, betwixt his peculiar flocke and saueage beastes. For whereas many do interlace this word, In, that is without probable reason. I grant indeed that it is the more commonly used, and also ywnteth not the consenting testimonie of antiquitie, forasmuch as even the Niceen Creede, as it is reported in the Ecclesiasticall historie, addeth the preposition, In. But there withall wee may marke by the writings of the ancients Fathers, that it was received without controversy to say, that they beleued the Church and not in the Church. For Augustine, and that ancient writer whatsoever he was, whose worke remaineth vnder the name of Cyprian concerning the exposition of the Creede, doth not only so speake themselves, but also do expressly note that it shoulde be an vnproper manner of speaking if the preposition were adijonned, & they conforme their opinion with no trifling reason. For we therefore testify that we beleue in God because upon him as a true speaker our mind reposeth itself, and in him our confidence resteth, which could not so conventionally be spoken to say in the Church no more than it could be said, I beleue in the forgiuenesse of sinnes, or in the resurrection of the fleshe. Therefore although I would not truie about words, yet I had rather follow the proprietie of speaking that shoulde be fittest to expresse the matter, than curiously to seeke for formes of speech whereby the matter may without cause be darkned. But the end is, that wee shoulde knowe that although the diuell attempt all meanes to ouerthrow the grace of Christ, and though the enemies of God bee carried with violent rage to the same intent; yet it cannot be extinguished, nor the blood of Christ bee made barren, but that it will bring forth some fruite. And so is both the secret election of God and his inwarde calling to be considered: because hee alone knoweth who be his; and holdeth them inclosed vnder a scale as Paul teacheth it: laying that they beeare his tokens whereby they may bee feuerallie knoune from the reprobate. But because a small and contemptible number lieth hid vnder a huge multitude, and a fewe graines of wheate are covered with a heape of chaffe, to God onlie is it to be left the knowledge of his Church, the foundation whereof is his secrete election. But it is not sufficient to conceive in thought and minde the multitude of the elect, vnleffe we thinke vppon such an unitive of the Church into which wee be truelie persuaded that we our selues be ingrafted. For vnleffe we be vnder our head Christ vnited together with all the rest of his members, there abideth for vs no hope of the inheritance to come. It is therefore called Catholike or vniversal, because we cannot finde two or three Churches but that Christ must be torne in sunder, which cannot be done, But all the elect of God are so knote together in Christ, that as they hang vpon one head, so they may growe together as it were into one body, cleaving together with such a copacting of toints as the members of one selfe bodie: being truelie made one, which with one hope, Faith, Charity, with one selfe Spirit of God doe live together being called not oncie into one inheritance of eternall life, but also into one partaking of one God and Christ. Wherefore although the forowfull desolation that on eche side presenteth it selfe in sight, crieth out that there is nothing left of the Church, yet let vs knowe that Chirstes death is fruiteful and that God mercuellouslie as it were in secrete corners prefereth his Church. As it was said to Elia, I haue kept to my selfe seven thousand men that haue not bowed their knee before Baal.

1. Reg. 19. 18.  The article of the Creede touching the Church, concerneth after all the visible Church, vnder the communion of Saints being added containeth fourie special flaires of faith.

3. Albeit this article of the Creede doth in some respect belong to the outwärde Church, that euery one of vs shoulde holde himselfe in brotherly consent with all the children of God, shoulde yeede vnto the Church that autoritie which it deseareth, finallie shoulde so behauie himselfe as a sheele of the flocke. And therefore is aiodyned the communion of Saints. Which parcell, although commonly the olde writers doe leaue it out, yet is it not to be neglected: because it verie well expresseth the qualitie of the Church: as if it had beene saide that the saintes are gathered together into the fellowship of Christ with this condition, that whatsoever benefites God bestoweth vpon them, they shoulde continually communicate them one to another. Whereby yet the diuersitie of graces is not taken away. as we know that the gifts of the holy ghost are diuersely distributed: neither is the order of civil governement disturbed, by which it is lawfull for euery man priuately to enjoy his owne possessiouns, as it is necessarie, that for preservation of peace among men, they should have among themselues particular and diuided properties of things. But there is a cōmunitie affirmed such as Luke describeth, that of the multitude of the behouers there was one hart & one soule: & Paul when he exhorteth the Ephesians to be one body, one spirit as they be called in one hope. For it is not possible, if they be truly persuaded y God is the cōmon father, & Christ the common head to the al, but y being conioined among the selues with brotherly love, they shoulde continually communicate those things that they haue. Nowe it much behoueth vs to knowe what profite thereupon returneth vnto vs. For we behoue the Churche to this ende, that we may be certainly persuaded that we are the members of it. For by this meanes, our salvation resteth vpon sure founde staites, that that it, although the whole frame of the world be shaken, cannot come to ruin and fall downe. First it standeth with God's election, neither can it varie or faile but together with his eternall Providence. Then, it is after a certaine manner joyned with the fixedfastnesse of Christ, which will no more suffer his faithfull to be plucked from him, than his own members to be rent and torn in peeces. Beside that, we are assured that truth that alway abide with vs, so long as we are holden in the botome of the Church. Last of all that we feele that these promises belong to vs, there shall be salvation in Zion, God shall for ever abide in Hierusalem, that it may not at any time be mov'd. So much can the partaking of the Church doe, that it holdeth vs in the fellowshippe of God. Also in the very worde Communion is much comfort: becaufe while it remaineth certaine, that whatsoever the Lord giueth to his and our members, belongeth to vs, our hope is by all their good things conformed. But in such sort to embrace the vnitie of the Church, it is not needful (as we haue alreadie saide) to see the Church it selfe with our eyes, or feele it with our handes: but rather by this that it consisteth in Faith, we are admonished that we ought no leffe to thinke it to bee, when it pasteth our understanding, than if it openly appeared. Neither is our faith therefore the worse, because it conceiued it unknouen: forasmuch as we are not herein command to disperse the reprobates from the elect (which is the office of God onely, and not ours) but to determine assuredly in our minds, that all they that by the mercifull kindeness of God the father through the effectuall working of the holy Ghost, are come into the partaking of Christ, are feuered into the peculiar right and proper possession of Christ: and that, forasmuch as we be in the number of those, we are partakers of so great a grace.

4 But Sith it is now our purpose, to entreate of the visible Church, let vs learne even by this one rule of Mother, how much the knowledge thereof is profitable, yea necessary for vs: forasmuch as there is no other entry into life, vnlesse the conceiue vs in her wombe, vnlesse the bring vs forth, vnlesse the feede vs with her breastes, finally vnlesse she keepe vs vnnder her custodie and gouernance, vntil such time as being vnclad of mortall fleshe we shalbe like vnto Angels. For our weakenesse suffereth vs not to be dismissed from schoole, till we have been scholers throughout the whole course of our life. Beside that out of her botome there is no forgiveueness of sinnes, and no saluation to be hoped for, as witnesseth Esaias & Joel, with whom agreeth Ezechiel where he declareth that they shall not be in the number of Gods people whom he putteth away from the heavenly life. As on the contrary side, they are said to write their names among the citizens of Hierusalem, that turne themselves to the following of true godlinesse. After which manner it is also said in an other Passe: Remember mee, Lorde, in the good will of thy people: visite me in thy saluation that I may see the benefites of thy elect, that I may be merry in the mirth of thy people, that I may rejoiece with thy inherance. In which words the fatherly favoure of God, & the peculiar testimony of the Spiritual life: is restraine to his flocke, so that the departing from the Church is alway damnable.

5 But let vs proceed to prosecute that which properly belongeth to this place.

together with the necessity and use thereof.

Eph. 4. 11.

place. Paul writeth that Christ, that he might fulfill all things, gave some Apostles, some Prophets, some Evangelists, and some Pastors and teachers, to the restoring of the holy ones, into the work of ministerie, unto the edification of the body of Christ, untill we all come into the vitute of Faith, and of the acknowledgment of the Sonne of God, unto a perfect man, and to the measure of the full growthen age of Christ. We see howe God, which was able to make them that be his perfect in a moment, yet will not haue them growe into manly age but by the bringing vp of the Church. Wee see the meaning expressed, for that vnto the Pastors is enjoyned the preaching of the heavenly doctrine. We see howe all, not one excepted, are brought into one rule, that they shoule with milde Spirite and willing to learne, yeeld themselves to the teachers appointed for that use. And by this marke Esaie had long before set out the kingdome of Christ, where hee sayeth: My spirite which is in thee, and the wordes that I have put in thy mouth shall never depart, neither out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed and thy children's children. Whereupon followeth that they were worthe to perisse with famine and pining hunger, whereasoeuer they be that refuse the spirittuall meat of the soule reached vnto them of God by the handes of the Church. GOD dooth breath faith into vs, but by the instrument of his Gospell, as Paul sayeth that faith is by hearing. As also with God remaineth his power to saue, but (as the same Paul wittnesseth) he verteth and displayeth the same in the preaching of the Gospell. For this reason in old time he willed that there should be made holy assemblies to the sanctuarie, that doctrine verted by the mouth of the Priest should nourish the content of faith. And to no other ende those glorious titles haue respect, where the temple is called the rest of God, and the sanctuarie his house, where he is saide to sit betweene the Cherubines, but to bring estimation, love, reverence and dignitie to the ministerie of the heauenlie doctrine, which otherwise the sight of a mortall and despaired man would not a little diminish. Therefore that we should knowe, that out of earthen vesselles is brought fourth vnto vs incessimable treasure, God himselfe commeth forth, and in as much as he is author of this degree, so he will haue himselfe to be acknowledged present in his institution. Therefore after that he hath forbidden his to give themselves to judgemen by flying of birdes, to soulesaynings, magickall arte, necromancy and other superstiitiones, he immediately addeth that he will giue them that which ought to suffice in stead of all, that is to say, that they shall never be defitute of Prophetes. But like as he sent not the olde people to Angels, but raised yp teachers out of the earth, which might truely perform the office of Angels; so at this day also his wil is to teach vs by men. And as in the olde time he was not content with the onelie lawe, but added Priests for expostors, at whose lipses the people shoule enquire for the true meaning thereof; so at this day he not only will eth vs to be heedfully bent to reading, but also appointeth maisters over vs, by whose travaile we may be holpen: whereasof commeth double profit. For on the one part by a very good triall it proueth our obedience, where we heare his ministers speaking even as it were himselfe. On the other side it also prouideth for our weakenesse, while after the manner of men hee had rather speake vnto unto vs by interpreters to allure vs vnto him, than with thundring drive vs away from him. And truely how expedient this familiar manner of teaching is for vs, all the godly doe feele by the feare wherewith the maieftie of God doth worthily affonish them. But they that thinke that the authoritie of the doctrine is abaced by the contemt of the men that are called to teach, doe bewray, their vnthankfulness, because among so many excellent gifts wherewith God hath garnished mankind: this is a singular prerogatieve, that he vouchfaeth to confecrate the mouthes and tongues of men to himself, that his owne voice should be heard in them. Wherefore on our behalues let vs not bee grecued obediently to embrace the doctrine of salvatiion set forth by his commandement & by his owne mouth: because although the power of God is not bound to outward meanes, yet hee hath bound vs to the ordinarie maner of teaching: which while pheentike men refuse to keepe, they wrapppe themselves in many deadly snares. Either pride, or distaunctes, or enuiue mouth many to perswade themselves that they can sufficietly profite by their owne private reading and study, and so to despise publick assemblies, and to accompt preaching superfluoues. But sith they do as much as in them is loose or break in sundre the holy bonde of vnite, no man escape the due punishment of this diuorce, but hee bewitcheth himselfe with pestilent errors & most wicked dotages. Wherefore, that the pure simplicitie of faith may flourish among vs, let vs not be grecued to vie this exercise of godlinesse, which God by his institution hath shewed to be necessarie for vs and fo earnestly commendeth. But there was never yet found any euene of the most wanting dogges which would say that we ought to stoppe our cares against God: But in all ages the Prophets and godly teachers haue had a harde strife against the wicked, whose stubbornesse can never come vnder this yoke, to be taught by the mouth of the ministerie of men. Which is as much as to blate out the face of God which shineth vnto vs in doctrine. For in olde time the fairfull were commanded to secke the face of God in the Sanctuarie, and the same is so oft repeated in the law for no other cause, but for that the doctrine of the law and the exhortations of the Prophets were to them a lively image of God: as Paul affirmeth that in his preaching shineth the glorie of God in the face of Christ. How much the more detestable are the Apostates, which greedily secke to diuide Churches, as though they did drive shepe from their foldes and cast them into the mouthes of wolves. But we must holde that which he hath alleaged out of Paul, that the Church is no otherwise buylde but by outward preaching, and that the holy ones are holde together with no other bonde but when with learning and profiting with one consent they keepe the order appointed by God to the Church. To this ende principally, as I haue saide, the fairfull in olde time vnder the lawe were commaunded to refort to the sanctuarie. Because when Moyses speake of the dwelling place of God, he doth there withall call it the place of name, where God hath set the memorie of his name. Whereby he plainly teache thin that without the doctrine of godlinesse there is no vie thereof. And it is not doubtfull but that for the same reason David with great bitterness of Spirit complaineth that hee is by the tyrannous crueltie of his enemies kepe out of entering into the Tabernacle.It seemeth commonly to manie a childish lamentation, because it should be but a vertie small losse, and also no great pleasure should be forgone thereby, to want the entry of the temple, so that there were enough of other delightfull things. But he bewaileth with this one grieue, anguish and sorrow, he is fretted and vexed and in a manner wafted. For nothing is of greater estimation with the faithfull, than this help whereby God by degrees lifteth vp his on high. For this is also to be noted, God in the mirror of his doctrine alwaye showed himself to the holy Fathers, that the knowledge was spirituall. Wherfore the temple is called not only his face, but also (to take away all superstition) his footstooole. And this is that happy meeting into unity of faith, while & to the highest euc to the lowest do aspire to the head. All the temples that euer the gentiles vp any other purpose builded to God, were but a mere prophaning of his worship, whereunto though not with like grosseſfe, yet somewhat the lewes fell. Whereof Steven out of the mouth of Eſay reprocheth them where he faith, that God dwelleth not in temples made with handes, &c. Because onely God doeth by his worde sanctifie to himselfe temples to the lawfull vfe. And if we rashly attempt any thing without his commandement, by and by to an euill beginning doe cleaue new deuises by which the euill is spread abroad without measure. Yet Xerxes, when by the counfell of the Magitians hee burned vp or plucked downe all the temples of Greece, vndiscreetely said, that the Gods to whom all thinges ought to be freeli open were enclosed within wals and tiles. As though it were not in the power of God, to the entent he might be neere vs, after a certaine manner to descende vnto vs, and yet neither to change place, nor to fasten vs to earthly meanes: but rather by certaine Chariots to carry vs vp to his Heauenlye glorie, which with the immeasurable greatnesse thereof filleth all thinges, yea and in height surmounteth the heauens.

6 Nowe forasmuch as at this time there hath beene great strive about the effectualnesse of the ministerie, while some excessively amplify the dignitie thereof: and some other affirmes that that which is properly belonging to the holy Ghost is wrongfully given away to mortall man, if wee thinke that ministers and teachers doe pearce to the minde and heartes, to amenden as well the blindnesse of the minde as the hardnesse of hearts: it is meete that we give a right determination of this controversie. All that they contende on both partes shall easely be accorded by expressly noting the places where God the author of preaching joyning his spirit with it promiseth fruit thereof againe, when feuering himselfe from outward helps he chalengeth to himselfe alone, as well the beginnings of faith as the whole course ther of. It was the office of the second Elias (as Malachie witnesseth) to enlighten the minde, and to turne the hearts of Fathers to the children, and vsbeleeuers to the wisdome of the righteous. Christ pronounceth that hee sendeth the Apostles, that they should bring fruite of their labor: But what that fruite is Peter shortly defineth, saying that we be regenerate with incorruptible seede. And therefore Paul glorifieth that hee by the Gospell begat the Corinthians, and that they were the seale of his Apostleshippe: yea that hee was not a literal minister, such as did openly beate the eares with

with sound of voice, but that there was given him an effectuallness of Spirit, that his doctrine should not be vnprouitable. In which meaning also in another place he sayeth, that his Gospel was not in worde one little, but in power. He affirmeth also that the Galatians by hearing receiued the Spirit of faith. Finally in manie places he maketh himselfe not only a worker together with God, but also aligneth himselfe the office of giving salvation. Truely he never brought forth all these things to this intent to giue unto himselfe any thing were it never so little seuerally from God: as in another place he shortly declareth, saying, our labour was not vnprouitable in the Lorde, according to his power mightily working in me. Againe in another place, he that was mightie in Peter, towards the circumcision, was also mightie in me towards the Gentiles. But how he leaueth nothing seuerally to the ministers, appeareth by other places, as: he that planteth is nothing, and he that watereth is nothing, but God that giueth the encreas. Againe: I haue laboured more than all: not I, but the grace of God that was with me. And truely we must holde fast those sayinges, where God ascribith to himselfe the enlightening of the mind, and the renewing of the heart, teacheth that it is a robbrie of God if man take vpon himselfe anie pait of either of them. In the meane time if any man offer himselfe to the ministers whom God ordeineth, willing to learne, hee shall knowe by the fruites, that this maner of teaching not in vaine pleased God, and that this yoke of modestsie was not in vaine laid upon the faithfull.

7 But as for the Church visible and which is within the compass of our knowledge, what judgement is meete to be giuen thereof, I thinke it alreadie appeareth evidentlie by that which we haue before saide. For we haue saied, that the holy Scripture speaketh of the Church after two formes. Sometime, when it nameth the Church, it meaneth that Church which is indeede before God, into which none are received but they that are both by grace of adoption the children of God, and by sanctification of the Spirit, the true members of Christ. And then truely it comprehends not onlie the holie ones that dwell in earth, but also all the elect that haue beene iuscie the beginning of the world. But oftentimes under the name of the Church it signifieth the vnierfal multitude of men scattered abrode in the world, which profess that they worship one God and Christ, by Baptisme enter into his faith, by partaking of the supper testament their vnitie in true doctrine & charitie, have an agreement in the worde of the Lorde, and for the preaching thereof do keepe the ministerie ordeine by Christ. In this Church there be mingled many hypocrites which haue nothing of Christ but the name and outward shewe: there be manie ambitious, covetous, envious, euil speakers, some of unclean life: which be suffred for a time, either because they cannot by lawfull order of judgement be convincde, or because there is not alwaye in vre that severitie of discipline that ought to be. Therefore as we must needs beleeue that the Church which is insuflible to vs, is to be seene with the eyes of GOD onlie: so are wee commanded to regard this Church which is called a Church in respect of men, and to keepe the communion of it.

8 Therefore so much as behaued vs to knowe it, the Lorde hath set it out, properiy truly and insuflible. out by certaine markes and as it were signes vnto vs. This is indeede the singular prerogatiue of God himselfe, to knowe who he is, as we haue alreadie allledged out of Paul. And truely that the rashnesse of men shoulde not creepe so farre, it is provided by the very succeffe of thinges dailie putting vs in minde, how farre his secret judgements doe surmount our un-standing. For even they that seemed most desperate, and accounted vter-ly past hope, are by his goodnesse called backe into the waie and they that fe-med to stand fast in comparison of other, doe oftentimes fall. Therefore according to the secret predestination of God (as Augustine faith) there bee manie sheepe without, and many wolves within. For he knoweth them, and hath them marked that knowe neither him nor themselues. But of those that openly beare his badge, his onelie eies do see who be both holy without faining, and who will continue even to the end, which is the very chief point of salvation. Yet on the other side, forasmuch as he foresawe it to be some deale expedient, that we should knowe who were to be accounted his children, he hath in this part applied himselfe to our capacitie. And because the certaintie of faith was not necessarie, he hath put in place thereof a certaine judgement of charitie: whereby we shoulde acknowledge for members of the Church those that both with confession of faith, and with example of life, and with partaking of sacramentes, doe profess the same God and Christ with vs. But as for the knowledge of the bodie thereof, how much more that he knewe it to be necessarie for our salvation, with so much the more certaine markes he hath set it out.

9 Loe hereupon growth & ariseth vnto vs, a face of the Church vi-ible to our eyes. For wheresoeuer we see the word of God to be purely preached and heard, and the sacraments to be ministred according to the institution of Christ, there it is in no wise to be doubted that there is som church of God; forasmuch as his promise cannot deceiue. Wheresoeuer two or three are gathered together in my name, there I am in the mids of them. But that we may evidentlie understand the summe of this matter, we must proccede by these as it were degrees: that is to say, ye the univerall Church is a multitude gathered together out of all nations whatsoeuer they be, which being sundered & severally scattered by distances of places, yet doth agree in one truth of godly doctrine, & is bound together with the bond of onelfe religion: And that under this are comprehended all particular Churches, which are in all towne and streets according to the order of mens neces-sitie, so that every one of them may rightfully haue the name & authoritie of a Church: And that all particular men which by profession of godlines are reckoned among such Churches, although they be in deede strangers from the Church, yet do after a certaine maner belong vnto it, til by publike judgment they bee banished out of it. Howbeit there is somewhat a divers maner in judging of private men and of Churches. For it maie fall in experience, that such men as wee shall thinke not to be altogether worthie of the company of the godly, yet we must vs like brethren & account the among the faithfull, for the common content of the Church, whereby they are suffere and borne withall in the bodie of Christ. Wee doe not by our testimonie allow such to be members of the Church: but we leaue them the place that that they have among the people of God, till it be by orderly right of lawe taken away from them. But of the very multitude we must otherwise think: which if it hath & honoreth the ministerie of the word, & the administration of Sacraments, it deserveth without doubt to be esteemed and judged a Church: because it is certaine that those things are not without fruit. So wee do also preferre to the vanityfull Church her vanitie, which diuellish spirites have alway travailed to cut in sunder: neither doe wee defraud of their au-thoritie those lawfull assemblies which are disposed according to the fitnesse of places.

10 We have set for signes to discern the Church by the preaching of the worde, & the observing of the Sacramentes. For those can be no where but they must bring forth fruite, and bee prospered with the blessing of God. I do not say, that whereoeuer the word is preached, there by and by springeth vp fruite: but I saye that no where it is received and hath a stayed state, but that it bringeth forth the effectuallnesse thereof. Where the preaching of the Gospell is reverently heard, and the Sacramentes are not negelected, howsoever it be, there for that time appeareth a not deceitfull & not doutfull face of the Church, whereof no man may vnpunished either despite the authoritie, or refuse the admonitions, or refiely counsels, or mocks at the corrections: much lesse to departe from it, and to breake in sunder the vanitie of it. For the Lord doth highly esteemeth the Communion of his Church, that he counteth him for a traitorous runaway and forlaker of Religion, whosoever shall stubbornly straunge himselfe from any Christian fellowship, so that it be such one as hath the true ministerie of the Worde and Sacramentes. He doth commendeth the Churches authoritie, that when it is violate, he judgeth his owne diminished. Neither is it of small importance, that the Church is called the pillar and strong stay of trueth and the house of God. By which wordes Paul signifieth, that to the end the trueth of God shoulde not decay in the worlde, the Church is a faithful keeper thereof because Gods will was to haue the preaching of his word kept pure and to thebe himselfe unto vs a father of hou holde by her ministerie and labour, while the seedeth vs with spirituall nourishmentes, and procureth all things that make for our saluation. It is also no slender praise, that it is saide that she is chosen and seuered by Christ to be his spouse, that shoule be without wrinkle and spot, the body and fulnesse of him. Whereupon fol-loweth, that departing from the Church is a denying of God & of Christ.
Therefore so much the more we must beware of so wicked disagreement.
For while we goe about so much as in vs lieth, to procure the ruine of gods true th, we are worthie that he should sende downe his lightning with the whole violent force of his wrath to destroy vs. Neither can there be imagined any fault more hainous, than with wicked breach of faith to defile the marriage that the onely begotten sonne of God hath vouchsafed to contract with vs.

11 Wherefore let vs diligently keepe these markes imprinted in our mindes, and let vs esteeme them according to the Lords will. For there is nothing that Satan more endeoureth this to take away, & abolish the one of these, or both: sometyme that when these markes are raised and blotted

Cap. 1. Of the outwarde means.

Our he may take away the true and natural distinction of the church sometimes that when they are brought in contempt, he may with open falling away plucke vs from the Church. By his craft it is brought about, that in certaine ages past. the pure preaching of the worde hath vanished away: and nowe he doth with as great importunacie travaile to ouerthrow the ministration, which yet Christ hath so stablished in the Church, that when it is taken away, the edification of the Church perisheth. But nowe, howe daungerous, yea howe deadly a tentation is it when it doth but come in our minde to depart from that congregation wherein are scene the signes and tokens by which the Lord thought his Church sufficiently described: We see howe great heede is to be taken on both sides. For, that we should not be deceived under the title of the Church, every congregation pretendeth the name of the Church must be examined by that maner of trial, as by a touchstone. If it haue in the word and Sacraments the order appointed by the Lord, it will not deceive vs. let vs boldly yeale vs too the honour due to Churches.

But contrariwise if it boast it selfe without the word and Sacramentes, wee must no leffe with fearfull conscience beware of such deceit, than on the other side we must flee ruthnesse and pride.

12. Where as we say that the pure ministration of the worde and the pure vslge in celebrating the Sacraments, is a sufficient pledge & earnest, so that we may safely embrace as the Church any fellowship, wherein both these be: this extendeth so farre, that it is neuer to be cast off, so long as it thinke not fomne faults. Yea & ther may some faultinesse creep into it, in the administration either of doctrine, or of the Sacraments, which ought not to estrange vs from the communion of it. For all the articles of true doctrine be not of one sort. Some bee so necessarie to be knowne, that they ought to be certain and undoubted to all men, as the proper principles of Religion: of which sort are, That there is one God, That Christ is God, and the sonne of God: That our salvation consisteth in the mercy of God: and such like. There bee other that being in controversie betwene Churches, yet doe not breake the ynitie of faith. For those Churches that disgree about this one point, if withour lute of contention, without stubbornesse of affirming, the one thinke that soules when they departe from the bodies doe flee vp into heauen, and the other Church dare determine nothing of the place, but yet certainly holde, that they live to the Lord: the wordes of the Apostl are: Let all vs that bee perfect thinke all one thing: but if ye thinke any thing otherwise, this the Lord shall also reuelse vs to you. Doeth hee not sufficiently thinke that diversitie of opinions about these matters, that be not necessarie, ought to bee no ground of disagreement among Christians? It is in deed a principall point, that we agree in all things. But for as muche as there is no man that is not wrapped with some little cloud of ignorance, either wee must leave no Church at all, or we must pardon a being decied in such things as may be vnknowne without violating the summe of religion, and without losse of saluation. But I meane not here to defend any errors be they never so little, so as I would thinke that they should bee cherished with flattering & winking at them: but I say that wee ought not rashly rathly for every light disobedience forsake the Church, in which at least that Doctrine is retained safe & uncorrupted, wherein standeth the safety of godliness, and the use of Sacraments is kept as it was instituted by the Lord. In the mean time if we endeavour to amend that which displeaseth vs, we do therein according to our duty. And hereunto belongeth that saying of Paul: If anything better be revealed to him that sitteth, let him first hold his peace. Whereby it is evident, that all the members of the Church are euerie one charged with endower to publike edification, according to the measure of his grace, so that it be done comely and according to order; that is, that we neither do forsake the communion of the Church, nor abiding in it, do trouble the peace and well ordered discipline thereof.

13 But in bearing with the imperfection of life, our gentle tenderneffe ought to go much further. For herein is a very slipperie easinesse to fall; and herein with no small deuises doth Satan lay way for vs. For there have been alway some, which filled with false persuaded of perfect holinesse, as though they were already made certaine aerie spirits, despised the company of all men, in whom they saw remaining any thing of the nature of man. Such in olden time were the Catharies, and they that were as mad as they, the Donatistes. Such at this day are some of the Anabaptistes, which would seeme to have profited about the rest. Some there be that offend more by an vn-diffiret scale of righteousness, than by that mad pride. For when they see among them to whom the Gospell is preached, the fruite of life not agreeably answeering to the doctrine thereof, they by and by judge that there is no Church. It is indeede a most just displeasure, and such a one whereunto in this most miserable age of the world, wee giue too much occasion.

Neither may we excuse our accurfed slothfulnesse, which the Lorde will not suffer vnpunished: as euen alreadie he beginneth with grievous scourges to chastife it. Wo therefore to vs, which with so disolute licentiousnesse of wicked doings make that weake consciences be wounded by reason of vs. But in this againe they offend whome I haue spoken of, because they cannot measure their being displeased. For where the Lord requirèth clemencie, they leaving it, doe giue themselfes wholly to immensurable rigorousnes. For, because they thinke there is no Church where there is no found purenesse & vprightnesse of life, for hatred of sinnes they depart from the lawfull Church, while they thinke that they sweare from a company of wicked men. They allege that the Church of Christ is holy. But that they may also vnderstand that it is mingled of good and euill men, let them heare this parable out of the mouth of Christ, wherein it is compared to a nette, in which fishes of all kindes are gathered together: and are not chosen out till they be laide abroade vpon the shooer. Let them heare that it is like vnto a cornesseeld, which being sown with good graine, is by the enimies fraude scattered with tares, of which it is not cleaned vntill the croppe be brought into the barn floor. Finally, let them heare that it is like vnto a floor, wherein the wheat is so gathered togethers, that it lieth hidden under the chaff, till being cleansed with

Cap. I.

Of the outwarde meanes mingling of euill men: they doe in vaine seeke for a Church sprinkled with no spotte.

14 For they cry out that it is an intollerable thing, that the pestilence of vices so rangeth abroad. What if the sayings of the Apostile doe heare also answere them? Among the Corinthians not onely a fewe had gone out of the way, but the infectioue hadd in a maner possesed the whole body: There was not onely one kinde of sinne, but many: neither were they light offences, but ceretne horrible outrageous doings: it was not onely corruption of manners, but also of doctrine. What in this case faith the holy Apostile, that is to say, the instrument of the holy ghost, by whose testimonie the Church standeth and falleth: Doeth he require a diuision from them? Doeth he banishe them out of the kingdom of Christ? Doeth he strike them with the extremest thunderbolt of curse? He not onely doeth none of all these things: but he both acknowledgeth and reporteth it a Church of Christ and fellowship of saints. If there remaine a Church among the Corinthians, where contentions, feites, and envious partakings do broyle; where quarells & brawlings be in vre, with a greedinesse of hauing, where that wicked doing is openly allowed, which were abominable among the very Gentiles: where Paules name is vniustlie railed at, whom they ought to haue honoured as their father, where some poyne at the resurrection of the dead, with ruine whereof the whole Gospell falleth: where the gracious gifts of God feere to ambition, and not to charitable: where many things are vncomly and vnorderlie done: and if therefore there still remaine a Church, because the ministerie of the worde and of the Sacramentes is there not refufed, who dare take away the name of the Church from them that cannot be charged with the tenth part of these faults? They that with so great preciseness deale so cruelly against the Churches of this present time, what (I pray you) woulde they haue done to the Galatians, which were almoaste vter forsakers of the Gospell, among whom yet the same apostle founde Churches?

15 They obiect also, howe that Paul grieuously rebuketh the Corinthians for suffering in their company a man that was a hainous sinner, and then he setteth a general sentence wherein he pronounceth, that it is unlawful to eate bread with a man of reprochfull life. Here he crieth out: If bee not lawfull to eate common breade, howe may it be lawfull to eate with them the bread of the Lorde? I confesse in deede that it is a great dishonour, if hoggges and dogges haue place among the children of God: it is also a muche more dishonour, if the holy body of Christ bee giuen forthe to them. And truely if they be well ordered Churches, they will not suffer wicked men in their boosome, and will not without choise admiere both worthy and unworthy together to that holy banket. But forasmuch as the Pastors doe not alway so diligently watche, yea and sometime are more tender in bearing with men than they ought to bee, or are hindered so that they cannot vse that feuerticke that they woulde: it commeth to passe, that euery they that are openly euill, are now alway thrust out of the company of the holy ones. This I graunt to bee a fault: neither will I diminishe it, Sith Pau! dooth so sharply rebuke it in the Corinthians. But although the Church bee slacke in her duty, it shall not bee therefore immed-immediately in the power of every private man, to take upon himself the judgement to vex him. I doe in deede not deny that it is the doing of a godly man to withdrawe himselfe from al private companie of euill men, to entangle himselfe in no willing familiaritie with them. But it is one thing to flee the company of euill men, and another thing for hatred of them to for-take the communion of the Church. But where as they thinke it sacriledge to be partakers of the Lords bread with them, they are therein much more rigorous than Paul is. For where he exhorteth vs to a holy and pure partaking, he requireth not that one should examine an other, or euery ma the whole Church, but that they should eache one prove himself. if it were vnlawfull to communicate with an vnworthy man, then truly Paul would bid vs to looke circumspectly whether there were any in the multitude, by whose uncleansesse we might be besiled. Nowe when he requireth onely of euere man the proofs of themselves, he sheweth that it nothing hurteth vs if an-ie vnworthie doe thrust themselfes in among vs. And nothing else is meant by this which he sayeth afterward. He that eateth vnworthily, eateth and drinketh judgement to himselfe. He doth not say, to other, but to himself, And rightly. For it ought not to stand in the chiose of euery particular ma, who be to be receiued, & who to be rejected. The knowledge hereof belongeth to the whole Church, which knowledge can not be had without lawfull order, as hereafter shall be sayde more at large. Therefore it shoule be vnrighteous, that any private man should be defiled with the vnworthinesse of an other, whom he neither can nor ought to kepe backe from coming to it.

But although by this vndiscreet zeal of righteousness this tentation dothe sometyme also enter into good men yet this we shal finde that too much preciseness groweth rather of pride, disdainfulnesse, & fallie opinion of holinesse, than of true holiness and true zeal therof. Therefore they that are bolder than other, and as it were standard bearers to make any departing from the Church, for the most part doe it vpwn no other cause, but in defising of all men to boast themselves to be better than other. Therefore Augustine faith well and wisely: When godly order and manner of Ecclesiastical discipline ought principally to have regard vnto the unity of Spirite in the bond of peace: which the Apostle commanded to be kept by bearing one with an other, and which being not kept, the medicine of revenge is proved to be not only superfluous, but also pernicious, and therefore now to be no medicine at all: those euill children, which not for hatred of other mens iniquities, but for affectio of their own contentions, do greedily labour either wholly to drawe or at least to divide the weake common people entangled with the boastinge of their name, swelling with pryde madde with stubbornenesse, traiterous with slaunderes, troublesome with seditions, least they should seeme to want the light of true light, do pretend a shadow of rigorous severitie: and those things that are in the holy Scriptures commanded to be done with a gentler kind of healing, fauing the sin-eritie of loue, & keeping the vnity of peace, to correct faults of brethren, they abuse it to sacriledge of schisme, and to occasion of cutting off. But to godly and quiet men hee giueth this counsell, that they mercifully correct that which they can, and that which they can not, patiently bare, & groan and mourne with loue, untill God either amend and correct them, or at the hardest roote vp the tares, and famine out the chaffe. Let the godly trauail to fortifie them selves with these armures, least while they seeme to the enemies strong and courageous repeuers of righteousnesse, they departe from the kingdome of heauen, which is the onely kingdome of righteousnesse. For, if it is Gods will to haue the communion of his Church to bee kept in this outward fellowship: hee that for hatred of evil men doth breake the token of that fellowship, entreth into a waie whereby is a slipperie falling frō the communion of Saints. Let them thinke that in a great multitude there be many truly holy & innocent before the eies of the Lorde, whom they see not. Let them thinke that even of them that be deposed there be many that do not please or flatter them selves in their faultes, but being now & then awakened with earnest feare of GOD do aspire to a greater vprightnesse. Let them thinke that judgement ought not to be giuen of a man by one deed: forasmuch as the holiest do sometime fall away with a most gpecious fall. Let the think that to gather a Church there lieth more weight both in the ministrie of the word and in the partaking of the holy mysteries, than that all that force should vanish away by the fault of some wicked men. Let al this consider, that in judging the Church, the judgement of God is of greater value than the judgement of man.

17 Where also they pretend ye the Church is not without cause called holy, it is mee to weigh with what holinesse it excelleth: least if we will admit no Church but such a one as is in all points perfect, we leaque no Church at all. It is true in deed whic Paul faith, ly Christ gave hymselfe for the Church to satisfaction: that he clenched it with the lauer of water with the word of life, to make her vnto himself a glorious spouse having no spot, or wrinkle, &c.

Yet this is also nothing lesse true, that the Lord daily worketh in smoothing her wrinkles & wiping away her spots. Whereupon foloweth that her holiness is not yet fully finisht. Therefore the Church is so holy, that it daily prospeth & is not yet perfected: daily proceedeth, and is not yet come to the mark of holiness: as also in another place shalbe more largely declared. Wher as therefore the Prophets prophesie that there shall be a holy Hiernsalen, through which strangers shall not passe: and a holy temple wherinto unclean men shall not enter: lest vs not so take it, as if there were no spot in members of the church: but for that with their whole endeuer they aspire to holiness and founde purenesse, by the goodnesse of God cleanliness is ascribed to them, which they have not yet fully obtained. And although oftentimes there be but rare tokens of such sanctification among men: yet wee must determine that there hath ben no time since the creation of the world wherein the Lord hath not had his church, & that there shall also be no time to the verie ende of the worlde, wherein hee shall not have it. For all be it immediately from the beginning the whole kind of men is corrupt and defiled by the sinne of Adam: yet out of this, as it were a polluted maffe, God alway sanctifieth some vesselles vnto honour, that there shoulde bee no age without feeling of his mercy. Which which he hath testified by certaine promises, as these: I haue ordained a testament to my elect. I haue sworne to David my seruaut.
The corruptions of the Church in the times of the Prophets.

The Church of Jerusalem in the days of Christ & his Apostles.

Servant, I will for ever continue thy seed: I will build thy seat in generation and generation. Again, the Lord hath chosen Zion, he hath chosen it for a dwelling to himselfe: This is my rest for ever, &c. Again, these things saith the Lord which giveth the Sunne for the light of the day, the Moone & stars for the light of the night. If these lawes shall faile before me, then the seed of Israel shall also faile.

18 Hereof Christ himselfe, the Apostles, and in manner all the Prophets haue given vs example. Horrible are those descriptions wherein Esay, Hieremie, Joel, Abacuc, and the other doo lament the sicknesse of the Church of Hierusalem. In the common people, in the magistrate, in the Priestes all things were to corrupt, that Esay doubteth not to match Hierusalem with Sodom and Gomorrah. Religion was partly despised, partly defiled: in their maners, are commonly reported theftes, extortions, breaches of faith, murtheres and like mischeues. Yet therefore the Prophets did neither erect to themselues new Churches, nor build vp new altars on which they might haue several sacrifices: but of whatsoever maner men they were, yet because they considered, that God had left his worde with them, and ordained ceremonies whereby he was there worshipped, in the middest of the assembly of the wicked they held vp pure handes vnto him. Truely if they had thought that they did gather any infection thereby, they would rather haue died a hundred times than haue suffred themselves to be drawn thereunto. Therefore nothing withheld them from departing, but desir[e] to the keeping of vnitive. But if the Prophets thought is against conscience, to estrauge themselues from the Church for many and great wicked doings, not of one or two men, but in maner of the whole people: then we take too much vp[on us], if we dare by and by departe from the communion of that Church, where not al mens maners doe satisfie either our judgement, yea or the Christian profession.

19 Nowe what manner world was there in the time of Christ and the Apostles? And yet that desperate vngodlines of the Pharisees, and the dissolute licentiousnes of liuing, which then eche where reigned, could not hinder, but that they vfed the same ceremonies with the people, and assembled with the rest in one temple to the publike exercices of religion. Whereas came that, but because they knewe that the fellowship of euill men did not desile them, which with a pure conscience did communicate at the same ceremonies? If any man be little mooed with the Prophets and Apostles, let him yet obey the authoritie of Christ. Therefore Cyprian well faith though there be seene tares or unclean vessels in the Church, yet there is no cause why we should departe from the Church: we must onely labour that we may bee wheat: we must vs diligence and indeavour as much as we may that we may be a golden or siluer vessell. But to breake the earthen vessels, is the onely worke of the Lorde, to whom also is giuen an iron rodde. And let no man chalenge to himself that which is properly belonging to Sonne onely, to be able alone to saine the floore, and cleanse the chaffe, and seuer all the tares by mans judgement. This is a proude obstinacie, and presumption full of sacrilege, which a peruerse furor taketh to it selfe, &c. Therefore let both these things remaine certainly fixed. First that he
Cap. 1. Of the outwärde meanes hath no excuse, that of his owne will forsaketh the outward communio of the Church, Where the worde of God is preached and the sacramentar ministr'd: then that the faults of a fewe or of many are no hinderance, but that we may therein rightly professeth our faith by our Ceremonies institute by God:

because a godly conscience is not hurt by vnworthines of any other either pastor or privat man, and the mysteries are to a holy & upright man neuer-thelesse pure & hollome because they are together handled of vnneale me.

20 Their precisenesse and disdainfulness proceedeth yet further: because they acknowledge no Church but such a one as is pure from all spots be they never so small; yea they are angrie with good teachers, for that in exhorting the faithfull to go forward, they teach them all their life long to groane under the burden of vices, and to flee vnto pardon. For they prate that by this meanes men be led from perfection. Igrant in deed, that in earnest calling vpon perfection we ought not slowly or coldly to travell, much lesse to be idle, but to fill our mindes with confidence thereof while we be yet in our course; I say, it is a diucliff lacion. Therefore in the Creede the for-giuenesse of sinnes is aptly joyned next after the Church. For none doe attaine it, but only they that are citizens & of the houhold of the Church as it is read in the Prophet. Therefore the building of the heavenly Hiensales ought to goe before, wherein afterward this mercifulnesse of God may haue place: y whatsoeuer come vnto it, their iniquitie may be taken away. I say that it ought first to be builded, not for that there can be any church without the forsguenesse of sinnes, but because the Lorde hath not promised his mercie but in the communion of Saints. Therefore the first entrie for vs into the Church and kingdome of God, is the forgiuenesse of sinnes, without which wee haue no covenent or conioyning with God. For thus hee saith by the Prophet, In that day I will strike you a covenent with the beaust of the fielde, with the foule of the aire, and with the vermine of the earth. I will break the swordes of warre from out of the earth, and I will make men to sleepe without feare, I will espouse you vnto me for euer. I will espouse you I say) in righ-teousnes, in judgement, in mercie, & in compassions. We see how by his mercie the Lorde reconcileth vs to himselfe, And so in another place, when hee forefaith y the people shall be gathered together againe, whom he had scattered abroad in his wrath, hee faith, I will clene them from all wickednesse wherewith they haue sinned against me. Wherefore by the signe of washing we enter into the fellowship of the Church, whereby we may bee taught that there is no entrie open for vs into the houhold of God, vnsleFFE our fil-thines be first wiped away with his goodnes.

21 But by the forgiuenesse of sinnes the Lord doth not onelie receive & adopt vs once into the Church, but by the same he also preserveth & maintaineth vs still in it. For to what purpose were it, to haue such a pardon grated vs, as shoulde ferue for no vs? But every one of the godly is a witnesse to himselfe that the mercie of God should be vaine and mocking, if it shoulde be granted onely but once: because there is none that is not in his owne conscience priuie throughout his whole life of many weaknesses, which needeth the mercy of God. And truely not in vaine God promiseth this grace peculiarlie to them of his owne houhold: and not in vaine he commandeth
Secondly, without that drinstration, thereupon man, which they believe, are always ready for their sins. Wherefore we ought to hold assuredly, that by the liberality of God by mean of Christ's dying through the Sanction of His Spirit, Sinnes hath beene and are daily pardoned to vs which are called and graffed into the body of the Church.

22 To deale this benediction into vs, the keyes were given to the Church. For when Christ gave the Apostles commandement, and delivered them power to forgive sinnes, he meant not this onely, that they should loose them from sins that were from vngodlinesse converted to the faith of Christ: but rather that they should continually execute this office among the faithfull. Which thing Paul teacheth, when he writeth that the embassage of reconciliation was left with the ministers of the Church, whereby thy should oftentimes in Christes name exhort the people to reconcile themselves to God. Therefore in the communion of Saints, by the ministerie of the Church itself, sinnes are continually forgiven, when the Priests or Bishops, to whom that office is committed, doe with the promises of the Gospell confirm godly conscience in hope of pardon and forgiveness: and that as well publiquely as privately, according as necessity requireth. For there be verie many, which for their weakeenesse do neede a singular atonement. And Paul reporteth that not onely in common preaching, but also in houses he had testified the Faith in Christ, and severally admonished every one of the doctrine of Salvation. Therefore we have here three things to be noted. First that with how great holinesse souer the children of God doe excell, yet they be alwayes in this estate, so long as they dwell in a mortall bodie, that without forgiving of sinnes they cannot stand before God. Secondly, that this benediction is so proper to the Church, that we cannot otherwise enjoy it, but if we abide in the Communion thereof. Thirdly, that it is distributted into vs by the ministers and Pastors, either by preaching of the Gospell, or by ministering of the Sacramentes: and that in this behalfe principally appeareth the power of the keyes, which the Lorde hath given to the fellowship of the faithfull. Wherefore let every one of vs thinke this to bee his duetie, no where else to seeke forgiving of sinnes, than where the Lorde hath set it. Of publike reconciliation which belongeth to discipline we shall speake in place fit for it.

23 But forasmuch as those phrentike spirites that I have spoken of, doe go about to pluck away from the Church this only anchor of salvation, confidences are the more strongly to be confirmed against a so pestilent opinion, the Nonians in old time troubled the Church with this doctrine; but not much unlike to the Nonians our age also hath many of the Anabaptists which fall to the same dotages. For they frame that the people of God are in Baptisme regenerate into a pure and Angelike life, that is corrupted with no filthiness of the flesh. But if any man offende after Baptisme, they leave vnto him nothing but the vnappeasable judgement of GOD. Briefly they grant no hope of pardon to a sinner fallen after grace received, but because they acknowledge no other forgiuencesse of sinnes but that whereby wee bee first regenerate. But although there bee no lie more clearely confuted by the Scripture: yet because these men finde some whom they may deceiue (as also in olde time Nounaw had many followers,) let vs shortly shewe howe mad they be to their owne and others destruction. First, whereas by the commandemente of the Lorde, the holy ones doe daily repeat this prayer, forgiue vs our drettes: truly they doe confesse themselves dretters. Neither doe they crave it in vaine because the Lord hath alway appointed no other thing to be asked, than that which he himselfe woulde giue. Yea, whereas he hath testified that the whole prayer shall bee heard of his father, yet he hath also sealed this abolution with a peculliar promise. What wil we more? The Lorde requireth of the holy ones at their life long a confession of sinnes, yea and that continuall, and promiseth pardon. What boldnesse is it, either to exempt them from sinne, or if they have stumbled, vterly to exclude them from grace? Nowe whom doeth hee will vs to forgiue seuenten times seven times? not to our brethren? To what ende did hee command it, but that we shoulde followe his clemencie: He forgiveth therefore, not once or twise: but as often as being striken downe with the acknowledging of sinnes they sigh vnto him.

24 But (that we may beginne in a manner at the very swaddling cloutes of the Church) the Patriarches were circumcised, being allured into partaking of the covenante, hauing undoubtedly by their fathers diligence beene taught righteousness and innocencie, when they conspird to murder their brother: this was a mischiefous acte, to be abhorred euon of the most desperat theues. At the last being meekned with the monitions of Iudas, they solde him: this was also an intollerable hauynousnesse. Simeon and Levi, with wicked reuenge, and such as was also condemned by their owne fathers judgement, vold crueltie against the Sichemites. Ruben with most vnclene lust defiled his fathers bed. Iudas when hee woulde giue himselfe to fornication against the lawe of nature, went in to his sones wife. And yet so farre are they from being wiped out of the choosen people, that they be rather raised vp to be heades of it. But what did Dauid? when hee was a governor of justitie, with howe great wickednesse did hee by shedding of innocent blood open the way to his blinde lust? Hee was alreadie regenerate and amonge the regenerate garnished with notable praises of the Lord: neitherlesse hee committed that hauynous offence, which is horrible euon amonge the Gentiles: and yet he obtened pardon. And (that wee may not tarie upon single examples) howe many promises there are in the lawe and the Prophets of Gods mercie towarde the Israelites, so oft it is prooved that the Lorde sheweth himselfe appeasable to the offences of his people. For what doth Moses promise to come to passe, when the people being fallen in to Apostasie shall returne vnto the Lorde? He shall bring thee backe out of captivitie, and shall haue mercie on thee, and shall gather thee together out of the people to whom thou haft beeene dispersed. If thou be scattered even to the borders of the heauen, I will from thence againe gather thee together.

25 But I will not beginne a recitall that should never be ended. For the Prophets are full of such promises, which doe yet offer mercie to the people covered with infinite wicked doings. What office is there more hainous than rebellion? for it is called a divorce betwenee God and the Church. But this is overcome by the goodnesse of God. What man is there (sayth he by Ieremia) that if his wife gue foorth her body in common to adulterers, shall abide to returne into fauour with her? but with thy fornications all the waies are polluated. O Iuda, the earth hath beene filled with thy filthie loues. But returne vnto me, and I wil receive thee. Returne thou turne away, I wil not turne away my face from thee,because I am holy, & am not angry for euery. And truely he can be no otherwise minded, which affirmeth that he willst not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted & liue. Therefore when Salomon did dedicate the temple, he appointed it also to this use, that the prayers made for obtaining pardon of sinnes should be heard from thence. If (laide he) thy sonnes (hall sinne) for there is no man that sinneth not) and thou being angry shalt deliver them to their enemies, and they shall repent in their hearts, and being turned (hall entreate thee in their captivity, slaying, we have sinned, we have done wickedly, and (hall pray toward the lande whome thou haft given to their fathers, and toward this holy temple: thou shalt heare their prayers in heauen, and (hall be made merciful to thy people that hath sinnned against thee, and to all their wickedneisses whereby they have offended thee. And not vainly the Lord ordained in the law daily Sacrifices for sinnes. For if the Lord had not foresene that his people should be troubled with continuall diseases of sinnes, he would never have appointed these remedies for them.

25 Was this benefit taken away from the faithfull, by the comming of Christ, wherein the fulnes of grace was shewed forth, so that they dare not now pray for pardon of sinnes? that if they offend the Lord they maie not obtaine anie mercie? What (hall this belee, but to saie that Christ came to the destruction of them that be his, & not to their salvation, if that mercifulnesse of God in pardoning sinnes which in the old testament was continually ready for the holic ones, be now said to be vterely taken awaie? But if we beleue the Scriptures which expressly cite out, y in Christ only the grace and kindnes of the Lord fully appeared, that the plentifullnes of mercy was pouered out, that the reconciliation of God and men was fulfilled: let vs not doubt that there flourished vs a more bountifull mercifulnes of his heauenlie father, than that it is cut off or shortned. And hereof there want not examples. Peter which had heard that he should be denied before the Angels of God that confesse not the name of Christ before men, denied him thrice in one night, and that not without execution: yet he was not put away from pardon. They that lusted inordinately among the Thessaloniens are so chaftised, that yet they be gently called to repentance. Euen Simeon the Magician himselfe is not caft in desparation, but he is rather commaunded to hope well, when Peter counseleth him to flee to prayer.

27 Yet most hainous sinnes have sometime possessed whole Churches, out of which Paul rather gently unwrapped them, than pronounced them accursd. The falling away of the Galatians was no meane offence. The Corinthians were so much lesse excusable than they, as they abounded in mo and those nothing lighter sinnes; yet neither of them are excluded from the mercie of God. Yea even they that had sinned above the rest in uncleanesse, fornication & vnchastity, are namely called to repentance. For the covenant of the Lord remaineth, and shall remaine for ever inviolable, which he solemnly made with Christ the true Salomon and his members; in these words: if his sinnes shall forfake my law, & shall not walke in my judgements, if they shall defile my righteousness, and not keepe my commandements, I will visit their iniquities with a rod, and their sins with stripes: But my mercie I will not take away from him. Finally by the vere order of the Creed we be taught, that there remaineth in the Church of Christ continual pardon of sinnes: for that when the Church is as it were stablised, yet forgivenes of sinnes is adioyned.

28 Some that be somewhat wiser, when they see the doctrine of Novius to be confuted with so great plainnesse of Scripture, make not euerie sinne unpardonable, but wilful transgression of the law, into which a man wittingly and willingly faileth. Nowe they that say fo, do vouchsafe to grant pardon to no sinne, but where a man hath erred by ignorance. But whereas the Lorde in the lawe commandeth one sort of Sacrifices to be offerd for cleansing of the wilfull sinnes of the faithful, and other to redeeme their ignorances: how great lewdnesse shall it be to greaunt no cleansing to wilfull sinne? I say that there is nothing plainer, than that the only Sacrifice of Christ availed to forgive the wilfull sins of the holy ones: forasmuch as the Lord hath testified the same by carnall Sacrifices as by signes. Against who can excuse David by ignorance, whom it is evident to have bin so well instructed in the lawe? Did David not know how great was the fault of adultery and manslaughter, which daily punished the same in other? Did brotherly slaughters seeme to the Patriarches a lawful thing? Had the Corinthians so ill profited they thought that wantonness, uncleannes, whoresome, hatreds, & contentions pleased God? Did Peter being so diligently admonished not know how great a matter it was to forsware his master? Therefore let us vs not with our owne enouiousnesse stop vp the way against the mercie of God that so gently uttereth it selfe.

29 Truely I am not ignorant that the olde writers expounded those sins that are daily forgiven to the faithfull, to be the light offences that creep in by weakenesse of the fleshe: and that they thought that the solemn repentance which was then required for hainous misdeedes might no more bee iterate than Baptisme. Which saying is not so to bee taken, as though they would either throwe them down headlong into desperation that after their first repentance had fallen againe, or extenuate those other sinnes as though they were small in the sight of GOD. For they knewe that the holy ones doe oftimes stagger by infidelitie, that superfuous othes doe sometimes fall from them, that they nowe and then are chas’d vnto anger, yea that they breake out even into manifest railinges, and besides these bee troubled with other cuilles which the Lorde not slenderly abhorreth: but they so called them, to put a difference betwene them and publike crimes that with great offence came to the knowledge of the Church. But whereas they did so hardly pardon them that had committed anie thing worthie of Eccle-Ecclesiasticall correction, they did not this therefore, because they thought that such should hardly have pardon with the Lorde: but by this severitie they meant to make other afraid, that they should not rashly runne into wicked doings, by the defiring whereof they might be estranged from the Communion of the Church: howbeit truly the worde of the Lorde which herein ought to be the only rule unto vs, appointeth a greater moderation. For it teacheth that the rigor of discipline is so far to be extended, that hee that ought cheefly to be provided for be not swallowed vp with heauines: as we haue before declared more at large.

The ii. Chapter.

A comparison of the false Church with the true Church.

Of how great value the ministerie of the worde and Sacraments ought to be with vs, and how farre the reuerence of it ought to proceede, that it be vnto vs a perpetuall token whereby to discerne the Church, it hath bene alreadie declared. That is to say, whereforeuer that ministerie abideth whole and uncorrupted, there the faults or diseases of manere are no impediment but that it may be the name of a Church. Then, that the very ministerie itself is by small errors not so corrupted, but that it may be esteemed lawfull. Moreover we haue shewed that the errors that ought so to be pardoned are those whereby the principal doctrine of religion is not hurt, whereby those chief pointes of religion that ought to bee agreeably holden among the faithfull are not destroyed, & in the Sacrament, those that doe not abolish nor impair the lawfull institution of him that ordained them. But so soone as lying is broken into the cheef tower of religion, so soone as the summe of necessarie doctrine is perverted, and the vfe of the Sacramentes falleth: truely the destruction of the Church followeth: like as a mans life is at an ende, when his thriote is thrust through or his heart deadly wounded. And this is clearly proved by the wordes of Paul, when hee teacheth that the foundation of the Church is laid upon the doctrine of the Apostles and Prophets, Christ himselfe being the head corner stone. If the foundation of the Church bee the doctrine of the Prophets and Apostles, by which the faithfull are commanded to repose their salvation in onely Christ: then take away that doctrine, and howe shall the building stande any longer? Therefore the Church must needs fall downe where that summe of religion falleth which is onely able to vpholde it. Againe, if the true Church bee the piller and staye of the truth, it is certaine, that there is no Church, where lying and fallhood haue vndered the dominion.

2 Sith it is in such case vnder the Papistrie, wee may understande howe much of the Church is there remaining. In stead of the ministerie of the word, there reigneth a peruerse governement and made of lies mingled together, which partly quencheth & partly choaketh the pure light: Into the place of the Lorde Supper is entred a most filthie sacrilege: the forme of woe... worshipping God is deformed with a manifolde and intolerable heap of superstitious; the doctrine, without which Christianitie cannot stand, is altogether buried and driven out: the publicke assemblies are the school of idolatrie and godliness. Therefore there is no peril least in departing from a damnable partaking of so many mischieues, we be plucked from the Church of Christ. The communion of the Church was not ordained to this ende that it should be a bond whereby we should be intangled with idolatrie, godliness, ignorance of God, and other kindes of evils: but rather whereby we should be fast holden in the feare of God and obedience of truth. They do in deed gloriously let out their Church into vs, that there should seeme to be no other Church in the world: and afterward, as though the victorie were gotten, they decree that all the Schismatikes that dare drawe themselves from the obedience of that Church that they paint out: & that all be heretikes that dare once mutter against the doctrine thereof. But by what proues do they conforme that they haue the true Church? They alledge out of the auncient Chronicles, what in olde time was in Italie, in Frannie, in Spaine. They say that they fetch their beginning from those holy men that with founde doctrine founded and rased vp Churches, and stablished the same doctrine and edifying of the Church with their bloud. And that so the Church hath been among them so consecrate both with spiritual gifts, and with the bloud of martyrs, and preferred with continual succession of Bishops, that it might not fall away. They rehearse how much Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, and other esteemed this succession. But howe trilling these things bee, and howe they be but vvere mockeries, I will make them verie easie to understand that will be content a little to weigh them with mee. Truely I woulde also exhort themselves earnestly to take heed hereunto, if I did trut that I might any thing preuaile with them by teaching, But for as much as they, leaueing all regarde of truth, doe bende themselves to this onely purpose, by all the wayes that they can, to defende their owne cause, I will onely speake a fewe things whereby good men and thofe that love the truth, may winde themselfes out of their futile cavillations. First I aske of them, why they do not alledge Aphrike, and Egypt, & all Asia? Even because in all those countries this holy succession of Bishops hath ceased, by meanes whereof they boaste that they haue preferred Churches. They come therefore to this point to say, that they therefore haue a true Church, because since it first began to be, it hath not beene destitute of Bishops: for in perpetuall course they haue succeeded one another. But what if I cast Greece in their way? Therefore I aske againe of them, why they say that the Church is lost among the Grecians, among whom that succession of Bishops was never interrupted, which in their opinion is the onely keeper and preserver of the Church. They make the Grecians Schismatikes, but by what right? because in departing from the Apostolike Sea, they haue lost their privilege. What? Do not they much more deere to lose it that depart from Christ himselfe? It followeth therefore, that the pretence of succession is but vaine, vnslee the posteritie do keepe fast and abide in the truth of Christ, which they haue receiued of their fathers fro hand to hand.
Therefore the Romanists at this day do allege nothing else but that which it appeareth that the Jewes in old time alleged, when they were by the Prophets of the Lord reproved of blindness, vngodliness, and idolatry. For they gloriouly boast of the temple, Ceremonies & priesthoods, by which things, by great reason as they thinke they measured the Church. So in fpee, of the Church, they shew certaine outward things, that often times are farre from the Church, and without which the Church may very well stand. Therefore we need to confute them with no other argument, than that wherewith Hieronymi fought against the foolish presumptuouness of the Jewes: that is, that they should not boast in lying words, saying, The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, it is the temple of the Lord. Forasmuch as the Lord dieth no where acknowledge any thing for his, but where his word is hearde and reverently observ'd. So when the glory of God did fit between the Cherubins in the Sanctuary, & he had promised them that that should be his stead fast seat; yet when the Priests once corrupted the worshipping of him with peruerse superstitions, he removed else where, & left the place without any holiness. If the same temple which seemed to be holyly appointed to the perpetuall dwelling of God, might be forsaken of God and become unholy: there is no cause why these men shoulde be the Church. And this is it about which Paul contendeth in the Epistle to the Romans, from the 9. chapter to the 12. For this did fore trouble weake consciences, that the Jewes when they seemed to be the people of God, did not only refuse the doctrine of the Gospel, but also persecute it. Therefore after that he hath set out the doctrine, hee removeth this doubt, & denieth that these Jewes being enemies of the truth are the Church, howsoever they wanted nothing that otherwise might be required to the outward forme of the Church. And therefore he denieth it, because they embraced not Christ. But somewhat more expressely in the Epistle to the Galathians: wherin comparing Ismael with Isaac, he sayeth that many hold place in the Church, to whom the inheritance belongeth not, because they are not begotten of the free mother. From whence also he defendeth the comparison of two Hierusalem. Because as the lawe was given in the mount Sinai, but the Gospel came out of Hierusalem. So many being feruilely borne & brought vp do without doute boast themselves to be the children of God and of the Church, yea they proudly despise the natural children of God, when themselves be but bastards. On the other side also, when we heare that it was once pronounced from heaven: Cast out the bond woman and her sonne, let vs, standing upon this inviolable decree, boldly despishe their vainlawrie boastings. For if they be proud by reason of outward profession, Ismael was also circumcised: if they contende by antiquitie, hee was the first begotten, and yet we see that he is put away. If the cause be demanded, Paul assigneth it, for that none are accounted children, but they that are begotten of the pure lawfull seed of doctrine. According to this reason God denieth that he is bounde to wicked priests by this that he comennanted with their Father Leue, that he should be his Angel or Interpreter.
Cap. 2. Of the outwarde meanes

yea, he turneth against themselues their false boasting, wherewith they were wont to rise vp against the Prophets, that the dignitie of Priesthood was to be had in singular estimation. This he willingly admitteth, & with the same condition he debateth with them, because he is ready to keepe his covenant, but when they do not mutually performe their parte to him, they desere to be reiecte. Loc what succession auileth, vnlesse therewithall be also ioned an imitation and euen continuing course euene to this effect, the successors, so soone as they be proved to haue swarued from their originally, be depreied of all honor. Vnlesse perhaps because Caiphas succeeded many godly Bishops (yea there was euene from Aaron to him a continual vnbroken course of succession;) therefore that same mischieuous assembly was worthie the name of the Church. But this were not tolerable euene in earthly dominions, that the tyrannie of Ceasara, Nero, Heliosabalbus and suche other, should be called a true state of Common weale, for that they succeeded the Brutes, Scipions, & Camilles. But specially in the government of the Church there is nothing more fonde, than leuing the Doctrine to set the succession in the Persones onely. But neither did the holy Doctors whom they falsely thrust in vnto vs, meane any thing lesse, than to prove that precisely as it were by right of inheritance Churches be there where Bishops are succedually placed one after another. But where at it was then out of controversy, that from the very beginning to that age nothing was changed in Doctrine, they allcaged that which might suffice to make an end of all newe errors, that is, that by those was that doctrine oppugned, which had becene euene from the Apostles constantly and with one agreeing consent retained. There is therefore no cause, why they should any longer goe forward to deceitie by pretending a false colour under the name of the Church which we doe reverentlie esteeme as becommeth vs: but when they come to the definition of it, not onely water (as the common sayinge is) cleaueth vnto them, but they sticke fast in their owne myre because they put a stinking harlot in place of the holie spouse of Chrift. That this putting in of a changeling should not deceitie vs, beside other admonitions, let vs remember this alfo of Augustine. For speaking of the Church, he saith: It is that is sometime darkned, & covered with multitude of offences as with a cloud: sometimes in calmenesse of time appeareth quiet & free; sometime is hidden and troubled with waues of tribulations and tempations. He brings forth examples, that oftentimes the strongest pillers either valiantly suffered banishment for the faith, or were hidden in the whole world.

4 In like maner the Romanistas do vs e vs, and make aeraide the ignorant with the name of the Church, whereas they be the deadly enemies of Chrift. Therefore although they pretend the temple, the priesthood & the other such outward shewes, this vaine glistering wherewith the eyes of the simple be dased ought nothing to move vs to grant that there is a church where the Word of God doth not appeare. For this is the perpetual marke wherewith God hath marked them be his. He that is of the truth (faith he) heareth my voyce. Againe, I am that good shepheard, and I know my sheepe, & am known of them. My sheepe heare my voyce, & I know them, & they follow me. And a little before he had saide, that the sheep follow their shepetheheard,because they knew his voice: but they follow not a stranger, but runne away from him because they knew not the voice of strangers. Why are we therefore wilfully mad in judging the Church, whereas Christ hath marked it with a vndoutfull signe, which wherefoever it is scene can not deceive, but it certainly sheweth the Church to be there: but where it is not, there remaineth nothing can give a true signification of the Church.
For Paul rehearseth that the Church was builded, not vpon the judgements of me, not vpon priesthodes, but vpon the doctrine of the Apostles & Porphets. But rather Hierusalem is to be seuerally known for Babylon, and the Church of Christ from the conspiracie of Satan, by a difference wherewith Christ hath made the different one from the other. He that is of God (faith he) heareth the wordes of God. Ye therefore heare not, because ye are not of God. In a trium, forasmuch as the church is the kingdome of Christ, and he reigneth not but by his word, can it be now doubtfull to any man, but those be the wordes of lying, by which Christes kingdome is faine to be without his scepter, that is to say without his holy word?

5 But now whereas they accuse vs of Schisme & heresie, because we both preach a contrarie doctrine to them, and obey not their lawes, and have our assemblies to praiers, to Baptisme, to the ministriatio of the Supper, & other holy doings, seuerally from the: it is indeed a very fore accuation, but such as needeth not a long or laborous defence. They are called heretikes and schismatiques, which making a division, do break in sunder the communion of the Church. And this communion is holde together with true bondes, to is to say, the agreement of true doctrine, and brotherly charity. Whereupon Augustine puteth this difference betwenee heretikes & schismatiques, that heretikes indeede do with false doctrines corrupt the purenes of faith, but the schismatiques sometime even where there is like faith, do break by bond of fellowshippe. But this is also to be noted, that this coniynning of charitye so hangeth vpon the vnite of Faith, that faith ought to be the beginning ther of, the end, & finally the only rule. Let vs therefore remember that so oft as the vnite of the church is commended vnto vs, this is required, that while our minds agree in Christ, our wills also may be joined together with mutual willing in Christ. Therefore Paul, when he exhorteth vs to that will willing, taketh for his foundation that there is one God, one Faith, & one Baptisme.
Ephe. 4.5
Yea whereas he teacheth vs to be of one minde, and of one will, hee by & by addeth in Christ, or according to Christ: meaning that it is a fauis companie of the wicked, & not an agreement of the faithfull which is without the worde of the Lorde.

6 Cyprian also following Paul deriveth the whole fountaine of the agreement of the Church, from the only bishoprick of Christ. He afterward addeth the Church is but one, which spretheth abroad more largely into a multitude with encrease of frutefulnesse: like as there be many sunne beames, but one light: and many branches of a tree, but one body grounded vpon a fast roote: And when manie streames so flow from one fountaine, although the number seeme to be scattered abroad by largenes of overflouing plentie, yet the vnite abideth in the originall. Take away a beame of the sunne from the body, the vnite can suffer no division, Break a branch from the tree,
Of the outwarde meanes

The broken branch cannot spring. Cut off the stream from the spring head being cut off, the spring head will be overspren with the light of the Lord, is extended over the whole world: yet there is but one light that is spread every where. Nothing could be said more fitly to express that undivided knitting together, which all the members of Christ have one with another. We see how theologically calleth vs backe to the verie head. Whereupon he pronounceth that hereafter & schismes do arise thereof, that men do not returne to the original of truth, nor do seke y hed, nor kepe the doctrin of the heavenly master. Now let them go & cry vs be berefrics that have departed from their church, ych there hath been no cause of our estranging from the but this one, that they can in no wise abide the pure profession of the truth: but I tell not how they have driven vs out with curtings & cruel execrations. Which very selfe doing doth abundantly enough acqjute vs, vnlesse they will also condemn the Apostles for schismatics, with whom we have al one cause. Christ (saying) did sometime to his Apostles, that the time should come when they should be cast out of the Synagogues for his names sake. And those Synagogues of which he spake, were then accounted lawfull Churches. Sith therefore it is evident that we be cast out & wee bee ready to shew that the same is done for the names sake of Christ, truely the cause ought first to be inquired of, before that any thing be determined vpon vs, either one way or other. Howbeit if they will lay content to discharge them of this point. For it is enough for me, that it behoved that we shoule depart from them, that we might come to Christ.

7 But it shall appeare yet more certainly in what estimation we ought to have all the churches whom the tyranny of that Romif idol hath posseed, if it be compared with the olde church of the Israelites, as it is described in the Prophets. There was then a true Church among the Jews and Israelites, when they continued in the lawes of the covenant, for they obtained those thinges by the benefit of God, whereupon the church consisteth. They had the truth of doctrine in the lawe: the ministerie thereof was among the Priests and the Prophets: with the signe of circumcision they entred into religion: by other Sacramentes they were exercised to the confirmation of Faith. It is no doubt that those titles wherewith the Lord hath honored his Church, fitly pertained to their fellowship. After that, forsaking the lawe of the Lord, they went out of kind to idolatrie & superstition, they partly lost that prerogatiue. For who dare take away the name of the church of the Lord, with whom God hath left the preaching of his word and observation of his mysteries? Againe, who dare call that the Church without any exception, where the word of the Lord is openly and freely troden under foot? where the ministerie thereof, the chiefes, sicnew, yea the very soule of the Church is destroyed?

8 What then wil some maie say: was there therefore no parcel of a Church remaining among the Jews, after that they fell away to idolatrie? The answer is easie. Frst I say that in the very falling away there were certaine degrees. For wee will not say that there was all one fall of Judah, and Israel, at suche time as they both first swarted from the pure worshipping of God. When Iarobeam first made cahnces, against the open prohibition of GOD, and did dedicate...

Dedicate an unlawful place for worshipping, he did utterly corrupt religion. The Jews did first defile themselves with wicked and superstitious manner before that they wrongfully changed the order in the outward form of religion. For although under Rechabeam they had already gotten them many pernicious Ceremonies; yet because there miscarried at Hierusalem both the Doctrine of the Law, and the Priesthood, & the ceremonious viles in such sort as God had ordained them, the godly had there a tolerable state of Church. Among the Israelites vnto thy raigne of Achab, there was no amendment of things, and from thence forth they fell from worse to worse. They that succeeded afterward, to the verie destruction of the kingdom, partly were like vnto him, & partly (when they minded to be somewhat better than he) they followed the example of Iarobeam: but they al every one were wicked and idolaters. In Jewry there were now & then diverse chaungs, while some kings peruered the worshipping of God with false & forged superstitions, some other restored religion that was decayed: vntill the verie priests themselves defiled the Temple of God with prophanate and abominable viles.

9. Nowe let the Papists if they can how much soever they extenuate their owne faults, deny that among them the state of religion is as corrupt and defiled as it was in the kingdom of Israel under Iarobeam. But they have a greater idolatrie: and in doctrine they are not one drop purer: vnlesse peradventure even in it also they be more vnpure. God, yea all men that are endued but with a meane judgement, shall be witnesses with me, & the thing it selfe also declareth, how herein I tell nothing more than truth. Nowe when they will drive vs to the communion of the Church, they require two things of vs: first, that we should communicate with all their prayers, sacraments, and Ceremonies: then that whatsoever honor, power and jurisdiction Christe giveth to his Church, wee should give the same to their Church. As to the first point, I graunt that all the Prophets that were at Hierusalem, when things were there verie much corrupted, did neither separately sacrifice, nor had aieblies to pray together from other men. For they had a commandement of God, whereby they were commanded to come together into Salmos's temple: they knewe that the Leuitical priests, howe fovere they were unworthy of that honour, yet because they were ordained by the Lord ministers of the holy ceremonies, and were not as then deposited, did yet still rightfully possesse that place. But (which is the chief point of this question) they were compelled to no superstitious worshipping, yea they tooke in hand to do nothing but that which was ordained by God. But among these men, I mean the Papists, what like thing is there? For wee can scarcely have any meeting together with them, wherein we shall not defile our selves with open idolatrie. Truely the principal bonde of their communion is in the Maffe, which we abhorre as the greatest sacrilidge. And whether we do this rightfully or wrongfully, shall be scene in another place. At this present it is enough to shewe that in this behalf we are in other case than thy Prophets were, which although they were present at the ceremonies of the wicked, were not compelled to behold or vs any ceremonies but such as were instituted by God. And, if they will needes have an example al-
Cap. 2. Of the outwarde meanes gather like, let vs take it out of the kingdome of Israel. After the ordinance of Jeroboam Circumcision remained, the sacrifices were offered, the Lawe was accounted holy, the same God was called upon whom they had recei-ued of their fathers: but for the forged and forbidden forms of worshipping, God disallowed and condemned all that was there done.

Shewe mee one Prophet, or any one godly man that once worshipped or sacrificed in Bethell. For they knewe they could not doe it, but that they should dehile themselves with some sacrifice. Wee haue then thus much, that the communion of the Church ought not so farre to be of force with the godly, that if it should degenerate to prophane and filthy vsages, they should forthwith of necessitie follow it.

But about the other point we contend yet more earnestly. For if the Church be so considered to be such, whose judgement we ought to re-terence, whose authority to regard, whose monitions to obey, with whose chastisements to be moved, whose communion in all things we ought religiously to observe: then we cannot grant them a Church, but that we must of necessitie be bound to subjection & obedience unto it. Yet we will willingly grant them that which the Prophets granted to the Iews & Israelites of their time, when things were there in as good, yea or in better state.
But we see how eche where they cry out, their assemblies are vnholie, to which it is no more lawfull to consent than it is to deny God. And surely if those were Churches, it felloweth therefore that in Israel Helias, Micheas and such other: In Iurie, Esay, Ieremy, Osee and other of that sort, whom the Prophets, priests and people of that time hated & detested worse than any uncircumcised men, were strangers from the Church of God. If those were Churches, then the Church was not the piller of truth, but the stay of life: not the tabernacle of the living God, but the receptacle of idols. Therefore it was needesfull for them to depart from the consent of those assembles, which was nothing else but a wicked conspiracie against God. In like manner if anie man acknowledge the assemblies at these dayes being defiled with idolatrie, superstition and wicked doctrine, to bee such in whose full communion a Christian man ought to continue even to the consent of doctrine, he shall greatly care. For if they bee Churches, then they haue the power of the keyes. But the keyes are inseperably knit with the worde, which is from thence quite driven away. Againe, if they be Churches, then the promise of Christ is of force among them, whatsoever ye bide, & c.
But they contrariwise doe banish from their communion all such as doe professe themselves not saineled to the servants of Christ. Therefore either either the promise of Christ is vaine, or at least in this respect they are not Churches. Finally in stead of the ministry of the worde they haue schooles of ungodliness, and a sinke of all kindes of errors. Therefore either in this respect they are not Churches, or three shall remaine no token whereby the lawfull assemblies of the faithfull may bee severally known from the metings of Turkes.

But as in the olde time there yet remained among the Iews certain peculiar prerogatives of the Church, so at this day also wee take not from the Papites such steppes as is pleased the Lord to haue remaining among
them after the disputacion of the Church. The Lorde had once made his covenant with the Jewes. That faire rather being vpheld by the steadinesse of itself did continue with strving against their vnGodlinesse, ther was preferred by them. Therefore (such was the assurednesse and constancie of Gods goodnes) there remained the covenant of the Lord, neither could his faithfulness be blotted out by their vnfaithfulness: neither could Circumcision be so profaned with their vncleane hands, but that it stilled signe and sacrament of that covenant. Whereupon the children that were borne of them, the Lord called his owne, which vnles it were by speciall blessing belonged nothing to him. So when he hath left his covenant in France, Italic, Germanie, Spaine, Englande: since those provinces have beene oppressed with the tyranny of Antichrist; yet that his covenant might remaine inviolable, first he there preferred Baptisme, the testimonie of his covenant, which being consecrat by his owne mouth retained his own force notwithstanding the vnGodlinesse of their then, with his providence he hath wroght that there should remaine other remanantes, leaft the Church should be vterly destroyed. And as oftentimes buildinges are so pulled downe, that the foundations & ruines remaine: so he hath not suffered his church either to be overthrown by Antichrist from the very foundation, or to be laid even with the ground (howsoever to punish the vnthankfulness of men that had defpised his wornde, he suffereth horrible shaking and disspersion to chance) but even after the very wafting he willed that the building halfe pulled downe should yet remaine.

12 Whereas therefore we will not simply grante to the Papists the title of the Church, we do not therefore deny that there be churches among the: but only wee contend of the true & lawfull ordering of the Church: which is required in the communion both of the sacraments which are the signes of profession, but also specially of doctrine. Daniel and Paul foretold that Antichrist should sitte in the temple of God. With vs wee account the Byshoppe of Rome the captaine and standarder bearer of that wicked and abominable kingdom. Whereas his feate is placed in the temple of GOD, thereby is meant that his kingdom shalbe such as can not abolish the name of Christ nor of his church. Hereby therefore appeareth, that wee doe not deny but that euender his tyranny remain churches, but such as he hath profaned with vnGodlinessse full of sacrilege, such as he hath afflicted with outrageous domination, such as he hath corrupted & in manner killed with euil and damnable doctrines, as with poisoned drinkes: such wherein Christ lieth halfe buried, the God therefore overwhelmed, godlinessse banished, the worshipping of God in a manner abolished: such finally wherein all things are so troubled, that therein rather appeareth the face of Babylon then of the holy citie of God. In a summe, I say that they be Churches, in respecte that the Lord there marvellously preferveth the remanantes of his people howsoever they were dispersed and scattered abroad, in respecte that there remaine some tokens of the Church, specially these tokens, the effectuallnesse whereof neither the craft of the devill, nor the malicioussenesse of man can destroy. But on the other side because these marke is blotted out, which in this discourse we ought principally to have respect unto, I say that euery
Cap. 3. Of the outwarde meanes euerie one of their assemblies & the whole body wanteth the lawful forme of a Church.

The iii. Chapter.

Of the teachers and ministers of the church, and of their election and office.

Nowe it is meete that we speake of the order, by which it was the Lords will to have this Church gouverned. For although in his Church hee onely muft rule and reigne, yea and bear preeminence or excell in it, and this government to be vscd or executed by his onely word; yet because he dwelleth not among vs in visble presence, so that he can presently with his owne mouth declare his will vnto vs, we haue saide that in this he vseth the ministerie of men, and as it were the trauaile of deputyes, not in transferring his right and honour vnto them, but onely that by their mouth hee might doe his owne worke, like as a workman to doe his worke vstho his instrument. I am compelled to repeate againe those thinges that I haue alreadie declared. He might in deede doe it either by himselfe without anie other helpe or instrument, or also by meane of Angelles: but there are many caules why he had rather doe it by men. For by this meane first he declareth his good will towardes vs, when he taketh out of men them that shall doe his message in the world, that shall be the interpreters of his secret will, finally that shall represent his owne person. And so by experience hee proueth that it is not vaine that commonly he calleth vs his temples, when our mouthes of men: as out of his sanctuarie, hee giueth answeres to men. Secondly, this is the best and most profitable exercisse to humiliatie, when he accuseth vs to obey his worde, howsoever it he preached by men like vnto vs, yea sometyme our inferiours in dignitie. If hee himselfe speake not heauen, it were no maruie if his holy Oracles were without delay reuerently receiued with the cares and mindes of all men. For who would not doo his power being in presence? who would not be thrown downe at the first sight of so great maiestie? who would not be confounded with that infinite brightness? But when some sullie man risen out of the dust speakest in the name of GOD, here with very good testimonie we declare our godlineffe and reuerent obedience towardes God himselfe, if to his minister we yeelde our selues willing to learne, which yet in nothing excelleth vs. Therefore for this cause also hee hath hidden the treasure of his heavenly wisdome in bricke and earthen vessells, that he might have the certainer prooue howe much he is esteemed of vs. Moreover there was nothing fitter for the cherishing of mutuall charitie, than that men should bee bounde together one to another with this bond, when one is made a paytor to teach the rest, and they are commanded to be schoolers receive all one doctrine at one mouth. For if euerie man were able enough to ferue himselfe, and heedeth not the helpe of another: such is the pride of mans nature, that euerie one would despise other, and shoulde againe be despised of them. Therefore the Lorde hath bounde his Churche with that knotte, which he foresaw to be the strongest knotte to holde vnite together, when he hath left with men the doctrine of salvation, and of eternall life, that by their

Therefore Paul had respect when he wrote to the Ephesians, One body one spirit, as also ye be called in one hope of your calling. One Lord, one faith, one Baptism: One God, and the father of all, which is above all, and by all, and in vs all. But vs to every one of vs grace is given according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Wherefore he saith: When he was gone vp on high, he ledde captivity captive, he gave gifts to men. Hee that went downe is the same he, that went vp, that he might fullfil all thinges. And the same hath gien some to be Apostles, and some Prophets, and some Euangeliftes, & other some Pastors and teachers, vs to the restoring of the holy ones, to the worke of ministration, to the edifying of the body of Christ, vs till we come all into the vnitie of faith, and of the knowledge of the sonne of GOD, into a perfect man, into the measure of full grown age: that wee be no more children that may bee carried about with every winde of doctrine: but following the vnitie in charitie, let vs in all thinges growe into him that is the head, even Christ, in whom the whole bodie coniogned and compacted together by all the ioynte of subministration, according to the working in measure of euery parte, makest euery cresseae of the body, vs to the edifying of it selue by charitie.

2 By these words he sheweth, that this ministerie of men, which God vs eth in gouvewing his Church is the cheefe snew, whereby the faithful cleaue together in one body: and also he sheweth that the Church can not otherwise be preferred safe, but if it be vphold by these staves, in which it pleased the Lorde to repose the saluation of vs. Christ (faith he) is gone vp on high, that he might fullfil all thinges. This is the manner of fullfilling, that by his ministers, to whom he hath committed that office, & hath gien the grace to execute that worke, he disposeth and distributeth his gifts to the church, yea and after a certaine manner giueth himself present, with extending the power of his spirit in this institution, that it should not be vaine or idle. So is the restoring of the holy ones performed: so is the body of Christ edifie do so we by all thinges growe into him that is the head, and do grow together among our selves: so are we all brought into the vnitie of Christ, if prophetic flourishing among vs, if we receive the Apostles, if we refuse not the doctrine ministered vs. Therefore he goeth about the dissipation, or rather the ruine and destruction of the Church, who soever he be that either endeuoureth to abolish this order of whom we speake, & this kind of government, or minifeth the estimation of it as a thing not so necessary, For neither the light & heat of the sun, nor meat and drinke are so necessary to nourish & sustaine this present life, as the office of Apostles and pastors is necessary to preserve the Church in earth.

3 Therefor I have above admonished, that God hath oftentimes with such titles as he could, commendeth the dignitie thereof of vs, that we should have it in most hygh honor and price, as the most excellent thing of all. He testifieth that hee gieareth to men a singular benefite, in raising them vp teachers, where hee comandeth the Prophet to criue out that faire are the fecte, and blessed is the comming of them that bring tidings of peace: and when hee calleth the Apostles the light of the worlde, and salt of the earth.

Earth. Neither could this office be more honourably advanced, than it was when he sayde: He that heareth you, heareth me. He that despiseth you, despiseth me. But there is no place more plain, than in Paul in his second Epistle to the Corinthians, where he as it were of purpose entreated of this matter. He affirmeth therefore, that there is nothing in the church more excellent or glorious than the ministrerie of the Gospel, orasmuch as it is the administration of the spirite, and of righteousness, and of eternal life. These and like sayings serve to this purpose, that that order of governing and preferring the church by ministers, which the Lord hath stablished for ever, should not growe out of estimation among vs, and at length by very contempt grow out of vs. And how great is the necessity thereof, hee hath declared not only by words, but also by examples. When his will was to shine more fully to Cornelius with the light of his truth, hee sent an Angel from heaven to send Peter vnto him. When his will was to call Paul to the knowledge of himselfe, and to engraft him into the church, he spake not to him with his owne voice, but sent him to a man, of whom he should receive both the doctrine of salvation, and the sanctification of baptisme. If it bee not done without cause, that an angell, which is the interpreter of God, do himselfe abstinence from declaring the will of God, but commandeth that a man be sent for, to declare it: and not without cause that Christ the only schoolmaster of the faithfull committeth Paul to the schooling of a man, yea euen that same Paul whom he had determined to take vp into the third heaven, and to vouchsafe to granthim a miraculous revelation of things vnspakable: who is there nowe that dare despise that ministrerie, or passe it over as a thing superfluous, the vse whereof it hath pleased God to make approoved by such examples?

4. They that have rule of the government of the Church according to the institution of Christ, are named of Paul first Apostles, then Prophets, thirdly Evangelists, fourthly Pastors, last of all teachers. Of which, the two last alone have ordinary office in the church: the other three the Lord raised vp at the beginning of his kingdom, and sometime yet also raiseth vp, as the necessity of times requireth. What is the Apostles office, appeareth by that commandement: goe, præche the Gospel to euery creature. There are not certaine boundes appointed vnto them: but the whole world is assigned them, to bee brought into the obedience of Christ: that in spreading the Gospel among all nations, where it be able, they may eche where raise vp his kingdome. Therefore Paul, when he went about to proue his Apostleschippe, rehearseth that he hath gotten to Christ not some one citie, but hath farre and wide spread abroad the Gospel: and that he hath not layde his handes to an other mans foundation, but planted Churches where the name of the Lord had never bene heard of. Therefore the Apostles were sent to bring backe the world from falling away, unto true obedience of GOD, and eche where to stablish his kingdome by preaching of the Gospel: or (if you like that better) as the first builders of the Church, to lay the foundations thereof in all the world. Prophets he calleth, not all expostors of Gods will, whatsoever they bee, but those that by singular revelation excelled, such as at this time either bee none, or are or are lesse notable. By Evangeliftes I understand those, which when in dignitie they were lesse than the Apostles, yet in office were next vnto them, yea and occupied their places. Such were Luke, Timothee, Titus, and other like: and peraduenture also the seuentie Disciples, whom Christ appointed in the second place after the Apostles. According to this exposition (which seemeth to me agreable both with the words and meaning of Paul) those three offices were not ordained in the Church to this ende that they should be perpetuall, but onely to serue for that time wherein Churches were to be erected, where were none before, or at least to bee remoued from Moses to Christ. Albeit I denye not, but that afterwarde also the Lord hath sometime raised vp Apostles, or at least in their places Evangeliftes, as it hath beene done in our time. For it was needfull to have suche, to bring backe the Church from the falling away of Antichrist. Yet the office it selfe I doe neuertheless cal extraordinary, because it hath no place in the Churches alreadie well fet in order. Next after these are Pastors and Teachers, whom the Church may neverthelss lacke: betweene whome I thinke that there is this difference, that the teachers are not appointed to beare rule of discipline, nor for the ministration of Sacraments, nor admonishmentes or exhortations, but only to expound the Scripture, that pure and sounde doctrine may bee kept among the faithfull. But the office of Pastor containeth al these things within it.

5 Now we haue which were those ministries in the Church that continued but for a time, and which were those that were ordained to endure perpetually. If we joyn the Evangelistes with the Apostles, wee shall haue remaining two couples after a certeine manner answering the one to the other. For as our teachers are like to the olde Prophets, in such sorte are our Pastors like to the Apostles. The office of Prophets was more excellent, by reason of the singular gift that they had of revelation: but the office of teachers hath in a manner like order, and altogether the same end. So those twelue whom the Lord did choose, that they should publish abroad to the world the new preaching of the Gospell, in degree and dignitie went before the rest. For although by the meaning and propretie of the word, all the ministrers of the Church may be rightly called Apostles, because they are sent of the Lord, and are his messengers: yet becaufe it was much behoefull, that there should be a ceteine knowledge had of the sending of them, y should bring a thing newe and vnheard of, it was necessarie that those twelue (to whose number Paul was afterwarde added) should be garnished with some peculer title above the rest. Paul himselfe in dece in one place giueth this name to Antronius and Iunias, whom he faith to have beene notable among the Apostles: but when hee meaneth to speake properly hee referreth it to none other but to that principal degree. And this is the common use of the Scripture. Yet the Pastors (saing that ech of them doe gouerne several Churches appointed to them) haue all one charge with the Apostles. Now what manner of thing this is, let vs yet heare it more plainly.

should distiribute the holy signes of his bodie and bloud, as he had done. Loe here is a holy, inuoable and perpetuall law laide vpon them that succeede in the Apostles place, whereby they receive commandement to preach the Gospel, & minister the Sacraments. Whereupon we gather, that they which neglect both these things, doe falsely say that they beare the person of the Apostles. But what of the Pastors? Paul speaketh not of himselfe only, but of them all, when hee faith: let a man so esteeme vs as the ministers of Christ, and distiributers of the mysteries of God. Againe in another place, a Bishop must be a fast holder of that faithfull worde which is according to doctrine: that he may be able to exhort by sound doctrine, and to convince the gainayers. Out of those and like places, which are eche where to bee found, we may gather, that also in the office of the Apostles these bee the two principall partes, to preach the Gospel, and to minister the Sacraments. As for the order of teaching, it consisteth not only in publike Sermons, but belongeth also to priuare admonitions. So Paul calleth the Ephesians to witnes that he hath not fled from doing of any of those things that were for their profit, but that he preached and taught them both openly & in euerie house, testifying both to the Iewes and Grecians, repentance and faith in Christ. Againe a little after: that hee hath not ceased with tears to admonish everyone of them. Neither yet belongeth it to my purpose at this present to express all the qualities of a good Pastor, but only to point out what they profess: that call themselves Pastors: that is, that they are so made rulers of the Church, not that they should have an idle dignitie, but that they should with the doctrine of Christ instruct the people to true godliness, minister the holy mysteries, and preserve and exercise vpright discipline. For whomeuer be set to be watchmen in the Church, the Lorde declareth vnto them, that if any by their negligence perish through ignorance, hee will require the bloud at their hands. That also pertayneth to them al, which Paul faith of himselfe: woe to mee vntele I preach the Gospel, forasmuch as the distributing thereof is committed to me. Finally, what the Apostles performed to the whole world, the same ought every Pastor to performe to his flocke, to which he is appointed.

7 Albeit when we assigne to every one their several Churches, yet in the meane while we do not deny but that he which is bound to one Church may helpe other Churches, if any troublesome thing doe happen that requirith his presence, or if he be asked counsel of any darke matter. But forasmuch as for the keeping of the peace of the Church, this policie is necessarie, that there be set forth to every man what hee should doe, least all be confusedly disordered, runne about without calling, or rashly runne altogether into one place, and least such as are more careful for their own commoditie than for the edification of the Church, shoulde at their owne will leave their Churches vacant: this ordering ought commonly to bee kept so neere as may bee, that every man contented with his owne bounds shoulde not break into another mans charge. And this is no invention of man, but the ordinance of GOD himselue. For wee read that Paul and Barnabas created Priestes in al the severall Churches of Lysia, Antioche, Iconium: and Paul himselfe commandeth Titus that hee should appoint Priestes in every towne. So in one place he speaketh of the Bishops of Philipps, and in another place of Archipps Bishop of the Colossians. And there remaineth a notable Sermon of his in Luke, to the Priestes of the Church of Ephesus. Whosoever therefore shall take upon him the government and charge of the Church, let him knowe that hee is bounde to this law of Gods calling: not that as bounde to the soyle (as the Lawyers terme it) that is, made bounde and fastened vnto it, he may not once moue his foote from thence, if the common profits do so require, so that be done well and orderly: but he that is called into one place ought not himselfe to thinke of removing, nor Secke to be delerius as hee shall thinke to be good for his commoditie. Then, if it be expedient that any bee remoued to an other place, yet he ought not to attempt it of his owne private aduise, but to tacie for publike authoritie.

8 But whereas I have without difference called them Bishops, and Priestes, and Pastors, and ministers, that rule Churches: I did that according to the vlage of the Scripture, which indifferently vseth these wordes. For whosoever doe execute the ministerie of the worde, to them he giueth the title of Bishops. So in Paul, where Titus is commanded to appoint Priestes in euery towne, it is immediately added. For a Bishop must be unreproucable, &c. So in another place he saluteth many Bishops in one church. And in the Acts it is rehearsed, that he called together the Priestes of Ephesus, whom he himselfe in his owne Sermon calleth Bishops. Here now it is to be noted, y hitherto we have recited none but those offices that stand in the ministerie of the word: neither doth Paul make mention of anie other in that fourth chapter which we have alledged. But in the Epistle to the Romanes, and in the first Epistle to the Corinthians, he reckoneth vp other offices, as powers, the gift of healing, interpretation, governement, caring for the poore. Of the which I omitted those that endured but for a time, because it is to no profitable purpose to tary uppon them. But there be two that do perpetually abide, that is to say, governement and care of the poore. Gouernours I thinke were the Elders chosen out of the people, that should together with the Bishopps, have rule of the judgement of manners, and the using of discipline. For a man cannot otherwise expound that which he faith: let him that ruleth doe it with carefulnesse. Therefore at the beginning every Church had their Senate, gathered of godly, grave and holy men: which had that fame iurisdiction in correcting of vices, whereof we shall speake hereafter. And that this was the order of more than one age, experience itself declareth. Therefore this office of governement is also necessary for all ages.

9 The care of the poore was committed to the Deacons. Howbeit to the Romanes, there are set two kindes. Let him that giueth (faith Paul in that place) doe it in simplicitie: let him that hath mercy, doe it in cheerefulnessse. Forasmuch as it is certaine he speaketh of the publike offices of the Church, it must needs bee that there were two severall degrees. Unlesse my judgement deceiue mee, in the first point he meaneth Deacons, that distributed the almes: in the other he speake wel of them that had giuen themselues to looking to the poore and sicke: of which sorte were the widowes of whom he make mention to Timothie. For women could execute no other work.

publice office, but to give themselves to the service of the poore. If we grant this, (as we must needs grant it) then there shall be two sortes of Deacons: of which one sort shall serve in distributing the things of the poore, the other in looking to the poore of the Church themselves. But although the word Diaconia, Deaconrie extended further, yet the Scripture specially calleth them Deacons, to whom the Church hath given the charge to distribute the almes, and to take care of the poore, and hath appointed them as it were stewards of the common treasury of the poore; whose beginning, institution and office, is described of Luke in the Acts. For when a murmuring was raised by the Grecians: for that in the ministerie of their widows were neglected, the Apostles excusing themselves with saying that they could not serve both offices, both the preaching of the word and the ministering at tables, required of the multitude, that there might be chosen seven honest men, to whom they might commit that doing. Loe what manner of Deacons the Apostolike Church had, and what Deacons it were meete for vs to have according to their example.

1. TIM. 5. 10.

Therefore, now whereas in the holy assembly all things are to be done in order and comely, there is nothing wherein that ought to be more diligently observed, than in establishing the order of government: because there is nowhere greater peril if any thing bee done vnorderly. Therefore to the end that vnquiet and troublesome men (which otherwise would happen) should rashly thrust in themselves to teach or to rule, it is expressly provided, that no man should without calling take upon him a publice office in the church. Therefore that a man may be judged a true minister of the Church, first he must be orderly called then he must answer his vocation, that is to say, take upon him and execute the dueties enjoyned him. This wee may sometimes marke in Paul which when he meaneth to approoue his Apostleship, in a manner alway with his faithfulnesse in executing his office he allegeth his calling. If so great a minifter of Christ dare not take upon himself the authoritie that he should bee heard in the Church, but because hee both is appointed thereunto by the commandement of the Lorde, and also faithfully performeth that which is committed unto him; how great shamefulnesse shall it be, if any man wanting both or either of these, shall challenge such honour to himselfe? But because we haue aboue touched the necessitie of executing the office, nowe let vs entreate onelie of the calling.

11. The discourse thereof standeth in foure pointes: that we should knowe, what manner of ministers, howe, and by whom ministers ought to bee instituted, and with what vsage or what ceremonie they are to be admittede. I speake of the outwarde and solemn calling, which belongeth to publiclike order of the Church: as for that secrete calling, whereof every minister is priuie in his owne conscience before God, and hath not the Church witnesse of it, I omitte it. It is a good witnesse of our heart, that not by any ambition, nor courtoufnesse, nor any other greedi desire, but with pure feare of God and zeale to edifie the Church, wee receive the office offered unto vs. That in deed is (as I haue saide) necessarie for euery one of vs, if we will approoue our ministerie allowable before God. Neuertheless hee is right-rightly called in presence of the Church, that commeth vnto it with an euil conscience, so that his wickednesse be not open. They are wont also to say that euell private men are called to the ministerie, whom they see to bee meet and able to execute it: because verily learning joyned with godlines and with the other qualities of a good Pastor, is a certaine preparation to the vrey office. For whom the Lord hath appointed to so great an office, he first furnisheth them with those armours that are required to fulfill it, that they should not come emptie and vnprepared vnto it. Whereupon Paul also to the Corinthians, when hee meant to dispose of the vrey offices, first rehearsed the gifts which they ought to haue that execute the offices. But because this is the first of those foure pointes that I haue propounded, let vs now go forward vnto it.

12 What manner of Bishops it is meete to choose, Paul doeth largely declare in two places, but the summe commeth to this effect, that none are to be chosen, but they that are of sound doctrine, and of holy life, and not notable in any vice, which might both take away credit from them, & procure slander to the ministerie. Of Deacons and Elders there is altogether like consideration. It is alway to be looked vnto, that they bee not vnable or vnfit to beare the burden that is layde vpon them, that is to say, that they may bee furnished with those powers that are necessarie to the fulfilling of their office. So when Christ was about to sende his Apostles, he garnished them with those weapons and instruments which they could not want. And Paul when he had painted out the image of a good and true Bishop, warneth Timothy, that hee would not defile himselfe with choosing any man that differeth from it. I referre this worde Howe, not to the Ceremonie of choosing, but to the reverent feare that is to be kept in the choosing. Hereupon come the fastinges and prayers, which Luke reciteth that the faithfull vied when they made Priestes. For wheras they understanded that they medled with a most euill matter, they durst attempt nothing, but with goods reverence and carefulnes, But they sheepeely applied themselves to prayers, whereby they might craue of God the spirite of counsell and discretion.

13 The third thing that we have set in our diuision was, by whom ministers are to be chosen. Of this thing no certeine rule can be gathered out of the institution of Apostles, which had some difference from the common calling of the rest. For because it was an extraordinarie ministerie, that it might be made discernable by some more notable marke, it behooved that they which should execute it, should be called and appointed by the Lords owne mouth. They therefore tooke in hand theire doing, being furnished by no mans election, but by the onely commaundement of God and of Christ.
Hereupon commeth that when the apostles would put an other in the place of Jesus, they durst not certainly name any one man, but they brought forth two, that the Lorde should declare by lot, whether of them hee would have to succeede. After this manner also it is meeke to take this, that Paul denieth that he was create Apostle of men or by man, but by Christ & God the father. That first point, that is to say of men, hee had common with all the godly ministers of the wornde. For no man couldie rightly take vpon him: that execution, but he that were called of God. But the other point Apostles elected of God himself.

was proper & singular to himselfe. Therefore when he glorifieth of this, hee doeth not only boast that he hath that which belongeth to a true and lawfull Pastor, but also bringeth forth the signes of his Apostleship. For when there were some among the Galathians, which travelling to diminish his authori-tie, made him some meane disciple, put in office under them by the principall Apostles: he, to defend in safetie the dignitie of his preaching, which he knewe to be shot at by those little deceits, needed to shewe himselfe in all points nothing inferior to the other Apostles. Therefore he affirmeth that he was chosen, not by the judgement of men, like some common Bishop, but by the mouth and manifest Oracle of the Lord himselfe.

14. But no man that is sober wil denye, that it is according to the order of lawfull calling, that Bishops shoulde be appointed by men: forasmuch as there are so many testimonies of the Scripture for proofe thereof. Neither doeth that saying of Paul make to the contrarie, as it is saide, that hee was not sent of men, nor by men: forasmuch as he speaketh not there of the or-dinarie choosing of ministers, but chalengeth to himselfe that which was speciall to the Apostles. Howbeit God also so appointed Paul by himselfe by singular prerogatieve, that in the meane time hee vsed the discipline of Ecclesiasticall calling. For Luke reporteth it thus, when the Apostles were fasting and praying, the Holy Ghost said: Separate unto me Paul and Bar-nam-bas to the work to which I have severally chosen them. To what purpose served that separation and putting on of handes, with the Holy Ghost hath testified his owne election, but that the discipline of the Church in appointing ministers by men, might be preserved? Therefore the Lord could by no plainer example approve such order, than he did when having first declared that he had ordained Paul Apostle for the Gentiles, yet he willed him to be appointed by the Church. Which thing we may see in the choosings of Mathias. For, because the office of Apostleship was of so great importance, that they durst not by their owne judgement choose any one man into that degree, they did first two men in the middest, vpon the one of whomse the lot should fall: that so both the election might have an open testimonie from heaven, and yet the policie of the Church should not be passed over.

15. Now it is demanded whether the minister ought to be chosen of the whole Church, or onely of the other of the same office, and of the Elders that haue the rule of discipline, or whether he may be made by the au-thoritie of one man. They that give this authoritie to one man, allege that which Paul saith to Titus: Therefore I haue left thee in Creta, that thou shouldst appoint in every towne Priests. Againe to Timotheus: Lay not handes quickly vpon any man. But they are deceived if they thinke, that either Timothe at Ephesus, or Titus in Creta, vsed a kingly power, that either of them should dispose of things at his owne will. For they were aboue the rest, only to goe before the people with good & wholesome counsels: not that they onely, excluding all other, should do what they listed. And that I may not seeme to faine any thing, I will make it plaine by a like example. For Luke reheareth that Paul and Barnabas appointed priests in divers Churches: but hee also expresseth the order or manner howe, when hee sayeth that is was done by voices:
voices ordaining Priests; (faith he) by lifting vp of hands in every Church.
Therefore they two did create them: but the whole multitude, as the Greeks manner was in elections, did by holding vp their hands, declare whom they would have. Even in like manner the Romaine histories do oftentimes say, that the Consul which kept the assemblies, created new of-cers, for none other cause but for that he received the voices and governed the people in the election. Truly it is not likely that Paul granted more to Timothée and Timo than he took to himself. But we see that he was wont to create Bishops by voices of the people. Therefore the places above are so to be understood, that they minish nothing of the common right & li-berie of the Church. Therefore Cyprian faith well, when he affirmeth that it commeth from the authoritie of God, that the Priest should be chosen in presence of the people before the eyes of all men, and shoud by publike judgement and testimonie be allowed for worthy and meet. For we see that this was by the commandement of the Lorde observed in the Levitical Priests, that before their consecration they should be brought into the light of the people. And no otherwise is Mathias added to the fellowship of the Apostles: and no otherwise the even Deacons were created: but the people seeing & allowing it. These examples (faith Cyprian) doe they, that the ordering of a Priest ought not to be done, but in the knowledge of the people standing by: that the ordering may be just and lawfull, which hath byn exa-mained by the witnessse of all. We are therefore come thus farre, that this is by the word of God a lawfull calling of a minister, when they that seem meete are created by the consent & allowance of the people, and that other pastors ought to beare rule of the election, that nothing be done amiss of the mult-titude either by lightnesse, or by evil affections, or by disorder.

16 Now remaineth the forme of ordering, to which we assigned the last place in the calling. It is evident that the Apostles vsed no other ceremony when they admitted any man to the ministery, but the laying on of hands.
And I thynke that this vsage came from the manner of the Hebrews, which did as it were present vnto God by laying on of hands that which they would have blessed and ballowed. So when Jacob was about to bleffe Ephraim and Manasse, he layed his hands vpon their heads, Which thing our Lord followed, when he prayed over the infants. In the same meaning (as I thynke) the Leues by the ordinance of the lawe, layde handes vpon the Sacrifices.
Wherefore the Apostles by laying on of handes did signifie that they offiered him to God, whom they admitted into the ministery. Albeit they vfed it also vpon them, to whom they applied the visible graces of the Spirit.
Howsoever it be, this was the solenn vnse signe, so oft as they called any man to the ministery of the Church. So they consecrated Pastors and teachers, and so also Deacons. But although there be no certaine commandement concerning the laying on of haunders, yet because we see that it was continually vned among the Apostles, their so diligent observing of it ought to be to vs in stead of a commandement. And truely it is profitable, that by such a signe, both the dignitie of the ministery shoulde be commended to the people, and also that he which is ordered shoulde bee admonished, that he is not nowe at his owne libertie, but made bondes to God and the Church.

Moreover it shall not be a vaine signe, if it be restored to the natural beginning of it: For if the Spirit of God, hath ordained nothing in the Church in vaine, we must thinke that this Ceremonie, sith it proceeded from him, is not vno profitable, so that it be not turned into a superstitious abuse. Last of all this is to be holden, that not the whole multitude did lay their handes vpon the ministers, but the Pasteurs onely. Howbeit it is vncertaine whether many did alway lay on their handes or no. But it is euident that that was done in the Deacons, in Paul and Barnabas, and a fewe other. But Paul himselfe in an other place reportheath, that he, and not many other, did lay his handes vpon Timothee. Iadmonith thee (faith he) that thou raise vp the grace which is in thee by laying on of my handes. For, as for that which in the other Epistle is spoken of the laying on of the handes of the degree of Pasteurs, I doe not so take it, as though Paul did speake of the company of the Elders, but I understand by that worde the vvere ordinance it selfe: as if he had saide: Make that the Grace, which thou hast receiued by laying on of handes when I did create thee a priest, may not be voyde.

The iiiij. Chapter.

Of the state of the olde Church, and of the manner of governing that was in use before the Papacie.

Hitherto we haue intreated of the order of governing the Church, as it hath beene deliverèd vs out of the pure worde of God, and of the ministrie, as they were instituted by Chrift. Nowe that all these things may be more clearly and familiarly opened, and also be better fastened in our mindes; it shall be profitable in these things to consider the forme of the olde Church, which shall represent to our eyes a certaine image of Gods institution. For although the Bishops of those times did set forth many manie Canons, wherein they seemed to expresse more than was expressed in the holy Scripture: yet they with such heedfulnesse framed all their order after the onelic rule of Gods worde, that a man may easilie see that in this behalfe they had in a manner nothing disagreeing from the worde of God. But although there might be somewhat wanting in their ordinances, yet because they with sincere zelde endeavored to preferue Gods institution, and they swarued not much from it, it shalbe very profitable here shortly to gather what manner of order that had they. As we have declared that there are three sortes of ministrie commended vnto vs in the Scripture: so all the ministers that the olde Church had, it deuised into three Orders. For out of the order of Elders were partly chosen Pasteurs and teachers: the rest of them had the rule of the judgement & correction of manners. To the Deacons was committed the care of the poore, & the distributing of the almes. As for the Readers and Acoluthes, were not names of certaine offices: but those whom they called Clerkes, they trayned from their youth vpwarde in certain exercises to serue the church, that they might the better understand to what purpose they were appointed, & might in time come the better prepared to their office: as I shall by & by shew more at large. Therefore Hierome, when when he had appointed five orders of the Church, reckeneth vp Bishops, Priests, Deacons, Beleeuers, and Catheduminumi to the rest of the Cleary & monkes he giveth no proper place.

2 Therefore to whom the office of teaching was enioyed, all them they named Priests. In euerie cyty they chose out of their own number one man, to whom they specially gaue the title of Bishop: that differencies should not grow of equalitie, as it is wont to come to passe. Yet the Bishop was not so above the rest in honor and dignitie, that he had a dominion over his fellowes. But what office the counfel had in the Senat, to propound of matters, to aske opinions, to go before the other with counselling, monishing, & exhorting, to gouerne the whole action with his authoritie, and to put in execution that which is decreed by common counsell the same office had the Bishop in the assembly of the Priests. And the olde writers themselves confess, that the same was by mens consent brought in for the necessitie of the times. Therefore Hierome vpnon the Epistle to Titus faith, The same was a Priest which was a Bishop. And before that by the institute of the Diuell, there were differencies in religion, & it was said among the people, Iam of Paul, I am of Cephas: Churches were gouerned by common counsell of Elders. Afterward, that the seedes of differencies might be pluckt vp, all the care was committed to one man. As therefore the Priests do know, that by custome of the Church they are subject to him that is set over them: so let the Bishops know, that they are above the Priests, rather by custome, then by the truth of the Lords disposing, and that they ought to gouerne the church in common together. But in an other place he teacheth, howe auncient an institution it was. For he faith that at Alexandria, from Mark the Evangelist euon to Heraclas and Dionysius, the priests did alway choose out one of themselves, & set him in a higher degree, whom they named a Bishop. Therefore every cytye had a company of priests which were pastors & Teachers. For they all did execute among the people that office of teaching, exhorting & correcting, which Paul appointed to the Bishops: and that they might leave seede after them, they traualled in teaching the younger men, that had professed themselves sodiours in the holy warfare. To euerie cytye there was appointed a certaine countrey, that should take their Priests from thence, and be accounted as it were into the body of that Church. Euerie company (as I haue before faied) only for preseruation of policy and peace were vnder one Bishop: which was so above the rest in dignitie, that he was subject to the assembly of his brethren. If the compasse of ground was vnder his Bishopsrike were so great, that he could not suffice to seuerall offices of a Bishop in every place of it, in the countrey it self there were in certaine places appointed priests which in small matters should execute his authoritie. Them they called countrey bishops, because in the countrey they represented the Bishop.

3 But, so much as belongeth to the office, whereof we now speake, as well the bishops as the priests were bound to apply the distributing of the word and Sacraments. For it was ordained onely at Alexandria, (because Arrius wrode and Socrates troubled the Church) that the priest should not preache to the people, as Socrates faith in the 9. booke of the Tripartite history. Which yet Epiah Eua.

Hierome
Hierom confesseth that he misliketh not truly it should be counted monstrous if any man had given out himself for a bishop, that had not also in very deed shewed himselfe a true Bishop. Therefore such was the seueritie of those times, that all ministers were druen to the fulfilling of such office, as the Lord requireth of them. Neither do I rehearse the maner of one age alone. For even in Gregory's time, when the Church was now almost decayed (certainly it was much degenerate from the ancient puresces) it had not then tolerable any Bishop should abstain from preaching. The prieft (faith he in one place) dieth if there be no sound heard of him: because he asketh against himselfe the wrath of the secrete judge, if he go without sound of preaching. And in another place: When Paul testifieth that he is cleane from the blood of all: in this saying we be convinced, we be bounde, we be shewed to be guilty, which are called priefts, which beside the evils that we have of our owne, add also the deaths of others: because we kill so many as wee being lukewarme & silent do daily see to go to death. He calleth himselfe & other silent, because they were les diligent in their worke than they ought to be. When he spareth not they did halfe performe their duty: what think you he would have done, if a man had altogether sit idle? Therefore this was a great while holding in the Church, that the chiefe duty of the bishop was to feede Gods people with the word, or both publiquely & privately to edifie the Church with sound doctrine.

4 But whereas every province had among their bishops one Archbishop: also where in the Nicene Synod there were ordained Patriarches, which should in degree & dignity be above the Archbishops, that pertained to the preserving of discipline. Howbeit in this discourse, that which was most rarely vsed may not be omitted. For this cause therefore chiefly these degrees were ordained, that if any thing happened in any church, it could not well be ended by a few, might be referred to a provincial Synod. If the greatness & difficulty of the matter required a greater discussing, the Patriarches were also called to it with the Synods, from whom there might be no appeal but to a general Councell. The governement so ordered many called a Hierarchie, by a name (as I thinke) vnproper, & truly vnused in the scriptures. For the holy Ghost willed to provide, that no man should dreame of a principality or dominion where the governement of the church is spoken of. But, if leaving the word we loke upon the thing, we shall find that the olde bishops ment to forge another forme of ruling the church, differing from that which the Lorde appointed by his worde.

5 Neither was the order of the Deacones at that time any other then it was under the Apostles. For they received the daily off'rings of the Faithfull, and the yearely revenues of the church, to bestow them upon true vies, that is to say, to distribute them to feede partly the ministers, & partly the poor: but by the appointment of the bishop, to whom also they yearely rendered accounts of their distribution. For whereas the Canons doe every where make the bishop disputer of all the goods of the church, it is not so to be understood, as though he did by himselfe discharge that care: but because it was his parte to appoint to the Deacon, who should be received into the common almes of the Church, and of that which remained, to whom it should be should be giuen, & howe much to every one: because he had an overseing whether the deacon did faithfully execute that which belonged to his office. For thus it is reade in the canons which they scrive to the Apostles: Wee command that the Byshoppe haue the goods of the Church in his owne power, for if he be put in trust with the foules of men, which are more precious, much more it is meete that he haue charge of mony: so that by his power all thinges may be distributed to the pore by the Elders & Deacons: that they may be all ministred with fear and carefulnes. And in the counsell of Antioche it is decreed, that the byshoppe shoulde be restrained that meddle with the goods of the Church, without the knowledge of the Elders and Deacons: But of that point wee neede to make no longer disputacion, & the it is evident by many epistles of Gregorie, that even at that time, when otherwise the ordinances of the Church were much corrupted, yet this observation continued, that the Deacons should vnder the Byshop be the stewards of the poore. As for Subdeacons, it is likely that at the beginning they were joyned to the Deacons, that they should vse their service about the poore; but that difference was by little and little confounded. But Archdeacons began then to be created, when the plentie of the goods, required a newe and more exact manner of disposing them: Although Hierome doth say, that it was even in his age. In their charge was the summe of their receipts, possessions, & store, and the collection of the daily offerings. Whereupon Gregorie declareth to the Archdeacon of Salon, that he should be holden guilty if any of the goods of the Church, perfused either by his fraud or negligence. But whereas it was giuen to them to read the gospel to the people, and to exhort them to prayer: and whereas they were admitted to deliver the cup in the holy supper, that was rather done to garnish their office, that they should execute it with the more reverence, when by such signes they were admonished that it was no prophane bailiwike that they exercised, but a spirituall function and dedicate to God.

6 Hereby also wee may judge what vse there was, and what manner of distribution of the Church goods, Eeci where both in the decrees of the Synodes, and among the olde writers it is to bee founde, that whatsoever the Church posseth either in lands or in mony, is the patrimony of the poore. Therefore oftentimes there this song is sung to the Byshopps and Deacons, that they should remembre, that they meddle not with their own goods, but the goods appointed to the necessitie of the poore: which if they unfaithfully suppress or waft, they shalbe guilty of bloud. Whereby they are admonished, with great fear and reverence, as in the sight of God, without respect of persons, to distribute them to whom they be due. Heereupon also come those gravie protestations in Chryfofome, Ambrose, Augustine, & other like byshops, whereby they affirme their owne uprightnesse to the people. But sith it is equity, and established by the law of the Lord, that they which employ their service to the Church, should bee fed with the common charges of the Church, and also many priests in that age, consecrating their patrimonies to God, were willingly made poore: the distributing was such, that neither the ministers wanted sustenance, nor the poore were neglected. But yet in the mean time it was provided, that the ministers themselves, which ought ought to give example of honest sparing to others, should not have so much, whereby they might abuse it to riotous excess or deliciousness, but only wherewith to sustein their owne neede. For those of the Clergie (faith Hierome) which are able to live of the goods of their parents, if they take that which is the poore's, do commit sacrilege, and by such abuse they eate and drinke to them selves damnation.

7 First the ministration was free and voluntarie, whereas the Bishops and Deacons were of their own will faithful, and uprightness of conscience and innocencie of life were to them in stead of the Lawes. Afterward when euill examples grew of the greedines or peruerse affections of some, to correct those faults, the canons were made, which diuided the revenues of the Church into foure parts: of which they assigned one part to them of Clergy, the second to the poore, the third to the maintenance and repairation of Churches, and other holy buildings, the fourth to the poore as well strangers as of their owne countrey. For whereas the other canons, give this last part to the Bishop, that varieth nothing from my abouesaiide diuision. For they meane not that that part should be his owne, that either he himselfe alone should deuoure it, or powre it out, upon whom or what he list, but that it should suffice to maintaine the Hospitatilite which Paul requireth of that order. And so doe Gelasia and Gregory expound it. For Gelasia bringeth no other reason why the Bishop should chalenge any thing to himself, but that he might giue it prisoners and strangers. And Gregory speakeoth yet more plainly, it is the manner (faith hee) of the Sea Apostolle, to giue commandement to the Bishop when he is ordered, that of all the revenue that ariseth, there be made foure portions: that is to say, the one to the Bishop & his Family for Hospitatilite, and entertainment: the second to the Clergy: the third to the poore: the fourth to the repairing of Churches. Therefore it was lawfull for the Bishop to take nothing to his owne vse, but so much as were enough for moderate and meane food and clothing. If any began to exceed either in riotous expense, or in ostentation & pompe, he was by & by repressed by his fellowes, and if he obeyed not, he was put from his dignitie.

8 As for that which they bestowed upon garnishing of holy things, at the first it was verie little. Afterwarde when the Church became somewhat richer, yet in that behalfe they still kept a meane. And yet all the mony that was bestowed thereupon, remained safe for the poore, if any greater necessity happened. So when famine possesst the province of Hierusalem, and the neede could not otherwise be relued, Cyriillus sold the vessells and garments and spent them upon sustenance of the poore. Likewise Aciatus bishop of Amida, when a great multitude of the Persians, in a manner starved for hunger, called together the Clergie, and when hee had made that notable oration, Our God needeth neither dilies nor cuppes, because he neither eateh nor drinketh, he melt the vessells, to make thereof both meat and ransome for men in misery. Hieromafo, when he inveieth against the too much gorgeouesnes of temples, doth with honour make mention of Exuperius Bishop of Tholofa in his time, which carried the Lords bodie in a wicker basket, and his bloud in glasse, but suffred no pore man to be hunger. That which I even now saide of Aciatus, Ambrose rehearseth of himselfe. For when the Arians charged him, for that he had broken the holy vessels to ransom prisoners, he fancied this most godly excuse: He sent the Apostles without gold, gathered Churches together without gold. The church hath gold not to keep, but to bestow it, and to give relief in necessities. What need is to keep that which helpeth not? Do we not know, how much gold & silver the Assyrians took out of the temple of the Lord: Doth not the priest better to melt the for the sufficiency of the poor, if other reliefs do fail, than an enmy a robber of God to bear them away? Will not the Lord's fay: Why hast thou suffered so many needy to dy for hunger? & verily thou hadst gold whereof thou mightst have ministered them sufficiency. Why were so many led away captive, & not ransomed? Why were so many slain by the enmy? It had ben better that thou shouldst save the vessels of living men, than of metalles. To these things thou shalt not be able to answer. For what wouldst thou say? I feared lest God's temple should want garnishing. He woulde answer: Sacramentes require not gold: neither do these things please with gold, are not bought with gold. The ransoming of prisoners is a garnishing of Sacramentes. In summe, wee see that it is most true which the same man sainth in an other place, that whatsoever the Church then possessed was the store of the needle. Again: that a Bishop hath nothing that is not the poore.

9. These that we have rehearsed were the ministreries of the old Church. For the other of which the Ecclesiasticall Writters make mention, were rather certaine exercises and preparations, than appointed offices. For those holy men, that they might leave a store for the church after them, received into their charge, governance & discipline, young men which with the consent and authoritie of their parents, professed themselves foolsdours of the spirituall warfare; and they so framed the from their tender age, that they should not come vnskilfull & raw to the executing of their office. But all they that were instructed with such beginnings, were called Clerkes. I would in dede that some other proper name had rather been given them. For this name grew in error, or of corrupt affection: for as much as Peter calleth the whole church the Cleargie, that is to say, the Lords inheritance, But the institution it selfe was vere holy & profitable, that they which woulde consecrate themselves & their service to the Church, should be so brought vp under the keeping of the bishop, they shoulde minister to the Church, but he that were wel informed aforesaid, & that had from his very youth both sucked holy doctrine, & by severall discipline put in a certaine continuing qualitie of gravity & holye life, & were estranged from worldly cares, and were accustomed to spirituall cares & studies, But as young foulsdours are by certaine counterfeit skirmishes instructed to learne true and earnest fight, so there were also certaine rudiments, whereby they were exercised while they were Clerkes, before that they were promoted to the verye offices. Therefore first they committed to the Clerkes the charge to open and shut the church, & they named them Ofiarii dorekeepers. Afterward they called them Acoluthi, followers, which waited upon the Bishop in his household services, and did continually accompany him, first for honors sake, and then that no suspicion should arise of the. Moreover that by little & little they might become knowne to the people, and get to them selves commendation: also that they might learne to abide the sight of all men, and to speake before all men: that being made priests, when they came forth to teache, they should not be abashed with shame: therefore place was appointed the reade in the pulpit. After this maner they were promoted by degrees, to thee prove euerie one of their diligence in all their feuerall exercises, till they were made Subdeacons. This only is my meaning, that those were rather grosse beginnings, than such offices as were accounted among the true ministers of the Church.

10 Whereas we said the first & second point in the calling of ministers, are, what maner of men they ought to chooe, & how great a religious care-fulnes they ought to vs in, that matter, wherein the olde Church hath followed the prescribed order of Paul, & the examples of the Apostles. For they were wont to come together to chooe the pastors with most great severitie & careful calling upon the name of God. Beside this they had a forme of examination, whereby they tried the life & doctrine of them that were to bee chosen by the rule of Paul. Only they somwhat offended therein with to great seueritie, because they would require more in a Bishop than Paul required, & spccially in process of time they required unmarried life. But in the other points their obseruation was agreeing with Pauls description. But in this which we made the third point, that is to say, who ought to institute ministers, they kept not alway one order. In olde time, none was receiued into the company of Clerkes, without the consent of all the people: in somuch that Cyprian laboureth earnestly to excuse that he appointed one Aurelius to be a Reader without asking aduise of the Church, because that was done beside the custome, though not without reason. For this he faith before: In ordering of Clerkes, dere brethren, we are wont first to ask you aduise, and by common counsel to weigh the maners and deseruings of every one. But be-case in these lesser exercises there was not muche peril; because they were chozen to a long prove, & not to a great office, therefore the consent of the people therin cessed to be asked. Afterwarde in the other degrees also, except the Bishops, the people commonly left the judgement & choise of them to the Bishop, and the priests, that they shoule examine who were meet & worthie: lauing peraudenture when new priests were appointed for paroches: for then it behooued that the multitude of that place namely should consent. Neither is it any maruel, that the people in this behalfe was little carefull in keeping their owne right: For no man was made a Subdeacon, that had not shewed a long prove of him selfe in his being a Clerke, under that seueritie of discipline, which then was vsed. After that hee had bee tried in that degree, hee was made a Deacon. From thence he came to the honor of presbytrie if he had behaued himselfe faithfully. So no man was promoted, of whom there had not bene in deede a triall had many years before the cies of the people. And there were many canons to punish their faultes: to the Church could not be troubled with euil priests or Deacons, vnes it neglegt the remedies. Howbeit in the priests also there was alway required the consent of them of the same cies: which the verie first canon testifieth in the 67. distinition, which is fathered vpoz Aurelius. Finally, all the admissions into orders were therefore done at certaine appointed times of the yeare, that no man should priuyly crepe in without the consent of the faithful, or should with too much easinesse be promoted without witnesses.

11 In choosing of Bishops the people had the libertie long preferred, y none should bee thrust in that were not accepted of all. This therefore was forbidden in the councell at Antioch, that none should be thrust in to them against their will. Which thing also Leo the first did diligently conforme. Hereupon came these sayings: Let him bee chosen, whose the Clergy, and the people, or the greater number shall require. Againe: Let him that shall beare rule over all, be chosen of all. For it must needs be, that he that is made a ruler being unknownen and not examined, is thrust in by violence. Againe, Let him be chosen, that is both chosen by the Clerkes, and defined by the people; and let him be consecrate by them of that Province, with the judgement of the Metropolitan. The holy Fathers took so great heed, that this libertie of the people should by no meanbe diminished, that when the generall Synode gathered together at Constantinople did order Nectarius, they would not do it without the allowance of the Clergy and people, as they testified by their epistle to the Synode of Rome. Therefore when any Bishop did appoint a successor to himselfe, it was not otherwise stablished vnlesse the whole people did conforme it. Whereof you haue not onely an example, but also the very forme in Angysine in the naming of Erastus, and Theodorit, when hee rehearseth that Peter was named by Athanasius to bee his successor, by and by addeth, that the order of Priestes confirmed it, and the magistrate, and nobilitie, and the people approveth it with their allowing showe.

12 I graunt in deede, that this also was by very good reason stablished in the Councill at Laodicia, that the Election should not bee left to multitudes. For it fearefully happeneth at any time, that so many heads should wel order any thing with one meaning: and commonly this is true, that the vn-certaine communaltie is diuided into contrarie affections. But for this perill there was vse a very good remedie. For first the Clerkes onely did choose whom they had chosen they presented to the Magistrate, or to the Senate and cheefe men of the people. They, after consultation hadde, if they thought the election good, confirmed it: if not, they did choose another, whom they did rather allowe. Then the matter was moued to the multitude, which although they were not bounde to those forejudgements, yet thereby they could the lesse be disordered. Or if they began at the multitude: that was done only to learn whom they did cheeefly desire. When the desires of the people were heard, then they of the Clergy did chose him. So neither was it lawful for the Clergy to appoint whom they listed, neither were they bound to obey the foolish desires of the people. Leo appointeth this order in another place, when he faith: There are to be looked for, both the desires of the citizens, the peoples testimonies, the judgement of the honourable, and the election of the clerkes. Againe, Let there be holden the testimonie of the honourable, the subcription of the clerkes, the consent of the order & communalty. No reason (sayeth he) suffireth it to be otherwise done. And nothing else meaneth that deeree of the Synode at Laodicia, but that the Clergy and and cheefe of the people, should not suffer themselves to be carried away by the undifferente multitude: but rather that with their wisedome and gravitie they should represse the peoples foolish affections, if at any time need should so require.

13 This order of choosing was yet in force in the time of Gregory: and it is likely that it endured long after. There remaine many Epistles of his, that giue evident testimonie of this matter. For so oft as he hath to doe with the creating of any new bishop, he vseth to write to the clergy, to the order, and to the people, & sometime also to the ruler, according as the government of the city is appointed. But if by reason of the disordered state of y church, he committeth to any Bishop adjoyning the charge of overseeing in the election, yet he alway requireth a solemn decree strengthened with the subscriptions of all. Yea and when there was one Constantius create Bishop at Milaine, and that many of the Milaneis were by reason of the invasion of the barbarous nations fled to Genoa: he thought that the election could not otherwise be lawfull, vnlesse they also were called together & gave their assent. Yea there are not yet five hundred yeares past, since Pope Nicholas decreed thus of the election of the bishop of Rome: that the cardinal bishops should beginne, then that they should joyn to them the rest of the clergie, last of all that the election should be confirmed by the consent of the people. And in the ende he reciteth that decree of Leo, which I ceme nowe alledged, and commandeth it from thence forth to bee in force. But if the malice of wicked men shall so prevaile, that the clerks to make a true election be compelled to depart out of the citie: yet he commandeth that some of the people be present with them. As for the Emperors consent, so farre as I can perceive, was required onely in two churches, that is, Rome and Constantinople: because there were the two seates of the Empire. For whereas Ambrose was sent to Milaine with a power from Valensian to govern the election of the new Bishop: that was extraordinarily done, by reason of greeuous factions wherewith the citizens then boyled among themselves. But at Rome in olde time the Emperours authority was of so great force in creating of the Bishop: that Gregory sayeth, that hee was set by his commandement in the government of the Church: when yet by solemne vjage hee was desired by the people. This was the manner, that when the clergie and the people had appointed any bishop, the clergie should forthwith move it to the emperor, he should either by his alowance confirm the election, or by disallowance vndo it. Neither are the decrees that Grasian gathereth together, repugnant to this custome: wherein is nothing else said, but that it is in no wise to be suffered, that taking away the canonical election, a king should appoint a Bishop after his owne lust: and that the Metropolitan should consecrate none that were so promoted by violent powers. For it is one thing to spoil the Church of her right, that all should be transferred to the lust of one man; & another thing to graunte this honour to a king or an Emperour, that by his authority he may confirm a lawfull election.

14 Now it followeth, that we entreat with what forme the ministers of y Church were admitted into their office after election: this the Latines called Ordination or Consecration: the Greekes have called it Cheirotonia, lifting vp of handes, and some rime also Cheirothefa, laying on of handes. Howbeit Cheirostonia is properly called that kinde of election, where mens consentes are declared by holding vp of their handes. There remaineth a decree of the Nicene councell, that the Metropolitane should meeke together with all the Bishops of the province to order him which is chosen. But if some of them be hindered either by length of the way, or by sickenes, or by any necessitie, that yet three at the least should meeke, & that they that are absent shoulde by letters testifie their consent. And this Canon, when with disconintuance it grewe out of vs, was afterward renuened with many Synodes. But all, or at least so many as had no excuse, were therefore commande to be present, that they might have the greater triall of the learning & manners of him that was to be ordered: for the matter was not done without trial. And it appeareth by Cyprian words, that in the old time they were wont not to be called after the election, but to be present at the election: & to this end that they should be as it were governours, that nothing should be troublesome done in the multitude. For where he saide, that the people haue power either to choose worthie Priests, or to refuse unworthie, within a little after he addeth: Wherefore according to the tradition of God & of the Apostles, it is to be diligently kept & holden (which is yet holden with vs also & in a manner throughout all provinces) that for the right celebration of orderings, all the Bishops adiouning of the same province should come together to ye people for which a governor is ordered, & that the bishop be chosen in presence of the people. But when they were sometime slowly gathered together, and there was peril least some should abuse that delay to occasion of ambitious suing: it was thought, it should be enough if after the election made, they should meeke & after allowance & punishment examination consecrate him.

15. When this was eoch where done without exception, by little and little a divers manner grewe in vs, that they which were chosen should refer to the Metropolitane citee to fetch their ordering, which came to passe rather by ambition, & by depraution of the first institution, than by any good reason. And not long after, when the authoritie of the sea of Rome was now increased, there came in place yet a worse custome, that the Bishops almost of all Latie should fetch their consecration from thence. Which we may note out of the Epistles of Gregorie. Only a few cites, which did not so easily give place, had their ancient right prefered: as there is an example had of Millaine. Peradventure the only Metropolitane cites kept their prouilidge. For all the Bishops of a Province were wont to come together to a chief citee to consecrate the Archbishop. But the Ceremonie was laying on of handes. For I read of no other Ceremonies vsed: sauing that in the solemne assembly the Bishops had a certaine apparel whereby they might bee distinckly known from other Priests. They ordered also Priests & Deacons with onely laying on of hands. But euery Bishop with the company of priests ordered his own Priests. But although they did all the same thing: yet because the Bishop went before, and it was all done as it were by his guiding, therefore the ordering was called his. Whereupon the old writers haue of this sayeing: that a Priest differeth from a Bishop in no other thing but because he hath not the power of ordering.
Cap. 5. 2d. Of the outward means

The v. Chapter.

That the olde forme of government is utterly overthrown by the tyrannie of the Popes.

Now it is good to set before mens eyes the order of governing the church that the see of Rome and all the champions thereof doe keepe at this day, and the whole image of that Hierarchie which they continually have in their mouth, and to compare it with that order of the first & old Church which we have described: that by the comparisone it may appeare what manner of Church they haue, which vs this onely title to charge or rather to overwhelme us. But it is best to begin at Calling, that we see both who, and what manner of men, and by what order they be called to this ministrie. And then afterwaide we shall consider how faithfully they execute their office. We will give the first place to Bishops: to whom I woulde to God this might be an honor, to have the first place in this discoure. But the matter it selfe doeth not suffer mee, once to touch this thing bee it never so lightly, without their great shame. And yet I will remember, in what kind of writing I am now occupie: and will not suffer my tale, which ought to be framed onely to simple doctrine, to lowe abroad beyound due bondes. But let some one of them that haue not vtherly lost all shame, answer me, what manner of bishops are at this day commonly chosen. Truely it is now grown too much out of vse, to haue any examination had of their learning: but if there bee had any respect of learning, they choose some lawyer that can rather brawle in a court, than preach in a Church. This is certaine, that these hundred yeres there hath scarcely bee twelve hundred men chosen that under-stand any thing of holy doctrine. I doe not therefore spare the former ages, for that they were much better, but because we haue now onely the present Church in question. If judgement be had of their manners, wee shall finde that there haue beene fewe or almost none, whom the olde Canons would not have judged vnworthie. He that was not a dronkard, was a whoremonger: hee that was also cleane from this wickednesse, was either a dyer, or a hunter, or disolute in some part of his life. For there be lighter faults, which by the olde Canons doe exclude a man from being a Bishop. But this is a most great absurditie, that verie children scarcely ten yeres olde, are by the Popes graunt made Bishops. They are grawned to such shamelesnes and senseles dulnes, that they dreaded not that extreme yeas and monftrous wicked doing, which is vtherly abhorring from the verie sense of nature. Hereby appeareth how religious their elections were, where the negligence was so carelesse.

ceth that it is a violent imposition. Cyprian, when he testified that it proceeded from the law of God that it should not be done but by the consent of the people, sheweth that the contrary manner is repugnant to the word of God. The decrees of so many Synodes doe most severely forbid it to bee otherwise done: and if it be done, they command it to be void. If these things be true, there now remaineth in the Papacy no Canonical election, neither by Gods law nor by the Ecclesiastical law. But although there were no other evil, yet how shall they be able to excuse this that they have so spoied the Church of her right? But (say they) the corruption of times so required, that because in appointing of bishops, hatreds and affections more prevailed with the people and the Magistrates, than right and sound judgement, therefore the rule thereof should be given to a few. Admit verily that this were the extreme remedie of a mischief in dispaired case. But if the medicine it self hath appeared more hurtfull than the very disease, why is not this new evil also remedied? But (say they) it is exactly prescribed to the Canons, what they ought to follow in the election. But do we doubt, but that the people in old time did understand that they were bound to most holy laws, where they saw that they had a rule set them by the word of God, when they came together to choose a bishop? For that onelie voice of God, whereby he describeth the true image of a bishop, ought worthlie to be of more value than infinite thousands of Canons. But neuertheless the people, corrupted with a most evil affection, had no regard of the lawe or of equitie. So at this day though there be verie good lawes written, yet they remaine buried in papers. Yet for the most part it is vsed in mens maners, yee and allowed as though it were done by good reason, that drunkenides, whoremongers, diers, are commonly promoted to this honor: (It is but little that I say) that bishoprikes are the rewards of adulteries and bawdries. For why they are giuen but to hunters and falconers, it is to be thought to be gaily well bestowed. Anyway to excuse so infamous indignity, it is too much wicked. The people (say I) had in old time a very good Canon to whom Gods word was prescribed, that a bishop ought to be unreprouable, a teacher, no fighter, &c. Why therefore is the charge of choosing removed from the people to these men? Because forsothe the word of God was not heard among the tumults & seditious part takings of the people. And why should it not at this day be removed againe from these men, which not only do break all lawes, but casting away shame, do wantonly, courteously, ambitiously, mingle and confound Gods and mens matters together?

3 But they lie, when they faie, that this was devised for a remedie. We often read that in old time Churches were in tumultus at the choosing of bishops: yet neuer anie ma durt think of taking away the authenticie from the people. For they had other waies whereby they might either prevent these faultes, or amend them, if they were already committed. But I will tell what it is. When the people began to be negligent in making the elections, and did cast that care upon the Priests as little belonging to them, they abused this occasion to vluppe a tyrannie to themselves, which afterward they stablished by new Canons set forth. As for their ordering, it is nothing else but a mere mockage. For the shew of examination that they there set out is so vaine and hunc
Cap. 5. Of the outerdae meanes gry, that it wanteth euential colour. Therefore whereas in some places Princes have by covenanct obtained of the byshops, of Rome, that they themselves might name byshps therein the church suffered no new lose: because the election was taken away, solely from the Canons, which had by no right violently taken it, or verily stolen it. Truly this is a most soule example, that out of the court are sent byshops to possess Churches; and it should be the worke of godly Princes to abstaine from such corruption. For it is a wicked spoiling of the church, when there is thrust vnto any people a byshop, whom they have not desired, or at least with free voice allowed. But that vnorderly manner which hath long ago in the Churches, giue occasion to Princes to take the presentation of byshops into their owne hands, for they had rather it should be their gift, than those mens, to whom it nothing more belonged, and which did no lesse wrongfully abuse it.

4. Loce here is a noble calling, by reason whereof the byshops boast themselves to be the successors of the Apostles. But they say that the authoritie to create priests belongeth to them only. But in this they most lewdly corrupt the old institution: because they doe not by their ordering create Priests to rule & feede the people, but Sacrificers to Sacrifice. Likewise when they consecrate Deacons, they do nothing of their true & proper office, but they ordaine them only to certain ceremonies about the ehalice & the paten. But in the Synode at Chalcedon it is cotariwise decreed, that the orderings should not be absolutely giuen; that is to say, but that a place should be therewith assigned to them that are ordered, where they shall exercise their office. This decree is for two causes very profitable. First, that the Church should not be burdened with superfluous charges, nor that that shoule be spent vpon idle men which should be giuen to the poore. Secondly, that they which are ordered, should thynke that they be not promoted to an honour, but that there is an office committed vnto them, to the execution whereof they are bounde by solemn pronuntiation. But the Romish ministers (which thynke that there is nothing in religion to bee cared for, but their bellie) first doe expounde title to be the revenue that may suffice to sustaine them, whether it be by their owne lively hoode or by benefice. Therefore when they order a Deacon or a Priest, without taking care where they ought to ministe, they giue them the order, if they bee riche enough to find themselves. But what man can admit this, that the title which the decree of the Counsell requireth, should be the yearely revenue for their sustenace? But nowe because the later Canons condemned the bishops with penalty to finde them whom they had ordered without sufficient title, by this mean to restraine their too much ease admitting: there hath bene also a subtelie devised to mcke out this penaltie. For he that is ordered, naming any title whatsoever it be, promiseth that he will bee content therewith: by this shift he is driven from his action for his finding. I passe over a thousand stances that are herein vied: that when some doe falsely name vaine titles of benefices, whereupon they cannot make fute shillings by yeare: other some vnnder secret covente do borrow benefices, which they promise that they wil by & by restore againe; but sometime they restore not at all. And such other mysteries.

5 But although these groser abuses were taken away, is not this alway an absurditie, to appoint a Priest to whome you assigne no place? Also they order no man but to sacrifice. But the true ordinance of a Priest is, to be cal-ted to the government of the Church: and a Deacon to be called to the gathering of the almes: they doe in deed with many pompes shadowe their doing, that in the verie thow it may have a reverence among the simple.But among men that have their sound wit, what can these disguising saу, if there be no sound stufle or truevth vnderneath them? For they vie ceremonies about it, either fetched out of lewifhnesse or fained of the liues; which it were better to forbear. But of true examination, (for I nothing passe vp-on that shadowe which they retaine) of the peoples consent, and of other things necessarie, they make no mention. I call a shadowe their foolish ge-fturings neede to be laughe at, framed to a fonde and cold counterfaite of antiquitie. The bishops have their deputies which before the ordering may enquire of their learning, But what whether they can read their masse, whether they can decline a commone nowe, that they shall light vp in reading coniugate a verb, or do know the signification of one word, for it is not necessarie that they be cunning enouge to construe a verfe. And yet they be not put back fro Priesthood which faile even in the childish rudiments, so y they bring any mony or commendation of favor. Of like fpoft it is, that when they are brought to the altar to be ordered, it is asked thrife in a tongue not understanded, whether they be worthie of that honour. One aunswereth which never saw them: (but because nothing should want of the forme, hee hath that part in the play) They are worthie. What may a man blame in these reverend fathers, but that which mocking in so open Sacrifeges, they do without shame laugh to scornne both God & men? But because they are in long possession thereof, they thinke that now it is lawful for them. For who-fuer dare once open his mouth against these so euydent & so hainous wilked doings, he is forthwith hauled by them to punishment of death, as though it were one that had in old time disclosd abroad the holye mysteries of Cetes. Would they do this if they thought that there were any God?

6 Now howe much do they behaue themselues better in bestowing of benefices: which thing was once joyned with the ordering, but nowe it is altogether separate? There is among them a diuerfe manner. For the Bishops onely do not conferre benefices: and in those whereof they are faide to have the conferring, they have not the full right, but other haue the presentation, and they retaine only the title of collation for honors fakke. There are also nominations out of schools, and resignations, either simple, or made for cause of exchange, commendatory writings, preuentions, and whatsoever is of that fort. But they also behaue themselues that none of them can prohoche an other with any thing. So I affirm, that scarcely every hundred benefices, is bestowed at this day in the papace without Simonie, as the old writers defined Simonie. I do not say that they all buy them with readie monie, but shewe me one of twentie that commeth to a benefice with out some by commendation, some other kinred or alliance promoteth, and some the authoritie of their parentes: some by doing of pleasures doe get themselues fauor. Finally benefices are given to this ende, not to provide for the Churches, but for them that receive them. Therefore they call them benefices, by which words they do sufficiently declare, that they make no other account of them, but as the beneficial gifts of Princes, whereby they either get the favour of their soldiers or reward their services. I omit how these rewards are bestowed upon barbars, cooks, moile keepers, and such druggif-men. And now judicall courts doining of no matters more, than about benefices, so that a man may say that they are nothing else but a pray caft afore dogges to hunt after. Is this tolerable even to be heard of, that they should be called Pastors, which have broken into the possession of a Church as into a ferme of their enemie? that have gotten it by brawling in the lawe: that have bought it for money? that have deferved it by vlllic services: which being children yet scantily able to speake, have received it, as by inheritance from their vncles and kinsmen, and some bastards from their fathers?

Of the outwärde meanes

7 Would ever the licentiousnesse of the people, though they had beene nouer so corrupt & lawlesse, have gone so farre? But this is also more monstrovs, that one man, (I will not say what manner of man, but truly such a one as cannot govern himselfe) is set to governe five or six Churches. A man may see in these dayes in Princes courts, young men that have three abbaties, two Bishoprickes, one Archbishoppucke, But there bee commonly Canons with five, sixe or seuen benefices, whereof they have no care at all, but in receiving the revenues, will not object, that it is eche where cried out against by the worde of God, which hath long agoe ceased to be of any effimation at all among them. Will not object, that there have bene many most sever pénal ordinances in many Counsels, made against this wickednesse: for those also they boldly despise as oft as they lift. But I say that both are monstrous wicked doings, which are vterly against God and nature & the government of the Church, that one robber shall oppresse many Churches at once, and that he should be called a Pastor, which cannot be present with his flocke though he would; and yet (such is their shamefulness) they cover such abominable filthinesse with the name of the Church to deliuere them false from all blame. But also (and God will) in these lewdnesse is contained that holy succession, by the merite whereof they boast that it is wrought that the Church may not perifie.

8 Nowe which is the second mate in judging a lawful Pastor) let us see how faithfully they exercise their office. Of the Priestes that bee there create, some be Monkes, some be (as they call them) Secular. The first of these two companies was vunknown to the old Church; and it is so against the profession of Monkes, to have such a place in the Church, that in old time when they were chosen out of Monasteries into the clergie, they ceased to be Monkes. And Gregorie, whose time had much dregges, yet sufified not this confusion to be made. For hee willeth that they bee put out of the clergie that be made Abbots, for that no man can rightly be together both a Monke and a clerge; though the one is a hinderance to the other. Nowe if I ask, howe hee well fulfilles his office, whom the Canons declare to bee vnmeet, what I pray you, will they answer? They will forsooth allledge vnto mee those untimely borne decrees of Innocens and Boniface, whereby by Monkes are so received into the honour and power of Priesthood, that they might still abide in their Monasteries. But what reason is this, that curetie vnlearned asse, so soone as he hath once possessed the sea of Rome, may with one word overthrow all antiquitie? But of this matter we shall speake hereafter. Let this suffice for this time, that in the purer Church it was holde for a great absurdity, if a Monke did execute the office of Priesthood. For Hierome faith that he doth not execute the office of a Priest, while he is conversant among Monkes: and makes himselfe one of the common people to be ruled by the Priests. But, although we grant them this, what do they of their dutie? Of the mendicants some doe preach, all the other Monkes either sing or mumble vp masses in their dennes. As though either Christ willed, or the nature of the office sufferrth Priests to be made to this purpose. Whereas the Scripture plainly testifieth, that it is the priests office to rule his owne Church, is it not a wicked prophanation, to turne an other way, yea verterly to change the holy institution of God? For when they are ordered, they are expressly forbidden to doe the things that God commandeth al priests. For this song is sung to them: let a Monke content with his cloister, not presume to ministe the Sacramentes, nor to execute anie thing belonging to publike office. Let them deny, if they can, that it is an open mockerie of God, that any priest should be made to this purpose, to absteine from his true and naturall office: and that he which hath the name may not hace the thing.

9 I come to the secular priests: which are partly beneficed men, (as they call them,) that is to say, hauie benefices whereupon to live: and partly doe let out their daily labour to hire, in massing, or singing, and live as it were of a stipend gathered thereupon: Benefices have either care of foules, as bishops, priories and cure of paroches: or they be the stipends of decent men, that get their living with singing, as prebendes, Canons, personages, and dignities, chaplainships and such other. Howbeit, since things are now turned vpSide downe, Abbaties and priories are given to seuerie boies, by pruience, that is to say by common and vsual custome. As concerning the hirelings, that get their living from day to day, what should they doe otherwise than they doe: that is in servile and shamefull maner to give out them selves for gaine, specially if there is so great a multitude as nowe the world swarms with. Therefore when they dare not beg openly, or forasmuch as they thinke they shoulde but little proftie that way, they goe about like hungrie dogges, and with their importunacie, as with barking, they enforce out of men against their wills somewhat to thrust into their belly. Here if I would go about to express in words, how great a dishonour it is to the Church, that the honor and office of priesthood is come to this point, I shoulde have no ende. Therefore it is not meete that the readers should looke for at my hand such a long declaration as may be proportional to so hainous indignitie. Briefely I say, if it be the office of priesthood, (as the word of God prescribeth, and the ancient canons require) to feede the Church, and to govern the spirituall kingdome of Christ: all such facturers as haue none other worke or wages, but in making a market of masses, are not onely idle in their office, but also haue no office at all to exercise. For there is no place
cap. 5.  Of the outwade meanes place assigned them to teach; they have no flocke to governe: Finally there is nothing left to them, but the altar, whereupon to sacrifice Christ: which is not to offer to God, but to duels, as we shall see in another place.

I do not here touch the outward faultes, but only the inward evil, which sticketh fast by the roote in their institution. I will adde a saying, which will found it in their ears: but because it is true, I must speake it: that is, the same degree are to be accounted Canons, Deanes, Chaplaines, Pro- uooffes; and all they that are fedde with idle benefices. For what service can they do to the Church? For they have put from themselves the preaching of the words, the care of discipline, and ministration of Sacraments, as too much troublesome burdens. What then have they remaining, whereby they may boast themselves to be true priestes? Singing forsooth, and a pompe of Ceremonies. But what is that to the purpose? If they allege custome, if ye, if prescription of long time: I againe on the other side do faie vnto them the definition of Christ, whereby he hath expressed vnto vs both true priestes, and what they ought to haue that will be accounted such. But if they cannot beare so harde a lawe, to submit themselves to Christes rule: at the least let them suffer this matter to be determined by the authoritie of the Primitive church. But their case shall be neuer the better, if their estate be judged by the olde Canons. They that have degenerate into Canons, should have been priestes, as they were in olde time, that should rule the Church in common with the Bishop, and as as it were his companions in the office of Pastor.

Those Chapter dignities as they call them, doe nothing at all belong to the governing of the Church: much lesse, chaplainships, and the other dregges of like names. What account then shall we make of them? Truely both the worde of Christ, and the visage of the Church exclueth them from the honour of priesthood. Yet they stiffely holde that they be priestes: but wee must plucke off their visour: to shal we finde that their whole profession is most strange and farre removed from that office of priestes, both which the Apostles desribe vnto vs, and which was required in the primitive church. Therefore all such orders, with what titles soever they be notified, fith they be newe, being verily neither vpholden by the institution of God, nor by the auncient visage of the Church, ought to have no place in the description of the spiritual government, which the Church hath receiued consecrate with the Lordes owne mouth. Or (if they wil rather haue me to speake more simply and grossely) for as much as chaplaines, Canons, Deanes, Preuooftes, & other idle bellies of the same sort, doe not so much as with their little finger touch any small parcel of that office, which is necessarily required in priestes, it is not to be suffered, that in wrongfully taking a false honour vpon themselves, they should breake the holy institution of Christ.

There remaine Bishops, and persons of Paroches: who I would to God they did strive to retaine their office. For wee woulde willingly graunt vnto them, that they have a godlie and excellent office, if they did execute it. But when they will be accounted Pastors, while they forsake the Churches committed to them, and cast the care of them vpon other, they doe as if it were the Pastors office to doe nothing. If anyver that never stirred his foote out of the citie, woulde professse himselfe a plowman, or a keeper of a vinevynarde: if a souldiour that had beene continually in the bataile and in the campe, and had neuer seene judiciall court or booke, would boast himselfe for a lawyer, who could abide such stinking follies? But these men doe somewhat more absurdly, that will seeme and be called lawful Pasteurs of the Church, and yet will not be so. For how many a one is there, that doeth so much, as in the wee, exercise the gouernement of his Church? Manie doe all their life log deuoure the revenues of churches, to which they never come so much as to looke vpon them. Some other doe once by yeare either come themselves, or sende their steward, that nothing should bee lost in the letting to farme. When this corruption first crept in, they that would enjoye this kinde of vacation, exempted themselves by privileges: nowe it is a rare example, to have one resident in his owne Church. For they esteeme them none otherwise than farmes over which they set their vicars as baillifes or farmers. But this very natural reason receieth, that he should be pastore of a flocke, that never sawe one theke pe thereof.

12 It appeareth that euem in the time of Gregorie, there were certaine fees, to this mitchiefe, that the rulers of Churches began to be negligent in teaching: for he doeth in one place greciouesly complaine of it. The world (saieth he) is full of priestes, but yet in the harvest there are seldome wor- men founde: because in deede we take vpon vs the office of priest, but wee fulfill not the worke of the office. Againe, because they have not the bowels of charitie, they will seeme Lordes: they acknowledge not themselves to bee fathers. They change the place of humilietie into the aduancinge of lordlinesse. Againe, but what doe we, O pastores, which receive the rewarde, and are no workemen? We are fallen to outraire businesse, and wee take in hande one thing, and pforme another. We leave the ministerie of preaching, and to our punishment, as I see, we are called Bishoppes, that keepe the name of honour and not of vertue. Sith he sith fo great sharpenesse of wordes against them, which were but leafe continuing and leafe diligent in their office. What I pray you, would he say, if the faue of the Bishoppes almost none, or truely verie fewe, and of the rest scarely euery hundreth man once in all his life to go vp into a pulpit: For men be come to such madnesse, that it is commonly cuented a thing too base for the dignitie of a Bishoppes, to make a seruice to the people. In the time of Bernard, thinges were soe what more deciade: but we see also with how sharpe chidinge he inuenzeth against the whole order, which yet it is like to haue bene then much purer than it is nowe.

13 But if a man do well weigh & examine this outraire forme of eccle- siastical government that is at this day vnder the papacy, he shall finde that there is no theeuis slie corner wherein robbers do more licentiously range with our lawe and measur. Truely all thinges are there so unlike the institution of Christ, yea so contrarie to it, they are so degenerate from the anciet or- dinances and maners of the Church, they are so repugnant to nature and reason, that there can be no greater injurie done to Christ, than when they pretende his name to the defence of so disorderd government. Wee (saye they) are the pillars of the church, the chief Bishoppes of religion, the vic- ears of Christ, the heades of the faithfull: because the power of the apostles is by.

Hom. 17, Negligence of Bishoppes and pastores in the office of preaching the wordes.

Nothing more ab- sard, gross, and unlike to antiquitie, than the go- vernment of the Church of Rome at this day: speeck of her prifes and Bishoppes.

is by succession come vnto vs. They are alway bragging of these follies, as though they talked vnto stockes. But so oft as they shall boast of this, I will aske of them againe, what they have common with the Apostles. For wee speake not of any inherently descending honour that may be giuen to men euen while they lie sleepeing: but of the office of preaching, which they so much flee from. Likewise when we assume that their kingdome is the tyrannie of Antichrist, by & by they aunswere, that it is that reuerende Hierarchie, so oft praised of notable and holy men. As though the holy fathers, when they commended the Ecclesiastical Hierarchie or spiritual governement, as it was deliuered them from hande to hande from the Apostles, did dreame of this mishapen and waight disordered heape, where the Bishops are for the most part, either rude akses, which know not the verie first & common principles of faith, or sometime children yet now come fro the nourse: & if any be learned (which yet is a rare example) they thinke a bishoprike to be nothing els but a rule of gloriousnesse and magnificence: where the persons of Churches thinke to more of feeding the flocke, than a shoe-maker dooth of plowing: where all things are confoundes with more than babylonical dispersing: that there remaineth no more any one steppe whole of that ordinance of the Fathers.

14 What if we descende to their maners? Where shalbe that light of the world, which Christ requireth? Where is the salt of the earth? Where is that holinesse, which may be as a perpetuall rule to judge by? There is no degree of men at this day more ill spoken of for riot, wantonnesse, deceitnesse, finally all kinde of lustes. There are of no degree men either fitter, or cunninger maisters of all deceit, fraud, treason, and breach of faith: there is no where so great cunning or boldnesse to doe hurt. I passe over their disdainfulness, pride, extortion, crueltie. I passe over the dissolute licentiousnesse in all the partes of their life. In sufferinge where of the world is so wearied, y it is not to be feared, y I should seeme to enforce any thing too much. This one thing I say, which they themselves shall notbe able to deny: that of bishops there is almost none, of the Parsons of paroches not the hundredth man: but if judgement should be giuen of his maners according to the old Canons, hee should be either to be excommunicate or at least to be put from his office. I seeme to say somewhat incredible: so farre is that ancients discipline groven out of vse, that commanded an exacter trial to be had of the maners of the clergy: but the truth is so. Now let them goe, that fight under the standard & guiding of the sea of Rome, and let them boast among themselves of the order of priesthood. As for the order y they haue, truely it is euident, y it is neither of Christ, nor of his Apostles, nor of the fathers, nor of the olde Church.

15 Now let the Deacons come forth, & y most holy distributing that they have of the goods of the Church. Howbeit they doe not nowe create their Deacons to that purpose, for they enjoy no the nothing els but to ministring at the altar, to read & sing the Gospel, & do I wote not what trifles. Nothing of the almes, nothing of the care of the poore, nothing of all that function which they in olde time executed. I speake of the verie institution, For if we haue respect what they doe, in deede it is not to them an office, but onely only a steppe toward priesthood. In one thing, they that keepe the Deacons place at the maffe, do represent a void e image of antiquitie. For they receive the offerings before the consecration. This was the auncient maner, that before the communion of the Supper, the faithfull did kisse one another, and offer their almes at the altar:fo first by a signe, and afterwaide by very liberalitie they thowed their charitie. The Deacon, that was the poore mans stewart, receiued that which was giuen, to distriute it. Now of those almes, there commeth no more to the poore, than if they were thrown into the sea. Therefore they mocke the Church with this lying Deaconrie. Truely therein they haue nothing like, neither to the institution of the Apostles, nor to the auncient vsage. But the very distribution of the goods they haue conveyed another way: & haue so framed it, y nothing can be divided more vnorderly. For as thecues, when they haue cut mens throtes, doe draine the pray among them: so these, after the quenching of the light of Gods worde, as though the Church were flaine, do thinke that whatsoever was dedicate to holy vses is layde for pray and spoile. Therefore making a disuision, every one hath matched to himselfe as much as he could.

16 Here all these old orders, that wee haue declared, are not only troubled, but viterly wiped out and raied. The Bishops and pricetes of Cities, which being made rich by this pray, were turned into Canons, haue made hauccke of the cheefe part among them. But it appeareth that the partition was vnorderly, because to this day they stricke about the bounds. Whatsoever it be by this disuision it is provided, that not one halffpenny of the goods of the Church shold come to the poore, whose had bene the halfe part at leaft. For the Canons do giue them the fourth part by name: and the other fourth part they doe therefore appoint to the byshop, that they shold betowe it vpon hospitallitie, and other duties of Charity. I speake not what the clearkes ought to doe with their portion, and to what vs they ought to betowe it. For we haue sufficiently declared, that the rest which is appointed for temples, buildings and other expenses, ought to be open for the poore in necessitie. I pray you, if they had one spark of the fear of God in their hart would they abide this burden of conscience, that all that they eate, & wherewith they be clothed, commeth of theft, yeas of sacrilege? But fith they are little moued with the judgement of God, they shold at leaft thinke, that those be men ended with wit and reason, to whome they woulde perswade, that they haue so goodly & well framed orders in their Church, as they are wont to boaste. Let them auns were mee shortly, whether deaconrie be a licence to steale and robbe. If they deny this, they shall also bee compelled to confess, that they haue no deaconrie left: for as much as among them, all the disposition of the goods of the Church is openly turned into a spoiling full of sacrilege.

17 But here they vse a verie faire colour. For they say, that the dignity of the Church is by that magnificence not vncomly vpholden. And they haue of their left some so shamelesse, that they dare openly boaste, that so one ly are fulfilled those prophecies, whereby the olde Prophets describe the gloriousnesse of the kingdom of Christ, when that kingly gorgeousnes is scene in y priestly order. Not in vain say they God hath promised these things to his his Church. Kings shall come, they shall worship in thy sight, they shall bring thee gifts. Arise, arise, cloth thee with thy strength, O Zion: cloth thee with the garments of thy glory. O Jerusalem: All shall come from Saba bringing golde and incense, and speaking praise to the Lorde. All the cattell of Cedar shall be gathered together to thee. If I should tarry long upon confounding this lewdness, I feare least I should seeme fond. Therefore I will not lose wordes in vaine. But I ask; if any lewe who abused the testimony, what solution would they giue? Verily they would reprehende his dulnesse, for that he transferred those things to the fleshe and the worlde, that are spiritually spoken of the spiritual kingdom of Christ. For we knowe, that the Prophets, under the image of eathy things, did paint out vnto vs the heavenly glory of God, that ought to shine in the Church. For the Church had never lesse abundance of these blessings, which their words express, than in the time of the Apostles: and yet all confess, that the force of the kindome of Christ then cheefly flourished abroad. What then meane these sayinges? Whatsoeuer is any where precious, high, excellent, it ought to bee made subject to the Lorde. Whereas it is nameely spoken of kings, that they shall submit their scepters to Christ, that they shall throw down their crownes before his feete, that they shall dedicate their goods to the Church: when (will they say) was it better and more fully performed, than when Theodosius casting away his purple robe, leaving the ornaments of the empire, as some one of the common people submitted himselfe before God and the Church, to solemne penance? the when he & other like godly princes bestowed their endowments and their cares to procure pure doctrine in the church, and to cherish & defend sound teachers? But how priests at that time exceeded not in superfluous riches, that onely sentence of the Synode at Aquileia, where Ambrose was cheefe, sufficiently declareth: Glorious is poverty in the Priestes of the Lorde. Truely the Bishops had at that time some riches, wherewith they might have set out the churches honor, if they had thought those to be the true ornaments of the Church, But when they knew there was nothing more against the office of Paftors, than to glitter & shew themselves proudly with deintinesse of fare, with gorgeousnes of garments, with great traine of servants, with stately palaces, they followed and kept the humblenesse and modestie, yea the very pouertrie which Christe holdeth appointed among his ministers.

18 But that we may not bee too long in this point, let vs againe gather into a short summary, how farre that dispensation or disspilation of the goods of the Church, that is nowe vised, differeth from the true deaconrie, which both the worde of God commendeth vnto vs, and the ancient church observed. As for that which is bestowed upon the garnishing of temples, I say it is ill bestowed, if that measure be not vised, which both the very nature of holy things appointeth, that the Apostles and other holy fathers have prescribed both by doctrine and examples. But what like thing is there seene at this day in the temples? whatsoeuer is framed, I will not say after that ancient sparing, but to any honest meanes it is rejected. Nothing at all pleaseth, but that which fauoureth of riot and the corruption of times. In the meanwile they are so farre from having due care of the lively temples, that that they would rather suffer many thousands of the poore to perish for hunger, than they would break the least chalice or crut, to relieve their need. And that I may not pronounce of myself anything more greeuously against them, this only I would have the godly readers to thinke vpon: if it shoulde happen that same Exuperius bishop of Tholofa, whom we euene now rehearsed, or Acarius, or Ambrose, or any such to be raised from death, what they would say. Truely they would not allow that in so great necessitie of the poore, riches in a manner superfluous should be turned another way. Admit I speak nothing how these vses vpon which they be bestowed, (although there were no poore) are many waies hurtfull, but in no behalfe profitable. But I leave to speake of men. These goods are dedicate to Christ: therefore they are to be disposed after his will. But they shall in vaine saye, that this part is bestowed vpon Christ, which they haue wasted otherwife the he commanded. Howbeit, to confesse the truth, there is not much of the ordinary revenue of the Church abated for these expenses. For there are no bishoprikes so welthye, no abaties so fatte, finally neither so many, nor so large benefices, that may serue to fill the gluttony of priefts. But while they seeke to spare themselves, they perswade the people by superstition, to turne which should be bestowed vpon the poore, to build temples to set vp images, to buy jewels, to get costly garments. So with this gulle the daylie almes consumed.

19 Of the revenue, that they receive of their landes and possession, what else shall I say, but that which I haue alreadie saide, and which is before all mens eyes? We see, with what faithfulness they which are called bishops and Abbots do dispose the greatest part. What madness is it, to seeke here for an ecclesiastical order? Was it meete that they, whose life ought to have been a singular example of frugality, modestie, continence, and humilitie, should contende with the royalty of princes in number of goods, in gorgiousnesse of houes, in daintinesse of apparel and fare? And how much was this contrarie to their office, that they, whom the eternal and inviolable commandement of GOD forbiddeth to be desirous of filthy game, and biddeth to be content with simple living, should not only laye handes vpon townes and castels, but also violently enter vpon the greatest lordships, finally possess forcably verie empires? If they despise the word of GOD: what will they aunswere to those auncient decrees of the Synodes: whereby it is decreed that the bishop should haue a halme lodging not far from the Church, meane fare and houlesd stufie? What will they saye to that praisse of the Synode at Aquillia: where povertie is reported glorious in the Prieftes of the Lorde? For perhaps they will utterly refuse as too much rigorous, that which Hierome aduise of Neposianus, that poore men and strangers: and among them Christe as a guest, may knowe his table. But that which hee by and by addeth, they will be ashamed to denye that it is the glory of a bishope to provide for the goods of the poore: that it is the shame of all prieftes to studie for their owne riches. But they can not receive this, but they must all condemne themselves of shame. But it is not needesfull in this place to speake more hardly against them, sith my meaning was nothing else, but to shewe, that among them the lawesfull order of deaconrie is long
Cap. 6. Of the outwarde meanes long ago taken away: that they may no more glory of this title to the comedation of their Church which I thinke I have already sufficiently shewed.

The vii. Chapter.

Of the Supremacy of the Sea of Rome.

Hitherto we have rehearsed those orders of the Church, which were in the government of the olde Church: but afterward corrupted in times, and from thenceforth more and more abused, doe nowe in the Popyhe Church retaine only their name, and in deed are nothing else but vifours: that by comparison the godly reader might judge, what manner of Church the Romanists have, for whose sake they make vs schismatikes, because we have departed from it. But as for the heade and topp of the whole order, that is to say, the supremacy of the Sea of Rome, whereby they trauaile to prove, that they only have the catholike Church, we haue not yet touched it: because it tooke beginning neither from the institution of Christ, nor the use of the olde church, as those former parts did which we haue shewed to have so proceeded from antiquitie, by wickednes of times they are vitally degenerate, and haue put on altogether a newe forme. And yet they goe about to perswade the worlde, that this is the chiefe & in a manner only bonde of the vertie of the church, if we cleaue to the Sea of Rome, and continue in the obedience thereof. They rest (I say) principally vpon this stay, when they will take away the Church from vs, and claim it to themselves, for they kepe the head, vpon which the vertie of the Church hangeth, and without which the church must needs fall a sunder and be broken in pieces. For thus they thinke, that the Church is as it were a maimed and headlesse body, vnlesse it be subject to the Sea of Rome, as to her head. Therefore when they talke of their Hierarchie, they alway take their beginning at this principle: that the bishop of Rome (as the vicar of Christ, which is the head of the Church) is in his stead President of the vniverfall Church: and that otherwise the Church is not well ordered, vnlesse that Sea doe holde the supremacy aboue another. Therefore this also is to be examined of what sort it is: that we may omit nothing that pertaineth to a just government of the Church.

2. Let this therefore be the principall point of the question: Whether it be necessary for the true forme of Hierarchie (as they call it) or ecclesiastical order, that one Sea should be aboue the rest both in dignitie and in power, that it may be the head of the whole body. But we make the church subject to too vnjust lawes, if we lay this necessity vpon it, without the word of God. Therefore if the aduersaries will prove, which they require, they must shew that this disposition was ordeyne by Christ. For this purpose they alledg out of the law the high priesthood, also the high judgemen, which God did institute at Hierusalem. But it is easie to give a solution, and that manye waiues, if one way doe not satisfaie them. First no reason compelleth to extende that to the whole world, which was profitable in one nation: yea rather, the order of one nation and of the whole world shall be farre different. Because Because the Jews were on each side compassed with idolaters, they should not be diversly drawne with varietye of religions, God appointed the place of worshipping him in the middest part of the lande: there hee ordained ouer them one head By shoppe, whom they should have al regard vnto, that they might bee the better kept together in unitie. Nowe when religion is sprede abroad into the whole worlde, who doeth not see that it is altogether an absurditye, that the government of the East & West be giuen to one man? For it is in effecte as much as if a man shoulde affirme that the whole worlde ought to be governed by one ruler, because one pece of lande hath no mo rulers but one. But there is yet another reason, why that ought not to be made an example to be followed. No man is ignorant that the high byshop was a figure of Christ. Now, since the prishhood is remoued, that right must also bee remoued. But to whome is it remoued? Truely, not to the Pope (as he himselfe is so bolde shamelessly to boast) when he draweth this title to himselfe: but to Christ, which as he alone susteyneth this office, without any vicar or successor, so hee resigneth the honor to none other. For the Priesthood consisteth not in doctrine onely, but in the appeasing of God, which Christ hath fully wrought by his death, & in that intercession which he now flieth with his father.

3 There is therefore no cause why they shoulde binde vs by this example, as by a perpetuall rule, which we haue scene to bee enduring but for a time. Out of the newe Testament they haue nothing to bring forth for proffe of their opinion, but that it was sayde to one: Thou art Peter, and vpon this stone I will builde my Church. Againe, Peter, Louest thou me? Feede my sheepe. But admitting that these bee strong prooues, they must first shewe, that hee which is commanded to seede the flocke of Christ, hath power committed to him over all Churches: and that to binde and to loose is nothing else but to bee ruler of all the worlde. But as Peter had receiued the commandement of the Lord, so hee exhorteth all other priests to seede the Church. Hereby we may gather, that by this saying of Christ, there was either nothing giuen to Peter more than to the rest, or that Peter did egally communicate with other the power that he had receiued. But, that we strive not vainely, we haue in another place a cleare exposition out of the mouth of Christe, what is to binde and loose: that is to say, to receaine and to forgive sinnes. But the manner of binding and losing, both the whole Scripture eche where sheweth, and Paul very well declareth, when hee saith that the miniters of the Gospell, haue commandement to reconcile men to GOD, and also haue power to punishe them that refuse this benefite.

4 Howe shamefully they wrest those places, that make mention of binding and loosing, I both haue already shortly touched, and a little after I shal haue occasion to declare more at large. Nowe it is good to see onely, what they gather of that famous aunswere of Christ to Peter. Hee promised him the keyes of the kingdom of heauen: he sayde that whatsoever hee bounde in earth, shoulde bee bounde in heauen. If we agree vpon the word keyes, and the manner of binding, all contention shall by and by cease. For the Pope him selues will gladly giue over the charge injoynd to the Apostles.

Postles, which being full of trauell and greete, should shake from him his pleasures, without gaine. For as much as the heauens are opened vnto vs by the doctrine of the Gospel, it is with a very fit metaphore expressed by the name of keyes. Now men are bounde and loosed in no other wise, but when faith reconcileth some to God, and there own vnbeliefe bindeth other some. If the Pope did take this onely vpon him, I think there will be no man that woulde either enuy it, or striue about it. But because this succession being trauelsome and nothing gainefull pleareth not the Pope, hereupon growth the beginning of the contention, what Christ promiseth to Peter. Therefore I gather by the very matter it selfe, that there is nothing meanes, but the dignitie of the office of an apostle, which cannot be fearered from the charge. For if that definition which I have rehearsed, bee receiued (which cannot but shamelesly be rejected) here is nothing givem to Peter, that was not also common to his other fellows: because otherwise there should not onely wrong be done to the persons, but they very maiftie of doctrine should haile. They cry out on the other side, what availleth it, I pray you, to run vpon this rock? For they shall not prooue, but as the preaching of one name gospel was enioinad to all the apostles, so they were also al alike furnished with power to binde & loose, Christe (say they) appointed Peter Prince of the whole church, when he promised that he would giue him the keyes. But which he the promised to one, in another place he gaued it also to all the rest, & deliuered it as it were into their hands. If the same power were granted to all which was promised to one, wherein shaile he be aboue his fellows? Herein (say they) he excelleth, because he receiued it both in common together with them, and seuerely by himself, which was not givem to the other, but in common. What if I anfwere with Cyprian and Augustine, that Christe did it not for this purpose, to prefer one man before other, but so to set out the vnitie of the Church. For thus faith Cyprian, that God in the person of one gave the keyes to all, to signify the vnitie of all: and that the rest were the same thing that Peter was, enioind with like parraking both of honour & power: but the beginning is taken at vnitie, that the church of Christe may bee shewed to bee one. Augustine faith: If there were not in Peter a mysterie of the church, the Lorde woulde not say to him, I wil giue thee the keyes. For if this was faide to Peter, the Church hath them not: but if the church haue them, then Peter, when he receiued the keyes, betokened the whole church. And in an other place, When they were all asked, onely Peter answered, thou art Christ; and it is sayd to him, I will giue thee the keyes, as though he alone had receiued the power of binding and loosing: whereas both he being one said that one for all, & he receiued the other with all, as bearing the person of vnitie. Therefore one for all, because there is vnitie in all.

5 But this, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will buldfe my church, is no where red spoken to any other. As though Christ spake there any other thing of Peter, than which Paul and Peter himselfe speakeith of all Christians. For Paul maketh Christ the cheefe and corner stone, vpon which they are builded together that growe into a holy temple to the Lorde. And Peter biddeth vs to bee fitle stones which being founded vpon that chosen and precious stone, doe by this ioynit and coupling together with our GOD, cleau

When Act.8.24. hee was commancked by his fellowes, to goe with John into Samaria, hee refu-refused not. Whereas the Apostles did fend him, they did thereby declare that he helde him not for their superior. Whereas hee obeyed and tooke upon him the embassage committed to him, hee did thereby confesse that hee had a fellowship with them, and not an authoritie over them. If none of these things were, yet the onely Epiftle to the Galatians may easily take all doubting from vs: where almost in two whole Chapters together Paul traveueth to proue nothing else, but that hee himselfe was equall to Peter in honour of Apostleship. Then hee rehearseth that hee came to Peter, not to proue his subjeccion, but only to make their consent of doctrine approved by testimonie to all men: and that Peter himselfe required no such thing, but gaue him his right hand of fellowship, to worke in common gether in the Lorde's vineyard: and that there was no lesser grace given to him among the Gentiles, than to Peter among the Jewes: Finally that when Peter dealt not verie faithfully, hee was corrected by him, and obeyed his reproving. All these things doe make plaine, either that there was an equalitie betweene Paul and Peter, or at least that Peter had no more power over the rest, than they had over him. And (as I haue already saide) Paul of purpose laboureth about this, that none shoulde preferre before him in the Apostleship either Peter, or John, which were fellowes, not Lorde.

If Peter were
the Prince of the Apostles, it followeth not here-
upon that the whole worlde
should be subie nt to the Bishop of Rome.

8 But, to graunt them that which they require concerning Peter, that is, that hee was the Prince of the Apostles, and excelled the rest in dignitie:
yet there is no cause why they shoulde of a singular example make an uniuer-seall rule, and drawe to perpetuitie that which hath beene once done: Sith there is a farre differing reason. One was cheefe among the Apostles: forsooth, because they were fewe in number. If one were the cheefe of twelve men, shall it therefore follow that one ought to be made ruler of a hundred thousand men? It is no maruell that twelve had one among them shoulde rule them all. For naure beareth this, and the witte of men requireth this, that in every assembly, although they bee alequall in power, yet there be one as a gouernour, whom the rest may haue regarde vnto. There is no court without a Consill: no season of judges without a Pretor, or Propounder, no company without a Ruler, no fellowship without a Maister. So shoulde it bee no absurditie, if we confess that the Apostles gaue to Peter such a supremacie. But that which is of force among fewe, is not by and by to bee drawn to the whole worlde, to the ruling whereof no one man is suficient. But (say they) this hath place no leffe in the whole vniuersaltie of nature, than in all the partes, that there be one soueraigne heade of all. And hereof (and God wyl) they fetch a prooue from Cranes and Bees, which al-way choose to themselves one guide, not many. I allowe in deede the examples which they bring forth: but doe Bees resort together out of all the worlde to choose them one king? euer severall king is content with his owne hyue. So among Cranes, euer heard hath their owne king. What elfe shall they prowe hereby, but that euer Church ought to haue their owne seuerall Bishop appointed them? Then they cal vs to civill examples. They allege that saying of Homer. It is not good to haue many gouernours: and such things as in like sense are read in prophane writers to the commendalation
tion of Monarchie. The answeare is easie. For Monarchie is not praised of Vlytis in Homere, or of anie other, in this meaning, as though one ought to be Empereour of the whole world: but they meane to shew that one kingdome cannot hold two kings: and that power (as he calleth it) can abide no companion.

9 But let it be as they will, that it is good and profitable that the whole world be holden under Monarchie, which yet is a very great absurdity: but let it be so: yet I will not therefore grant that the same should take place in the government of the Church. For the Church hath Christ her only head, under whose dominion we all cleave together, according to that order & that forme of politicke which he hath prescribed. Therefore they do a great wrong to Christ, when by that pretence they will have one man to be ruler of the universal church, because it cannot be without a head. For Christ is the head of whom the whole body coupled & knit together in every joynr, wherewith one ministreth to an other, according to the working of every member in the measure thereof, makest increse of the body. See you not, how he setteth al men without exception in the body, & leaueth the honor & name of head to Christ alone? See you not how he giueth to every member a certain measure, and a determined & limited function: whereby both the perfection of the grace & the soueraine power of government may remain with Christ only? Neither am I ignorat what they are wont to caull, whiche this is objected against them: they say that Christ is properly called the only head, because he alone raigneth by his own authoritie & in his owne name: but that this nothing withstandeth, but that there may be under him another ministerial head (as they terme it) that may be his vicegerent in earth. But by this cauilllation they preuail nothing, vnles they first shew that this ministery was ordained by Christ. For the Apostle teacheth, that the whole ministraatio is dispersed through the members, & that the power floweth from the one heavenly head. Or if they will haue it any plainer spoken, sith the Scripture testifieth that Christ is the head, & claimeth that honour to him alone, it ought not to be transferred to any other, but whom Christ himselfe hath made his vicar. But that is not only nowhere read, but also maie be largely confuted by many places.

10 Paul sometimes depainteth vs to a lively image of the Church. Of one head he makest there no mention. But rather by his description we may gather, that it is disagreing from the institution of Christ. Christ at his ascending tooke from vs the visible presence of himselfe: yet he went vp to fulfill all things. Now therefore the Church hath him yet present, and alway shall haue. When Paul goeth about to shew the meane whereby hee presencteth himselfe, he calleth vs backe to the ministries which he vseth. The Lorde (faith he) is in vs all, according to the measure of grace that hee hath given to every member. Therefore he hath appointed some Apostles, some pastors, some Euangelisters, others some Teachers, &c. Why doth hee not say, that he hath set one over all, to be his vicegerent? For the place required that principally, and it could by no means have bin omitted, if it had bin true. Christ (faith he) is with vs. How? by the ministery of men, whom he hath appointed to governe the Church. Why not rather by the ministeriall head, to whom he hath committed his steede? He nameth vnite: but in God, and in the faith of Christ. He assigneth to men nothing but common ministerie, and to every one a particular measure. In that commendation of vnity, after that he had said that there is one body, one spirit, one hope of calling, one God, one Faith, one Baptisme, why hath he not also immediately added one chiefe bishop, that may hold the Church together in vnity? For nothing could have beene more firly spoken, if it had beene true. Let that place be diligently weighed. It is no doubt but that he meant there altogether to represent the holy and spiritual government of the Church, which they that came after called Hierarchie. As for Monarchie among ministers, he not only nameth none, but also theweth that there is none. It is also no doubt but he meant to express the manner of conioyning, whereby the faithfull cleave together with Christ their head. There he not onely speaketh of no ministeriall head, but appointeth to every of the members a particular working according to the measure of grace distributed to every one. Neither is there any reason why they should put to ly the comparison of the heavenly & earthly Hierarchie. For it is not safe to know beyond measure of it. And in framing this government we must follow no other figure, than the Lord himself hath painted out in his word.

If Peter had a supremacy not onlie to be confirmed unto him but also conferred unto others, the title of the bishop of Rome is not hereby proved.

Now although I grant them another thing, which they shall never win by profe before sober men, that the supremacy of the Church was so established in Peter, that it should alway remaine by perpetual succession: yet howe will they proove, that his see was so placed at Rome, that whatsoever is Bishop of that Church, should be set over the whole world? By what right do they bind this dignitie to the place, which is gien without mention of place? Peter (say they) liued and died at Rome. What did Christ himself? Did not he, while he liued, exercise his Bishoprie, and in dying fullfill the office of Priesthood, at Hierusalem? The Prince of Pastors, the soueraine Bishop, the head of the Church, could not purchase honor to the place: and could Peter, that was farre inferiour to him? Are not these follies more than childish? Christ gave the honor of supremacy to Peter: Peter gave at Rome, therefore he there placed the see of supremacy. By this reason the Israelites in old time might have set the see of supremacy in the desert, where Moses the chiefest Teacher and Prince of Prophets executed his ministerie and died.

Let vs see how trimly they reason. Peter (say they) had the supremacy among the Apostles: therefore the church where he sette ought to have that priviledge. But where sette he first? At Antioch, say they. Therefore the Church of Antioch doth rightly claim to it selfe the supremacy. They contente that it was in old time the first; but they say, that in removing thence he removed to Rome the honour that hee brought with him. For there is an Epistle under the name of Pope Marcellus to the bishops of Antioche, where he sayeth thus: Peters see was at the beginning with you, which afterward by the Lords commandement was removed hither. So the Church of Antioche, which was once the chiefest, hath given place to the see of Rome. But by what Oracle had that good man learned, that the Lord so commanded? For if this cause be to be determined by the law, it is necessary that that they answere, whether they wil haue this privileedge to be personal, or real, or mixt. For it must be one of these three. If they say that it is personal, then it belongeth nothing to the place. If they say that it is real, then when it is once gien to the place, it is not take away by reason either of the death or departure of the person. It remaneth therefore that they must say it is mixt: but then that place shall be not simply to be considered vnlesse the person do also agree. Let them choose which socuer they will, I will by and by in ferre and eazily prove, that Rome can by no meanes take the supreme magie upon it selfe.

13. But be it then, that as (they triefingly say) the supreme magie was removed to Antioch from Rome: yet why did not Antioch keep the second place? For if Rome have therefore the first place, because Peter sate there to the end of his life: to whom shall the second place rather be graunted, than where he had his first sate? How came it to passe then, that Alexandria went before Antioche? How agree eth it, that the Church of one disciple should be above the seat of Peter? If honor be due to euery Church, according to the worthines of the founder, what shall we say also of the other Churches? Paul nameth three, that seemed to be pillars, James, Peter, & John, if the first place were graunted to the sea of Rome in the honor of Peter: do not the seas of Ephesus, & Hierusalem, where John & James sate, deserve the second & third place? But among the Patriarches Hierusalem had the last place: Ephesus could not fit so much as in the uttermost corner. And other Churches were left out both all those that Paul founded, & those that the other Apostles were rulers of. The seat of Mark, which was but one of their discipies, obtained the honour. Therefore they must either confess that that was a preposterous order, or they must graunt vs that this is not a perpetuall rule, that there be due to euery Church the same degree of honour which the founder had.

14. Howbeit as for that which they report of Peter sittinf in the Church of Rome, I see not what credite it ought to haue. Truely that which is in Euesbius, that he ruled there fivte & twentie yeares, is verie easilly confuted. For it is evidet by the first & second Chapter to the Galathians, that about twentie yeares after the death of Christ, he was at Hierusalem, & that then he went to Antioch, where he sate longe, & to confert. Gregory re. kennaeth feventie yeares, and Euesbius twentie and fivte. But from the death of Christ, to the ende of Neroes Empire, (in whose time they say that he was flaine) there shalbe founde but thirtie and feventie yeares. For the Lorde suffered vnder Tiberius, the eighteenth year of his Empire. If you rebate twentie yeares, during the which Paulis witnessse that Peter dwelt at Hierusalem, there will remaine but feventeene yeares at the most, which must now be diuided betwene two Bishops, if he sate long at Antioch hee could not sit at Rome, but a verie little while. Which thing we may yet alfo more plainly prove. Paul wrote to the Romanes, when he was in his journey going to Hierusalem, where he was taken, and from thence brought to Rome. It is not likelihood that this Epistle was written foure yeares before that hee came to Rome. Thein is yet no mention of Peter, which should not haue bin left out, if Peter had ruled that church. Yea & in the end alfo, whe he reheareth a great number of the godly, whom he biddeth to be saluted, where verily he gath'reth together all those that he knewe, he yet saith vttely nothing of Peter. Neither is it needful here to make a long or curious demonstration to enuie of sound judgment: for the matter it selfe, and the whole argu'ment of the Epistle crieth out, that he should not have ouerpass'd Peter, if he had beene at Rome.

15 Then Paul was brought prisoner to Rome. Luke reporteth that he came to the brethren, of Peter he sayeth nothing. He wro'th from thence to many Churches; and in some places also hee writevth salutations in the names of certaine: but he doth not in one word saye that Peter was there at that time. Who, I pray you shall thinke it likely, that hee could have pass'd him ouer with silence, if he had beene present? Yea to the Philippians, where he said that hee had none that so faithfully looked untto the worke of the Lord, is Timothie; hee complained that they did all secke their own. And to the same Timothie he maketh a more grievous complaint, that none was with him at his first defence, but all forsooke him; where therefore was Peter then? For if they say that he was then at Rome, how great a shame doth Paul charg[e him with, that hee was a forfaker of the Gospell? For hee spakest of the beleuers; because he addeth, God impute it not untto them.
How long therefore, and in what time did Peter keepe that seate? But it is a constant opinion of writers, that hee govern'd that Church even to his death. But among the writers themselves it is not certain who was his successor, because some say Linus, and other some say Clement. And they tell many fond fables, of the disputacion had betwene him and Simon the Magis-cian. And Augustine sticketh not to confesse, when hee entreateth of superfitions, that by reason of an opinion rashly conceived, there was a custom grown in use at Rome, that they should not fast that day that Peter got the victorie of Simon the Magician. Finally the doings of that time are so entangled with diversitie of opinions, that we ought not rashly to beleue where we finde any thing written. And yet by reason of this consent of writers, I strie not against this, that he died there; but yet that he was Bishop there, & specially a long time, I cannot be perfwaded, neither do I much passe vp that also: for as much as Paul testifieth that Peter's Apostleship did peculiarly belong to the Jews, and his owne to vs. Therefore that that fellowship which they couenanted betwene themselves, may be confirmed with us, or rather that the ordination of the holy Ghost may stand in force amog us, we ought to have respect rather to the Apostleship of Paul & Peter. For the holy ghost so divided the provinces betwene them that he appointed Peter to the Jews, and Paul to vs. Now therefore let the Romanistes go & secke their supramacie else where than in the word of God, where it is found not to be grounded.

16 Nowe let vs come to the olde Church, that it may also bee made to appeare plainly that our aduersaries doe no lese causelessly; and falsely boast of the consent thereof, than they doe of the witnessse of the worde of God. When therefore they bragge of that princi'ple of theirs, that the vnitie of the Church cannot otherwise bee kept together, but if there bee one supreme head in earth, to whom all the members may obey, and that thence the Lord gave the supramacie to Peter, and from thence forth to the sea of Rome.

Rome by right of succession, that the same should remaine in it to the end; they affirm, that this hath beene alwayes observed from the beginning. But forasmuch as they wrongfully wrest manie testimonies, I will first say this aforesaid, that I denie not but that the writers doe eache where give great honor to the church of Rome, and do speak reverently of it. Which I thinke tobe done specially for three causes. For that same opinion, which I wot not how it grewen in force, that it was founded and ordained by the minil-rie of Peter, much auailed to procure fauour & estimation vnto it. Therefore in the East parts it was for honors sake called the sea Apostolike. Secondly, when the head of the Empire was there, & that therefore it was likely, that in that place were men more excellent both in learning & wisdom, & skill, & experience of many things, than any where else: there was worthily consideration had thereof; that both the honor of the citie, & also the other more excellent gifts of God should not seeme to be despised. There was besides these also a third thing, when the Churches of the East, and of Grecia, yea & of Africa, were in tumults among themselves with disagreements of opinions, the Church of Rome was quieter & less full of troubles than the rest. So came it to passe, that the godly & holie Bishops, being druen out of their seats, did oftentimes flee thither as intosanctuarie or certaine havens. For as the Westernne men are of lesse sharpenesse & twistnesse of wit, than the Asians or Africants be, so much are they lesse devious of alterations. Therefore added much authoritie to the Church of Rome, that in those times, it was not so troubled as the rest, and did hold the doctrine once delivered them, faster than all the rest as we shall by and by better declare. For these three causes (say) it was had in most honor, and commended with manie notable testimonies of the old writers.

17 But when our adversaries will thereupon gather that it hath a supremacy & soveraign power over other churches, they do too much amisse, as I have alreadie said. And that the same may the better appeare, I will first briefly shewe what the olde fathers thought of this vnitie which they enforce so earnestly. Hierome writing to Neposianus, after that he had recitected many examples of vnitie, at the last descended to the Hierarchie of the Church. Ech Bishop of evey severall church, eche Archpriest, eche Archdeacon, & all the ecclesiastical order, do rest upon their own rulers. Here a Romaine Priest speaketh, he commendeth vnitie in the ecclesiastical order, why doth he not rehearse that all Churches are knit together with one head as with one bond? Nothing could have more nitely seuered the matter that he had in hand: & it cannot be said that it was for forgetfulness, that he omitted it: for he would have done nothing more willingly if the matter had suffred him. He saw therefore without doubt, that that is the true reason of vnitie which Cyprian excellently well describeth in these words: The bishoprike is one, whereof echa hath a part wholly: & the Church is one, which is with encrease of fruitfulnesse more largely extended into a multitude. Like as there are many sunbeames & one light: and many branches of a tree, but one body grounded on a fast holding roote: and like as from one fountaine owne many streams, & thogh the multitude seeme to be diversly spread abroad with largenes of overflowing plenty, yet the vnitie is kept whole in the originall:

The fathers of the Church confessing the Churches vnitie never dreamed that the Bishop of Rome supreamie should bee the bonde so make it one.
Of the outward meanes

so the Church also being overspread with the light of the Lord, extendeth her beams abroad throughout the whole world, yet is it but one that is each where poured forth, and the unity of the body is not severed: she spreadeth her branches over the whole world, she sendeth out her overflowing streams: yet is there but one head and one beginning, &c. Afterward: The spouse of Christ cannot be an adultress: she knoweth one only house, the keepeth the holiness of one only chamber with Christ's namefastness. You see how she maketh the universal bishopricke to be Christ's only, which comprehendeth the whole Church vnder him: and faith that all they that execute the office of bishop vnder this head, have their parts thereof wholly. Where is the supremacy of the sea of Rome, if the whole bishopricke remaine with Christ only, and each bishop hath his part thereof wholly? These thinges therefore make to this purpose, that the reader may understand by the way, that the olde fathers were utterly ignorant of that principle, which the Romanists do take for confessed & undoubted, concerning the unity of an earthly head in the Hierarchie of the Church.

The vii. Chapter.

Of the beginning and increasing of the Papacie of Rome, until it advanced to such height, whereby both the libertie of the Church hath bin oppressed, and all the right government thereof oversrowned.

As concerning the auncientness of the supremacie of the sea of Rome, there is nothing had of more antiquitie to stablishe it, than the decree of the Nicene Synode, wherein the bishoppes of Rome both hath the first place among the Patriarches given vnto him, and is commanded to looke vnto the Churches adjoyning to the citie. When the Council maketh such division betwene him and the other Patriarches, that it aughteth to every one their bounds: truely, it dooth not appoint him the head of all, but maketh him one of the chiefe. There were present Vitus and Vincenius in the name of Iulius, which then governed the church of Rome: to the was given the fourth place. I beseech you, if Iulius were acknowledged the head of the Church, should his Legates bee thrust into the fourth seate? Should Athanasius be chiefe in the Council, where principally the image of the Hierarchicall order ought to be scene? In the Synode at Ephesus it appeareth, that Celestius which was then bishop of Rome, vfid a crooked foole meane to provide for the dignitie of his seate. For when hee sent his deputies thither, he committed his seate to Cyrilus of Alexandria, which should notwithstanding otherwise have beene the chiefe. To what purpose was that same committing, but that his name might by what meanes focuer abide in the first place? For his Legates sate in a lower place, and were asked their opinion among the rest, and subscribed in their order: in the mean time the Patriarch of Alexandria owned Celestines name with his own. What shall I say of the second council at Ephesus: where when Leos Legates were present, yet Dioscorus Patriarch of Alexandria sate the chiefe as by his owne right? They will take exception that it was not right counsell, by which both the holy man Flavianus was condemned, and Eucherius acquired acquainted, and his vngodlines allowed, But when the Synod was gathered, when the bishops took their places in order, verly the legates of the bishop of Rome sat there among the rest none otherwise than in a holy and lawfull Council. Yet they strived not for the first place, but yielded it to another: which they would have neuer done, if they had thought it to be theirs of right. For the bishops of Rome were neuer ashamed to enter into the greatest contentions for their honors: & for this only cause oftentimes to vex and trouble the Church with many & hurtful strifes. But because Leo saw that it should be a to much unreasonable request, if he should seek to get the chiefe place for his Legates, therefore he surceeded it.

2. Then followed the Council of Chalcedon, in which by the grant of the Emperour the Legates of the Church of Rome sat in the chiefe place. But Leo himselfe confesseth, this was an extraordinary privileg. For when hee made petition for it to the Emperour Marcius, and Pulcheria Emperess, he did not affirm it was due to him, but only pretended, that the Eastern Bishops, which sat as chiefe in the council at Ephesus, troubled all things and ill abused their power. Whereas therefore it was needfull to have a graue governor, & it was not likely they should be meet for it, which had once ben so light and disordered: therefore he praised, that by reason of the default & vnfitnes of other, the office of governing might be remoued to him. Truly that which is gotten by singuler privileges and beside order, is not by common law. Where this only is pretended, that there needed some newe governour, because the former governours had behaued themselves ill, it is evident that it neither was so before, nor ought to continue so for ever, but is don only in respect of present danger. The bishop of Rome therefore had the first place in the Council at Chalcedon not because it was due to his see, but because the Synode was at that time destitute of a graue fit governour, while they that ought to have ben the chiefe, did through their own intemperance & corrupt affection, thrust themseiles out of place. And this that I say, Leos successor did in deed prove. For when he sent his Legates to the Synode at Constantinople, which was helden long time after, he brauled not for the first seat, but easilie suffered Menas the patriarch of Constantinople to sit as chiefe. So in the council at Carthage, at which Augustine was present, we see that not the Legates of the see of Rome, but Aurelius Archbishops of that place sat as chiefe: when yet the contention was about the authoritie of the Bishop of Rome. Yea there was also a generall council helden in Italie it selfe, at which the bishop of Rome was not present. Ambrose was chiefe there, which was in very great authoritie with the Emperour, where was no mention made of the bishop of Rome. Therefore at that time it came to passe by the dignity of Ambrose, that the see of Milain was more noble then the see of Rome.

3. As concerning the title of Supremacy, & other titles of pride, whereupon it now maruellously boasteth it selfe, it is not hard to judge, when & in what sort they crept in. Cyprian oftentimes makest mention of Cornelius. He lettest him out with no other name, but by the name of brother, or fellowe Bishop, or fellow in office. But when hee writeth to Stephen the successor of Cornelius, he doth not only make him equal with himselfe & the rest, but also...

If a man turne over the antienter monuments, he shall finde that the Bishop of Rome at that time was content with the common name of brother. Certainly so long as the face of the Church continued true & pure, all these names of pride, where with since y time the sea of Rome hath begun to waxe outrageous, were utterly vnheard of it was not known, what was the highest bishop & the only head of the church in earth. But if the bishop of Rome had ben so bold to have taken such a thing upon him, there were foute & wise men that would haue by & by repressed his folly. Hierome forasmuch as he was a priest at Rome, was not ill willing to let out the dignitie of his owne Church, so much as the matter & state of his time sufffedy yet we see how he also bringeth it downe into fellowship with the rest. If authority (saith he) be sought for, the world is greater than a city. Why doest thou alleage to me the custome of one city? Why doest thou defend sinalnes of number, out of which hath growen pride, against the lawes of the church? Wherefore ther be a bishop, either at Rome, or at Eugubium, or at Constantinople, or at Rhogiam, he is of the same merite and of the same priesthood. The power of riches or basenes of poueritie maketh not a bishop higher or lower.

4. About the title of vniversal bishop the contenfight first bega in the time of Gregory, which was occasioned by the ambition of John bishop of Constantinople. For he (which thing never any man before had attempted) would haue made himselfe vniversal bishop. In that contention Gregorie doth not alleage that the right is take away which was due to himself, but stoutly crieth out against it, that it is a prophane name, yea ful of sacrilege, yea the forwarne of Antichrist. The whole Church (faith he) falleth downe from her state, if he fall which is called vniversal. In another place: It is very sorrowful, to suffer patiently, that our brother & fellow bishop, despising all other, should only be named bishop. But in this his pride what els is betokened but the times of Antichrift here at hand? because verely he followeth hym, despising the fellowship of Angels, went about to clime vp to the top of singularity. In another place he writeth to Eulolius of Alexandria, and Anastasius of Antioche. None of my predecessors at any time woulde vse that prophane word; for if one be called vniversal Patriarch, the name of patriarches is abated from the rest. But farre may this be from a christian minde, that any should have a will to take that vpon him, whereby he may in any part, be it neuer so little, diminish the honor of his brethren. To consent in this wicked word is nothing els but to leefe the faith. It is one thing (faith he) y we owe to the preferring of the vnity of faith, & an other thing that we owe to the keeping downe of pride. But I say it boldely, because whoseoeuer calleth himselfe or desireth to be called vniversal bishop, he doth in his pride advancing run before antichrift, because he doth with shewing himselfe proud preferre himselfe above the rest. Againe to Anastasius bishop of Alexandria I have said y he can not haue peace with vs, vnlesse he amended the advancing of the superstitious and proud word, which the first apostata hath inuented.

And
And (to speake nothing of the wrong done to your honour) if one be called vniuersall by shop, the vniuersall Church falleth when that vniuersall one falleth. But whereas he writeth, that this honour was offered to Leo in the Synode at Chalcedon, it hath no colour of truth. For neither is there any such thing red in the actes of that Synode. And Leo himselfe, which with many Epistles impugneth the decree there made in honour of the sea of Constantinople, without doubt would not have paffed over this argument, which had beene moft to be liked of all other, if it had beene true, that hee refused that which was given him: & being a man otherwise too much desirous of honor, he would not have omitted that which made for his praise. Therefore Gregory was deceived in this, that hee thought that that title was offered to the sea of Rome by the Synode at Chalcedon: to speake nothing, howe fond it is, that hee both teftifieth it to have proceeded from the holy Synode, & also at the same time called it wicked, proflane, abhominable, proude, and full of sacrilege, yea defecundy by the due, and publifhed by the crier of An-tichriste. And yet he addeth that his predecessor refused it, leaft all Priestes should be deprived of their due honor, when any thing were privately giuen to one. In another place: no man at any time hath willed to be called by that word. No man hath taken to himfelfe that presumptuouz name: leaft if hee should in the degree of bishoprike take to himfelfe a glory of singularity, he should seeme to have denied the same to all his brethren.

Now I come to the jurisdiction, which the bishopp of Rome affirmeth that he hath over all Churches. I knowe howe great contentions have bene in olde time about this matter. For there hath bene no time wherein the sea of Rome hath not counted to get en Empire ouer other Churches. And in this place it shall not be our offeasone, to search by what means it grew then by litle & little to some power. I do not yet speake of that infinite empire, which it hath not so long ago taken by force to it self: for we will differre that to a place convenient. But heere it is good to speake briefly, howe in olde time and by what means it had advancd it selfe, to take to it selfe any power ouer other Churches. When the Churches of the East were diuided & troubled with the factions of the Arrians under the Emperours Constantius and Conftans the fonnes of Conftantine the Great, and Athanasius the cheefe defendour there of the true fayth was driven out of his sea: such calamity compelled him to come to Rome, that with the authority of the sea of Rome, hee might both after a fort represse the rage of his enemies, and confirme the godly that were in diffetse. He was honourably receiued of Julius then Byshop, and obtaied that the Byshops of the West tooke vppon them the defence of his caufe. Therefore when the godly ftoode in great neede of for-raine aid, and faw that there was very good succour for them in the church of Rome, they willingly gave vnto it the most authoritie they could. But all was nothing else, but the communion thereof should be highly esteemed and it should be counted a great shame to be excommunicate of it. After-w ard cuil & wicked men also added much vnto it. For, to escape lawful judgments, they fled to this sanctuary. Therefore if any priest were condemned by his Byhop, or any byshop by the Synode of his province, they by and by appealed to Rome. And the byshops of Rome receiued such appearances more greedily than was meet: because it seemed to be a forme of extraordinary power, so to entermeddle with matters far & wide about them. So when Eutyches was condemned by Flavianus bishop of Constantinople, he complained to Leo that he had wrong done vnto him. Leo without delay, no lesse vndiscreetely than fouldenly, tooke in hand the desperate of an euill cause; he griefoufslie inueyed against Flavianus, as though hee had, without hearing the cause, condemned an innocent: and by this his ambition he caused that the vngodlinesse of Eutyches was for a certaine space of time strengthened.

In Africa it is evident that this oftentimes changed. For so soone as any lewd man had taken a foile in ordinarie judgement, he by and by flew to Rome, and charged his countrimen with many slanderous reports: and the sea of Rome was alway ready to entermeddle. Which lewdnesse compelled the bishops of Africa to make a lawe, that none vnder paine of excommunication should appeale beyond the sea.

6 But whatsoeuer it were, let vs see what authoritie or power the sea of Rome then had. Ecclesiasticall power is contained in these four points, ordering of byshopes, summoning of Counctuls, hearing of appeals or jurisdiction, chaflfing admonitions or censures. All the old Synodes commande byshopes to be consecrate by their owne Metropolitan, and they never bid the bishop of Rome to be called vnto it, but in his owne Patriarchie. But by little and little it grewe in vs, that all the Byshopes of Italie came to Rome to fetch their consecration, except the Metropolitan, which suffered not them selues to be brought into such bondage: but when any Metropolitan was to be consecrate, the bishoppe of Rome sent thither one of his priesstes, which should only be present, but not president. Of which thing there is an example in Gregory; at the consecration of Constantius bishop of Millan after the death of Laurence. Howbeit I doe not thinke that that was a verie auncient institution: but when at the beginning for honor & good wils fake they sent one to another their Legates, to be witnessses of the consecration, and to testify their communion with them, afterward which was voluntary, began to bee holden for necessary. Howsoever it bee, it is evident that in olde time the byshop of Rome had not the power of consecrating, but in the province of his owne Patriarchie, that is to say in the Churches adjoyning to the citie, as the canon of the Nicene Synode faith. To the Consecration was annexed the sending of a Synodicall Epistle, in which he was nothing above the rest. For the Patriarches were wont immediately after their consecration, by solemn writing to declare their faith, whereby they professed they subscribed to the holy & catholike councils. So rendering an account of their faith, they did approve themselves one to another. If the Byshop of Rome had received of other, and not himselfe given this consecration, hee had thereby bin acknowledged superiour but when he was no lesse bound to give it, than to require it of other, and to be subject to the common lawe: truly that was a token of fellowship, not of dominion.

Of this thing there is an example in Gregories Epistle to Anastafius and to Cyrilicus of Constantinople, and in other places to all the Patriarches together.

7 Then follow admonitions or censures: which in old time by bishops of Rome vscd toward other, so they did againe suffer them of other. Irenæus...
To Salutation. Lib.4.

...the church with a pernicious disention. Victor obeyed, & spurned not against it. Such a liberty was then in use among the holy bishops,y they vfed a brotherly authority toward the bishop of Rome, in admonishing and chastising him if he at any time offended. He againe, when occasion required did admonish other of their duty:& if there were any fault, rebuked it. For Cyprian, when he exhorted Stephen to admonish the bishops of France, fetcheth not his argument from the greater power, but from the common right that priests haue among themselves, I beseech you, if Stephen hadde then ben ruler over France, would not Cyprian haue said: Restaine them, because they be thine; but he faith farre other wise. This (faith he) the brotherly fellowship, wherewith we are bound one to another requireth that we should admonish one another. And we see also with how great sharpnes of words he being otherwise a man of a milde nature inuyeth against Stephen himselfe, when he thinketh him to be too insolent. Therefore in this behalfe also there appeareth not yet, that the bishop of Rome had any jurisdiction over them that were not of his owne province.

8 As concerning the calling together of Synodes, this was the office of every Metropolitane, at certaine appointed times to assemble a provincial Synode. There the bishop of Rome had no authortie. But a general Counsell, the Emperor only might summon. For if any of the bishops had appeasembr, not only they were out of his province, would not haue obeyed his calling, but also there would by & by haue rifen an uprore. Therefore the Emperor indifferently warned them all to be present, Socrates in deed reporteth, that Julius did expostulate with the bishops of the East, because they called him not to the Synode of Antioch, whereas it was forbidden by the Canons, that anything should be decreed without the knowledge of the bishop of Rome. But who doth not see that this is to be understood of such decrees as bind the whole vniuersall Church: Now it is no maruel, if thus much be granted both to the antiquitie & honor of the citie, & to the dignitie of the sea, that there should be no general decrees made of religion, in the absence of the bishop of Rome, if he refuse not to be present. But what is this to the dominion over the whole Church? For we deny not, that he was one of the chiefes: but we wil not grant, that which the Romanistes now affirm, that he had a dominion over all.

9 Now remaineth the fourth kind of power, which standeth in appeals. It is evident that he hath the chiefe power, to whose judgement feate appel lation is made. Many oftentimes appealed to the bishop of Rome, and he himselfe also went about to draw the hearing of causes to himselfe: but he was alway lauged to scorn, when he passed his owne boundes. I will speake nothing of the East & of Grecia: but it is certaine that the bishops of France stoutly withstood him, when he seemed to take to himselfe an empire ouer them. In Africa there was long debate about that matter. For where at the Melenitane Counsell, at which Augustine was presente, they were excommunicate that appealed beyond the sea, the bishoppe of Rome travailed to bring to passe, that that decrees might be amended. He sent his legates to shew that that privilege was given to him by the Nicene Council, The

The Legates brough forth the actes of the Nicene Councell, which they had fetched out of the storehouse of their own Church. The Affricans withstood it, and denied that the bishop of Rome ought to be credited in their owne cause: and laid that therefore they would tende to Constantinople, & into other cities of Grecia, where copies were to be had that were leste sul- picious. It was founde, that therein was no such thing written, as the Romans had pretended. So was that decree confirmed, which toke the chuse hearing of causes from the bishop of Rome: In which doing the lewd shame-lefnes of the bishop of Rome himselfe appeared. For when he guilefully did thrust in the Synode at Sardos in stead of the Nicene Synode, he was shamefully taken in a manifest falselie. But yet greater & more shamelesse was their wickednes, that added a forged Epistle to the Council, wherein I wrote not what by shop of Carthage, condemning the arroganct of Aurelius his predeceffour, for that he was so bold to yield himselfe from the obedience of the sea Apostolike, and yeelding himselfe and his Church, humbly craueth pardon. These be the goodly monumenites of antiquitie, wherupv the majestic of the sea of Rome is founded, while they so childishly lie, under the pretence of antiquitie, very blinde men may finde it out by groping. Aurelius (faie he) puffed vp with diueltish boldncesse and stubborneffe, rebelled against Christ, and Saint Peter, & thence to be condemned with curse. What said Augustine? But what saide so many fathers that were present at the Milevitan Councell? But what neede is it to spende many worde in confuting that foolish writing, which the Romanistes themselves, if they have any face left, can not looke vpon without great shame? So Gratian, I cannot tell whether of malice or of ignorance, where he rehearsed that decree that they should be excommunicate that appell beyond the sea, addeth an exception: Vnleffe paraduenture they appell to the sea of Rome. What may a man do to these beasts, which are so void of common reason, they except only thing out of the law, for whose cause every man feeth the law was made? For the Council when it condemneth appelles beyond the sea, forbideth only this, that none should appell to Rome. Here the good exporisor excepteth Rome out of the common lawe.

10 But (to determine this question at once) one history shall make plaine what maner of jurisdiccon the bishop of Rome had in olde time. Donat of the blackhoues had accused Cecilian bishop of Carthage. The man accused was condemned, his cause not heard. For wher he knew that the bishops had conspired against him, he would not appeare. Then the matter came to the Emperour Constantine. He, forasmuch as he willed to haue the matter ended by ecclesiasctical judgement, committed the hearing of it to Melciades bishop of Rome. To whom he adjoined fellowe commissioners, many by-shops of Italie, Franchise, and Spayne. If that belonged to the ordinary jurisdiction of the sea of Rome, to heare an appelle in an ecclesiasctical cause: why doth he suffer other to be ioyned with him at the wil of the Emperour? Yea why did he himselfe take the judgement vs he rather by the Emperours commandement, than by his owne office? But let vs heare what hapned afterward. There Cecilian got the victoy. Donat of the blacke houses was condemned for slaundr: he appelled; Constantine comitted the judgement of of the appeal to the bishop of Orleans. He fate as judge, to pronounce what he thought, after the bishop of Rome. If the sea of Rome hath the chiefest power without appellation: why doth Melciades suffer himselfe to receive so great a shame, that the bishop of Orleans should be preferred above him? And what Emperor doth this? even Constantine of whom they boast that he employed not only al his endeavor, but in a maner al the riches of the empire to increase the dignitie of their sea. We see therefore nowe, howe farre the byshoppe of Rome was at that time by all meanes from that supreme dominion, which he affirmeth to be giuen vnto him by Christ ouer all Churches, and which hee lyingly faith that hee hath in all ages possisied by the consent of the whole worlde.

I knowe howe many epistles there bee, howe many writings and decrees, wherein the byshopes do giue much, and boldely challenge much vnto it. But this alfo al men that haue but a little wit & learning do know, that the most part of those are so vnfauretie, that by the first time of them a man may foone finde out of what shop they came. For what man of sound wit and sober, will thinke that that goodly interpretation is Anacletus his owne, which is in Graecian reported under the name of Anacletus: that is, that Cephas is a heade? The Romanistes doe at this day abuse for defence of their see, many such trifles, which Graecian hath patched together without judgement: and yet still in so great light they will sell such smokes, wherewith in olde time they were wont to mocke out the ignorant in darkness. But I wil not bestowe much labour in confusing those things, which do openly confute themselves by reason of their vnfauretie follicie. I graunt that there remaine also true epistles of the old byshopes, wherein they set forth the honor of their see with glorious titles, of which sort are some epistles of Leo. For that man as he was learned and eloquent, so was he also above measure discreet of glory and dominion: but whether the Churches then beleued his testimonie when hee so auanced him selfe, that in deede is it that is in controversye. But it appeareth that many offended with his ambition, did also withstande his greedie desire. Sometimes he appointed in his stead the byshop of Thessalonica throughout Grecia and other Countries adjoyning: sometyme hee appointed the byshop of Orleans, or some other throughout France. So he appointed Hormidas byshop of Hispalis to be his vicar in Spain: but euer where he excreth, that he giueth out such appointmentes vpon this condition, that the Metropolitanas may haue their auncient privilidges remaining safe and whole. But Leo him selfe declareth, that this is one of their privilidges, that if any doubt happen about any matter, the Metropolitan shoulde first be asked his aduise. Therefore those appointmentes of vicars in his stead were vpon this condition, that neither any byshop should be letted in his ordinary jurisdiccion, nor any Metropolitan in being judge of Appeals, nor any provincial Council in ordering of their Churches. What was this else but to abstaine from all jurisdiccion: but to entemedle to the appeasing of discordes, onely so farre, as the Lawe and nature of the communio of the Church sufficeth?

In Gregories time that auncient order was already much chaunged. For when the Empire was shaken, and tore in pieces, when France and Spain...
Spaine were afflicted with many overthrowes receiued, \textit{Slavonia} wafted, \textit{I}taly vexed, and \textit{Af}rica in a manner destroied with continuall calamities, that in so great a shaking of cuill aieres, at least the integritie of faith might remaine, or yet not utterly perih, all the bishops from each part did the rather ioyne themselves to the bisho: of \textit{Rome}. Thereby it came to passe, that not only the dignitie, but also the power of that sea greatly encreased. Howebeit I doe not so much passe by what means it was brought about. Truely it appeareth that it was then greater than in the ages before. And yet it then greatly differed from beinge an vnbridled dominion, that one man might beare rule ouer other after his owne will. But the sea of \textit{Rome} had this reuerence, that it might with her auctoritie subdue & represse the Lewde and obstinate that could not by the other bishops be kept within their dutie. For \textit{Gregory} doth oftentimes diligently testify this, that hee doth no leffe faithfully fully preferue to other men their rightes, than he requireth his own of them. Neither doe I (faith he) pricked on by ambition, plucke from any man that which is his right: but I define in all things to honour my brethren. There is no saying in his wri:ings wherein he doth more proudly boaste of the large neffe of his Supremacie, than this: I knowe not what by shope is not subiect to the sea \textit{Apostolike} when he is founde in fault. But hee by and by adioyneth. Where fault requireth, not all according to the order of humilitie are equall. Hee giueth to himselfe, power to correct them that have offended: if all doe their dutie, he maketh himselfe equall with the rest. But he himselfe giueth himselfe this power: and they affered to it that woulde: and other that liked it not, might freely gainsay it, which it is well knowne that the most part of them did. Befide that he speaketh there of the Primacie of \textit{Constantinople}: which when hee was condemned by the provincial Synode, refused the whole judgement. His fellowe bishoppes informed the Emperour of this stubbornesse of him. The Emperour willed \textit{Gregory} to bee judge of the cause. We see therefore that hee both attempteth nothing, whereby hee may breake the ordinary jurisdic:ion, and the fame thing that hee doth for the helping of other, hee doth not but by the commandement of the Emperour.

13 This therefore was then all the power of the byshop of \textit{Rome}, to set himselfe against obstinate & vnNamed heads, whether needed any extraordinary remedy: & that to helpe and not to hinder other bishops. Therefore he taketh no more to himselfe ouer al other, than in another place he granteith to all other ouer himselfe, when he confesseth that he is ready to be corrected of all, to bee amended of all. So in another place hee doth in deede commande the Byshoppe of \textit{Aquileia} to come to \textit{Rome}, to plead his cause in a controwersie of faith that was rifen betweene him and other: but hee doth not commande him of his own power, but because the Emperor had so commaund:ed. Neither doeth hee giue warning that hee alone shall bee judge, but promised that hee will assemble a Synode by whom the whole matter may be judged. But although there was yet such moderation, that the power of the sea of \textit{Rome} had her certaine boundes, which it might not passe, & the bisho: of \textit{Rome} himselfe was no more aboue than under other: yet it appeareth howe much \textit{Gregory} misliked such state. For hee nowe and then then complaineth, that under color of bishopricke he was brought backe to the world; and that he was more entangled with earthly cares, than ever he had suffered them while he was a lay man: that he was in that honor oppressed with tumults of worldly affairs. In another place: to great burdens (faith he) of business do hold me downe, that my mind can nothing at all be raised up to things above. I am shaken with many waies of causes: and after those leisures of rest I am tossed with tempestes of troublesome life, so that I may rightly say, I come into the depth of the sea, & the tempest hath drowned me. Hereby gather, what he would have saide, if he had happened to be in these times. Although he fulfilled not the office of a Pastor, yet hee was doing it. He absteynd from the governement of the civill Empire, and confessed himselfe to be subject to the Emperor as other were. Hee did not thrust himselfe into the cure of other Churches, but being compelled by necessity. And yet he thinketh himselfe to be in a maze, because hee cannot apply himselfe altogether only to the office of a Bishop.

14 At that time the bishop of Constantinople withdrew with the bishop of Rome for the Supremacie, as it is alreadie said. For after that the state of the Empire was established at Constantinople, the majestie of the Empire seemed to require that that Church also should have the second place of honor after the Church of Rome. And truely at the beginning, nothing more ensued to cause the Supremacie to be given to Rome, but because the head of the Empire was then at that time. There is in Gratian a writing under his name of Pope Lucinus, where he saith, that cities were no otherwise diuided, where Metropolitanones & Primates ought to sit, than by the reason of the civill governement that was before. There is also an other under the name of Pope Clement, where he saith, the Patriarches were odered in those cities that had had the cheefe Flamines in them. Which, although it be false, yet is taken out of a trueth For it is certaine, that to the end there should be made as little change as might be, the provinces were diuided according to their state of things then were: & that Primates & Metropolitanones were set in those cities that excelled the other in honors & power. Therefore in the Council at Taurinum it was decreed, that those Cities which in the civill governement were the cheefe cities of every province, should be the cheefe sea of Bishops. And if it happened the honor of the civill governement to be removed from one city to another, that then the right of the Metropolitan city should therewithal be removed thither. But Innocentius bishop of Rome, when he saw the auncient dignitie of his city to growe in decay, after that the seat of the Empire was removed to Constantinople, fearing the abatement of his sea, made a contrarie law: wherein he denieth it to be necessarie, that the ecclesiastical mother cities should be changed as the Imperial mother cities change. But the authority of a Synode ought of right to be preferred above one mans sentence. Also we ought to suspect Innocentius himselfe in his owne cause. Howsoever it be, yet by his owne prouisio he sheweth, that from the beginning it was so ordered, that the Metropolitan cities should be disposed according to the outward order of the Empire.

15 According to this auncient ordinance, it was decreede in the first council at Constantinople, that the Bishop of the citie sould have the priuileges of a Pope.

ly, which the Nicene Synode hath once decreed. As though forsooth the Christian faith were endangered, if one Church bee preferred before another: or as though Patriarchies were there divided to any other ende, but for policies. But we knowe that policy receiueth, yea requireth diuerse changes, according to the diversitie of times. Therefore it is fonde that Leo pretended, that the honour, which by the authoritie of the Nicene Synode was giuen to the sea of Alexandria, ought not to be giuen to the sea of Constantinople. For common reason telleth this, that it was such a decree, as might be taken away according to the respect of times. Yea none of the bishops of the East withfloode it, whom that thing moft of all concerned. Truely Proterius was present, whom they had made bishop of Alexandria in the place of Dioscorus. There were present other Patriarches, whose honour was diminishe. It was their parte to withstand it, not Leo, which remained safe in his owne place. But when all they holde their peace, yea assent unto it, and onely the bishop of Rome resieth; that is easie to judge, what moueth him: that is, he foresawe that which not long after happened, that it woulde come to paffe, that, the glorie of olde Rome decaying, Constantinople not contented with the seconde place, woulde strive with Rome for the supremacie. And yet with his crying out hee did not so much preuaile, but that the decree of the counsell was confirmed. Therefore his successors, when they sawe themselves overcome, quietly gatte over that stiffenesse: for they suffered that hee should bee accounted the second Patriarch.

16 But within a little after, John which in Gregories time ruled the church of Constantinople, brake foorth so farre that he called himselfe the vniverfall Patriarch. Here Gregorie, lest hee should in a verie good cause faile to defende his owne sea, did constantly set himselfe against him. And truely both the pride and madnesse of John was intolerable, which desired to make the bounds of his bishopprike equall with the bonds of the Empire. And yet Gregorie doth not claime to himselfe, that which he denieth to an other: but abhorreth that name as wicked, and vnGodly, and abominable, whofouer take it vpon him. Yea and also in one place hee is angerie with Eulogius bishop of Alexandria, which had honoured him with such a title. Beholde (faith he) in the preface of the Epistle which he directed to my selfe that haue forbidden it, yee have cared to imprint the worde of proude calling, in naming mee vniverfall Pope, which, I pray that your holinesse will no more doe, because that is withdrawn from you, which is giuen to another more than reason requireth. I count it no honour, wherein I see the honour of my brethren to be diminished. For my honour is the honour of the vniverfall Church, and the sounde strenth of my brethren. But if your holines ca meet the vniesfall Pope, it denieth it selfe to be that which it confesseth me to be wholly. Truely Gregorie stode in a good and honest cause. But John holpen by the favour of Maurice the Emperour, could never bee remoued from his purpose. Cyriacus also his successor never suffered himselfe to be in-treated in that behalfe.

17 At the last Phocas, which when Maurice was slaine, was set in his place (I were not for what cause being more friendly to the Romancs, but because he was there crowned without strife) granted to Boniface the third that which Gregorie never required, that Rome should bee the head of all Churches. After this manner was the controversie ended. And yet this be-nefitre of the Emperour, could not so muche have proficed the sea of Rome, unlesse other things also had afterward happened. For Grecia and all A. sea were within a little after cut off from the communion of Rome. France so muche reuerenced him, that it obeyed no further than it listed. But it was then first brought into bondage when Pipine usurped the kingdome. For when Zacharie Bishop of Rome had beeene his helper to the breache of his faith, and to robberie, that thrusting out the lawfull king, he might violently enter upon the kingdome as laid open for a pray: he received this reward that the sea of Rome should have jurisdiction over the Churches of France:
As robbers are wonted in parting to divide the comon spoile: so these good men ordered the matter betwene themselves, that Pipine should have the earthly and ciuill dominion, spoiling the true king: and Zacharie should be made head of all bishops and haue the spirittuall power: which, when at the beginning it was weake: (as it is wont to bee in new thinges) was afterward confirmed by the authoritie of Charles, in manner for a like caufe. For hee was also indebted to the Bishop of Rome, for that by his endeuour hee had attained to the honour of the Empire. But although it bee credible, that Churches ech where were before that time much deformed, yet it is certaine that the olde forme of the Church was then first utterly defaced in France and Germanie. There remaine yet in the recordes of the court of Paris brefe notes of these times, which, where they intreate of the matters of the Church, make mention of the covenante both of Pipine and of Charles with the bishop of Rome. Thereby we may gather that then was an alteration made of the old State.

18 Since that time, when thinges did ech where daily fall from worse to worse, the tyrannie of the sea of Rome was noe and then also establisshed and increased, and that partly by the ignorance, and partly by the slouthe fulnesse of the bishops. For when one man tooke all thinges upon him, and without measure proceeded more and more to advance himselfe against lawe and right: the bishops did not with such zeale as they ought, endeueour themselves to restraine his lust, & though they wanted not courage, yet they were defitute of true learning and knowledge: so that they were nothing fit to attempt so great a matter. Therefore we see what and howe Monstrous an unholy defiling of all holy thinges, and a scatting abroad of the whole order of the Church, was in Bernardes time. He complaineth that there resort by heapes to Rome out of all the worlde, ambitious men, couetous, Simonians, robbers of God, keepers of concubines, committers of incest, & all such monsters, to obtaine or retaine ecclesiasticall honours by the Apostolike authority: and that fraude and vndermining, and violence were grewe in force. He saith that that maner of judging which then was used, was abominable, and vnseemly, not onely for the Church, but also for a judiciall court. He crieth out that the Church is full of ambitious men: and that there is none that more dreadeth to commit mischievous acts, than robbers do in their cause, when they diuide the spoiles or waft away men. Fewe (saith he) do look into the mouth of the lawgiver, but into his hands. But not without cause. For those hands do all the Popes businesse. What a thing is this, that they are bought of the spoiles of Churches, that say to thee, oh well done, well done? The life of the poore is fowen in the streets of the rich. Glistereth in the mire: men run to it from all places: not the poore, but the stranger taketh it vp, or he peradventure that runneth fastest before. But this manner, or rather this death, came not of thee, I would to God it might Ende in thee. Among these things thou a Pastor goest forward compassed with much and precious array. If I durst say it, these are rather the Pastors of diuell, than of shepe. Forsooth Peter did thus, Paul played thus. Thy court is more accustomed to receive men good than to make them good. For the ill doe not there profit, but the good do decay. Now as for the abuses of appeales that he rehearteth, no godly man can reade them without great horror. At the last he thus concludeth of that vnbridled greediness of the sea of Rome in the usurping of juridiction: I speake the murmur and common complaint of the Churche. They crieth out that they bee mangled and dismembred. There are either none or few that do not either bewail or feare this plague. Askst thou what plague? The Abbots are plucked from the bishops, the bishops from the Archbishops, &c. It is maruellous if this may bee excused. In so doing ye prooue that ye have fulnesse of power, but nor of righteousness. Ye doe this, because ye can do it; but whether ye also ought to doe it, is a question. Ye are set to preserve, not to envie to every man his honour & his owne degree. These fewe things of many I lifted to rehearse, partly that the readers may see, howe sore the Church was then decayed, and partly that they may know in how great sorrow and mourning this calamity held all the godlie.

19 But nowe, albeit that we grant to the Bishop of Rome at this daye that preeminence and largenesse of jurisdiction, which that sea had in the meane times, as in the times of Leo and of Gregorie: what is that to the present state of the Papacie? I doe not yet speake of the earthly dominion, nor of the civil power thereof, which wee will afterward consider in place fit for it: but the verie spirituall governement that they boast of, what hath it like to the state of those times? For they define the Pope none otherwise than the Supreme head of the Church in earth, and the vnierall bishop of the whole worlde. And the bishops themselves, when they speake of their owne authoritie, doe with great stoutnesse of countenance pronounce that to them belongeth the power to commande, and other are bound to the necessitie to obey, that so all their decrees are to be holden as confirmed with the divine voice of Peter: that the provincial Synodes, are without force; because they want the presence of the Pope: that they may order clerks of any Church that they will: and may call them to their seat, that have been ordered else where. Innumerable of that sort are in Gratiani pack; which I do not now rehearse, lest I should be too tedious to my Readers. But this is the summe of them, that only the Bishop of Rome hath the Supreme hearing and determining of all ecclesiastical causes, whether it be in judging and defining of doctrines, or in making of laws, or in establishing of discipline, or in executing of judgements. It were also long and superfluous to rehearse the privileges that they take to themselves in restorations, as they call them. But (which is most intollerable of all other:) they leave no judgement in earth to restraine and bridle their outrageous lust, if they abuse so immeasurable power. It is lawful for no man (say they,) to revoke the judgement of that sea, because of the Supremacie of the Church of Rome. Again, the judge shall be judged neither by the emperor, nor by kings, nor by all the Clergie, nor of the people. That is in deedes too imperiously done, that one man may be himself judge of all men, and suffer himself to obey the judgement of no man. But what if he were an open rogue over the people of God? if he scatter abroad and wast the kingdom of Christ? if he trouble the whole Church? if he turne the office of Pastor into robberie? Yes though he be no more than an open rogue, he is bound to yield and submit. For these are the sayings of the bishops: Gods will was to determine the causae of other men by men, but he hath without question refuted the bishop of this sea to his owne judgement. Again, The doings of subiects are judged of vs but ours of God only.

20 And that such decrees might have the more weight, they have falsely thrust in the names of the old bishops, as though things had been so ordained from the beginning; whereas it is most certaine, that it is newe & lately forged whatsoever the bishop of Rome guilteth himselfe more than wee have rehearsed to be given him by the auncient Councils. Yea, they are come to so great shamelesnesse, that they have set forth a writing under the name of Anastasius Patriarch of Constantinople, wherein he testifieth that it was decreed by the olde rules, that nothing should be done even in the further provinces, that were not first moued to the sea of Rome. Beside this, that it is certaine that this is most vaine, what man shall thinke it likely, that such a commendation of the sea of Rome proceeded from the adueraire and envious of honour and dignitie thereof? But verily it behoved that these Antichristes should be carried on to so great madness and blindness, that their lewdnesse might be displeased for all men to see, at least so many as wil open their eyes. But the deceretall epistles heaped together by Gregorie the ninth, against the Clementines, and Extragants of Marine, doe yet more openly and with fuller mouth eche where breath forth their outrageous scicenesse, and as it were the tyrannie of barbarous kinges. But these be the oracles, by which the Romanists will have their papacie to be weyed. Hereupon arose those notable principles, which at this day haue every where in the papacie the force of oracles: that the Pope cannot err: that the Pope is above the Councils: that the Pope is the vninerrall Bishop of all bishops, and the supreme head of the Church in earth: I passe over the much much abserder follies, which the foolish Canonists babble in their schools to yet the Romish diuines do not only assent, but doe also clap their hands at them, to flatter their idol.

21. I will not deal with them by extremity of right. Some other man would against this their so great insolence set the laying of Cyprian, Which he vsed among the Bishops, at whose counsell he rated as cheefe. None of vs calleth himselfe Bishop of Bishops, or with tyrannous fear compellth his fellowe bishops to necessitie to obey. Hee would object that, which a little afterwarde was decreede at Carthage, That none shoulde bee called Prince, Priest, or cheefe bishop. Hee would gather many testimonies out of Histories, Canons out of Synodes, and many sentences out of the bookes of olde writers. by which the bishop of Rome should be brought downe into the fellowship of the rest. But I passe over all these, least I shoulde seeme too precyty to presse them. But let the best patrones of the sea of Rome answer mee, with what face they dare defende the title of vniverfall Bishop, which they see so oft to bee condemned with curse by Gregorie. If Gregories testimonie ought to bee of force, they doe thereby declare that Antichrist is there bishop, because they make him vniverfall. The name also of heade was no more vsiall. For thus hee sayeth in one place: Peter is the chief member in the bodie, John, Andrew, and Iames the heads of particular peoples: yet they all are members of the Church under one heade: yea the holie ones before the lawe, the holie ones under the lawe, and the holie ones under grace, are set among members, altogether making vp the bodie of the Lorde: and none other willed to have himselfe called vniverfall. But whereas the Bishop of Rome taketh vpom himselfe the power of commaundung, that thing smalliy agreeith with that which Gregories saith in another place. For whereas Eutolius bishop of Alexandria, had saide that hee was commaundd by him, hee answereth in this wise, I pray yee, take away this worde of commanding from my hearing. For I know what I am, and what yee be. In place, yee be to me brethren: in manners yee be to me fathers. Therefore I commanded not, but I cared to tell you those things that I thought profitable. Whereas he so extended his jurisdiction without ende, he dooth there-in great and hainous wrong, not onely to the other bishops, but also to all particular Churches, which he so teareth and plucketh in peeces, that hee may bulke his feate of their ruines. But whereas hee exempteth himselfe from all judgementes, and will so reign after the manner of tyrants, that he accounteth his owne onely lust for lawe, that verily is so hainous, and so farre from ecclesiasticall order, that it may in no wise bee borne: for it verily abhorreth not onely from all feeling of godlineesse, but also from all humanite.

22. But that I be not compelled to go through and examine all things particularly, I doe againe appeale to them, that will at this day be accompaied the best and most faithfull patrones of the sea of Rome, whether they be not ashamed to defende the present state of the Papacie: which it is certain to be an hundred times more corrupt, than it was in the time of Gregorie and Bernard: which state yet did then so muche displeaue those holie men.
men. Gregorie eche where complaineth, that hee is too much diversly drawn away with foraigne busines: that he is under the colour of bishopship brought backe to the world: wherein he suffereth so many cares of the worlde as he never remembred that he served when he was a laie man: that he is pressed downe with tumult of worldly affaires, that his mind is nothing raised up to things above, that he is shaken with many waves of care, & tossed with tempests of troublesome life: so that he may worthily saie, I am come into the depth of the sea. Truely among those earthly busines, he might yet teache the people with sermons, privately admonishe and correct such as it behoved, order the Church, give counsell to his fellow bishops and exhort them to their duties: beside these things there remained some time to write: and yet he lamenteth his calamitie, that he is drowned in the deepest sea. If the government of that time was a fea: what is to bee saide of the papacie at this time? For what likeness have they together? Here be no preachings, no care of discipline, no zeal to the Churches, no spiritual doing, finally nothing but the worlde. Yet this maie is praised, as though there could nothing be founde more orderly and better framed. But what complaints doeth Bernardo poure out, what groanes doth he utter, when he looketh upon the faulures of his age: What then would he doe, if he beheld this our age of iron, and worse if any be worse than iron? What obstinate wickednesse is this, not onely stifly to defend as holy and divine, that which all the holy men have with one mouth condemned: but also to abuse their testimonie to the defence of the papacie, which it is certaine that they never knewe of. Howbeit of Bernardo time I confesse, that then the corruption of all things was so great, that it was not much unlike our time. But they are without all shame, that fetch any pretence for it, out of that meane age, that is the time of Leo, Gregorie, and such other. For they doe like as if one, to stablish the Monarchie of Emperors, would praise the old state of the Empire of Rome: that is, would borrow the praises of libertie, to set forth the honor of tyrannie.

23 Finally, although all these things were graunted them: yet there ariseth of freeth a newe strife for them, when we deny that there is a Church at Rome, in which such benefites may be resident: when we deny that there is a bishop, which may beare these priviliges of dignitie. Admit therefore all those things to be true, (which yet we have already wrung from them) that Peter was by the mouth of Christ appointed head of the universall Church: and that he left: the honour that was given him, in the sea of Rome: that the same was stablished by the authoritie of the auncient Church, and confirmed with long continuance: that the Supreme power hath beene alwaye by one consent given of all men to the bishop of Rome, that he hath beene the judge of all both causes and men, and himselfe subject to the judgement of none: let them have also more, if they will: yet I answere in one worde, that none of these things availe, unless there be at Rome a Church and a bishop. This they must needs graunt me, that it cannot be the mother of Churches, which is not it selfe a Church: that he cannot be chief of bishops, which is not himselfe a bishop. Will they therefore have the sea Apostollike at Rome? Then let them shew me a true and lawfull Apostleship. Will they

They haue the chiefe Bishop? Then let them shewe me a Bishop. But what? Where will they shewe vs any face of a Church? They name one indeede, and haue it oft in their mouth. Truely the Church is known by her certaine markes: and bishoprude is a name of office. I speake not here of the people: but of the government in it selfe, which ought continually to shine in the Church. Where is the ministerie in their Church, such as Christes institution requireth? Let vs call to remembrance that which hath before beene spoken of the office of Priests and of a Bishop. If we wil bring the office of Cardinals to be tried by that rule, wee shall confesse that they are nothing lesse than Priests. As for the chiefe bishop himselfe, I woulde faine knowe what one thing at all he hath bishoprude. First it is the principall point in the office of a bishop, to teach the people with the word of God; another and the next point to that is, to minister the Sacraments: the third is to admonish and exhort, yea and to correct them that offend, and to hold the people together in holy discipline. What of these things doth he? yea, what doth he faigne himselfe to doe? Let them tel therefore, by what meanes they would haue him to be counted a bishop, that doth not with his little finger, no not once so much as in outward shewe, touch any parte of a bishops office.

24 It is not so of a bishop as it is of a king. For a king although he do not execute that which belongeth to a king, doth nevertheless retaine the honor and title. But in judging of a bishop respect is had to Christes commandement, which alway ought to be of force in the Church. Therefore let the Romanists loose me this knot. I deny that their high bishop is the chiefe of bishops, forasmuch as he is no bishop. They must needs prove this last point to be false, if they will haue the victorie in the first. But how faie they to this, that he not onely hath no propertie of a bishop, but rather all things contrarie? But here, O God, whereat shall I beginne? at his learning, or at his maner? What shall I faie, or what shall I leave vnfaide? where shall I make an ende? This I faie: that whereas the world is at this day, shuddered with so many peruerse and wicked doctrines, full of so manie kindes of superstitions, blinded with so many errors drowned in so great idolatry there is none of these any where, that hath not either flowed from thence, or at least beeene there confirmed. Neither is there anie other cause, why the bishops are carried with so great rage against the doctrine of the Gospel newly springing vp againe, why they bende all their strengthes to oppresse it, why they kindle vp kings and princes to crueltie, but because they see that their whole kingdome decayeth and falleth downe, so soone as the Gospel of Christ commeth in place. Moreover, if I should write, Clement was bloudie: Paul is a fierce murtherer. But nature hath not so much moued them to fight agaist the truth, as for that this was their oneliemeane to maintaine their power. Therefore sith they cannot be saue, till they have driven away Christ, they travaile in this cause, as if they did fight for their religion and countries, & for their owne liues. What then? Shall that bee to vs the sea Apostolike, where we see nothing but horrible Apostasie? Shall he be Christes vicar, which by persecuting the Gospel with furious enterprizes, doth openly professe himselfe to be Antichrist? Shall he bee Peters successeur, that rangeth with sword. swordes and fire, to destroy all that ever Peter hath builded; Shal he be head of the church that cutting off and dismembering the church from Christ the only true head thereof, doth in it selfe plucke and tearre it in peeces. Admit verely that in the olde time Rome was the mother of all Churches: yet since it hath beginnne to be the seat of Antichrist, it hath ceased to be which it was.

25 We seeme to be to much euil speakers and railers, when we call the bishop of Rome Antichrist. But they that so thinke, do not understand that they accuse Paul of immodestie, after whom we so speake, yea out of whose mouth we so speake. And least any man object, that we do wrongfully wrate against the bishoppe of Rome, those wordes of Paul that are spoken to an other entent, I will briefly shewe, that they can not be otherwise understand, but of the Papacie. Paul writeth, that Antichrist shall sitte in the temple of God. In an other place also the holy Ghost describing his image in the person of Antiochus, sheweth that his kingdom shall consist in hauotions of speech, and blaspheminges of God. Hereupon we gather, that it is rather a tyranny over soules, than over bodies, that is raised vp against the spirituall kingdom of Christ. Then, that it is such, as doeth not abolish the name of Christ and the Church: but rather should abuse the pretence of Christ, and Luke under the title of the Church, as under a disguised visour. But although all the heresies and sects that haue ben from the beginning, belong to the kingdom of Antichrist: yet whereas Paul prophesieth, that there shall come a departing, by this description he signifieth, that that seate of abomination shall then be raised vp, when a certaine vniuersall departing shall possesse the Church: howsoever many members of the Church here and there continue in the true vnitie of faith. But where he addeth, that in his time he began in a mysterie to set vp the worke of iniquitie, which he would afterward shewe openly: whereby we understand, that this calamity was neither to be brought in by one man, nor to be ended in one man. Now whereas he doth set out Antichrist by this marke, he should plucke away from God his due honor, to take it to him selfe: this is the chiefe token that we ought to follow in seeking out of Antichrist, specially where such pride proceeded even to the publike dissipation of the church. Sith therefore it is certaine, the bishop of Rome hath shamelessly conveyed away to him selfe that which was the chiefe proper thing to God alone and Christ, it is not to be doubted but that he is the captaine and standard bearer of the wicked & abominable kingdom.

26 Now let the Romanists go, & object antiquitie against vs: As if in so great alteration of all things, the honor of the sea might stand when there is no sea. Eusebius telleth, how GOD, that there might be place for his vengeance, remoued the Church that was at Hierusalem to Pella. That which we heare to have beene once done, might be often done. Therefore so to binde the honor of supemacie to a place, that hee which is in deede the most hatefull enemie of Christe, the highest aduersarie of the Gospell, the greatest waster and destroyer of the Church, the most cruel slaughterman and butcher of the saints, should never the leesfe be accounted the vicer of Christ, the successor of Peter, the chiefe bishop of the Church, only because hee he occupieth the sea that was once the chiefest of all: that verily is to much to be scorned & foolish. I speake not, how great difference there is between the popes chauncery, and a well framed order of the Church. Howbeit this one thing may well take away all doubt of this question. For no man hath his right wit, will think the bishoprike enclosed in lead & bulles, much lesse in that schoole of fraudues and deceites, in which things the Popes spirituall government confisith. Therefore it was very well said by a certaine man, that that church of Rome which is boisted of, is long ago turned into a court, which only is now fene at Rome. Neither do I here accuse the faults of men: but I thewe that the papacie it selfe is directly contrary to the true order of a Church.

27 But if we come to the persons of men, it is well enough knowe what manner of vicars of Christ we shall finde. Julius forsooth, and Leo, & Clement and Paul, shalbe pillars of the christian faith, & the chiefe expostors of religion, which never knew any other thing of Christ, than that which he had learned in Lucian schoole. But why do I reckon vp three or foure Popes, as though it were doutful, what manner of forme of religion the popes with their whole college of Cardinals haue since long agoe professed, and at this day do profess? For first this is the principal article of that secret Divinitie that reigneth among them, That there is no God: the seconde, That all things that are written and taught concerning Christ, are lies & deceites: the thirde, That the doctrine of the life to come, and of the last resurrection are meere fables, They do not all thinke so: and fewe of them speake so. I grant, But this hath long ago begun to be the ordinary religio of popes. Whereas this is very well knowne to all that knowe Rome, yet the Romische Divinies cease not to boft, that by Christies privilege it is provided, that the pope can not erre, because it was saide to Peter: I haue prayed for thee, that thy faith should not faile. What, I pray you, win they by mocking so shamelessly, but that the whole world may understand, that they are come to that extremitie of wickednesse, that they neither feare God, nor stand in awe of men?

28 But let vs imagine, that the vngodlines of those popes whom I haue spoke of, is hidden, because they haue neither published it by preaching, nor by writings: but only haue bewraied it at their table, and in their chamber, or at least within wales of houses. But if they wil haue this privilege to bee of force, which they pretende, they must needs wipe John the xxii. out of the number of popes, who openly affirmed that soules are mortal, and that they die together with the bodies untill the day of resurrection, & that you may perceive that the whole sea with her principal stayes was then wholly fallen: none of all the Cardinals withstood so great a madnesse, but the schoole of Paris moued the king of France to compell him to recante it. The king forbad his subiectes to communicat with him, unlesse he did out of hand repent: and the same, as the manner is, he proclaimed by a herald. The Pope compelled by this necessitie, abjured his error. This example maketh y I neede not to dispute any more with my adversaries about this that they say, that the sea of Rome & the bishops therof, can not erre in the faith, because it was saide to Peter, I haue prayed for thee, that thy faith may may not faint. Truely, hee fell with so foule a kinde of fall from the right faith, that he is a notable example to them that come after, that they are not all Peters which succeede after Peter in the bythopricke. Howbeit this is also of itselfe so childish, that it needeth no answere. For if they will drawe to Peters succedors whatsoever was spoken to Peter, it shall followe that they are all Satans, forasmuch as the Lorde saide this also to Peter: Go behind, thou Satan, because thou art an offence to me. For it shall be as easy for vs to turne backe this latter saying against them, as it shall be for them to obie with the other against vs.

29 But I lift not to strive with them in playing the foole. Therefore I returne thither from whence I made digression. So to binde the place, and Christ, and the holy Ghoste, and the Church together, that whosoever sit in that place, although he be the devill, yet he must be judged an vicar of Christ and the head of the Church, because it was once the seat of Peter: I say this is not only wicked and slanderous to Christe, but also too greate an absurditie and against common reason. It is alreadie long ago since the byshops of Rome are either without all religion, or the greatest enemies of Religion. Therefore they are no more made the vicars of Christ, by reason of their leace which they occupy, than an idoll, when it is set in the temple of God, is to be taken for God. Now if their manners be to be indiged vpon, let the Popes themselves answere for themselves: what one thing at all there is in them, where in they may be knonne for byshops. First, whereas there is such life at Rome, they not onely winking at it, but also as it were with certeaine countenance allowing it, this is verily vnmeet for byshops, whose dutie is with severitie of discipline to restraigne the licentiousnesse of the people. But I will not be so rigorous against them, to charge them with other mens faults. But whereas they themselves, with their owne houeshold, with almost the whole college of Cardinals, with the whole flock of their clergie, are so given forto all wickednesse, filthinesse, venemenesse, to all kindes of lewde & mischievous doings, that they resemble rather monsters than men: thereon truely they bewray themselves to be nothing lesse than byshops. And yet they need not to feare least I should further disclofe their filthinesse. For both I am wriuen to hauie to doe in so stinking mire, and I must saue all chaste cares, & I think that I haue already enough and more proued that which I went about: that is, that although Rome had in olde time beene the heade of Churches, yet at this day she is not worthy to be judged one of the smalles toes of the Churches fette.

30 As concerning the Cardinals, (as they call them) I can not tell howe it is come to passe, that they be so souenely risen vp to so great dignitie. This name in Gregories time belonged to byshops onely. For so oft as hee make the mention of Cardinals, hee meane that not of them of the Church of Rome, but of any other; so brely, a Cardinal Priest is nothing else but a byshop. In the wriuers before that age I find not this name at all. But I see that they were then lesse than byshops; where they be nowe faire above. This saying of Augustine is well knowne: Although according to the names of honour, which the vse of the church hath alreadie obtained, byshoprick is greater than priesthood, yet in many things Augustine is lesse than Hierome.
Cap. 7. Of the outwarte meanes

Heere indeede hee maketh difference between a Priest of the Church of Rome and other: but he indifferently setteth them all behind by the byhoppes. And that was so longe obserued, that in the Councell at Carthage, when there were present two Legates of the Sea of Rome, the one a byhop, the other a Priest, the priest was thrust backe into the last place. But not to followe too olde examples, there remaineth a Councell holden vnder Gregory at Rome at which the Priests sate in the lowest place, & subscibed seuerally by themselves, as for the Deacons, they had no place at all in subscribing. And truly they had then no office, but to be present vnder the bishop at ministring of doctrine & of the sacraments. Now the case is so changed, that they are become the cousins of kings & emperors. And it is no doubt but y they grew vp by little and little together with their head, till they were advanced to this high top of dignity. But this also I thought good to touch shortly by the way that the readers might the better understand, that the Sea of Rome, such as it is at this day, doth much differ from that auncient one, vnder pretence whereof, it doth now maintaine and defend it selfe. But of what sort fouer they were in olde time, forasmuch as they haue nowe nothing of the true & lawfull office in the Church, they retaine onely a deceitfull colour & vaine visor: yea forasmuch as they haue all things utterly contrarie, it was necessarie that so should happen to them, which Gregorie writeth so oft. I say it (faith he) weeping: I giue warning of it, groaning: that sith the order of priesthood is fallen within, it shall also not be able to stand long without. But rather it behoved that this should be fulfilled in them which Malachie sayth of such: Ye haue gone backe out of the way, & haue made manie to stumble in the law. Therefore ye haue made void the couenant of Lemu, faith the Lorde. Therefore behold, I haue giuen you out of estimation, and vile to all the people. Now I leaue it to all the godly to thinke of what soever is that supreme height of the Hierarchie of Rome, whereunto the Papistes with abominable shamelesnesse sticke not to make subject the verie word of God, which ought to haue beene honourable and holie both to heauen and earth, men and Angels.

The viii. Chapter.

Of the power of the Church as touching the articles of faith: and with howe unbridled licentiousnesse hath in the papacy beene vnormed to corrupt all partes of doctrine.

As caution touching things spoken of the power of the Church.

Nowe followeth the thirde place of the power of the Church, which partlie consisteth in all the byshopes, and partly in the Councellles, and those either provincial or generall. I speake onelie of the spirittual power, which is proper to the Church. That consisteth either in doctrine, or in jurisdiction, or in making of Lawes, Doctrine hath two partes, the authoritative to teache articles of Doctrine, and the expounding of them. Before that wee beginne to discourse of euerie one of these in specialtie, we will that the godly Readers be warned, that whatsoever is taught concerning the power of the Church, they must remember to applie it to that ende, whereunto (as Paul teftifieth) it was giuen: that is, to edification, and not

The power of prophets consisted in delivering that which God had given them in charge.

Ezek. 3:17.

What manner of power the prophets generally had, is very well described in Ezekiel: Thou sonne of man (faith the Lord) I have given thee to be a watchman to the house of Israel. Therefore thou shalt hear the word out of my mouth, and thou shalt declare it to them from me. He that is commanded to hear out of the mouth of the Lord, is not forbidden to invent any thing of himself: But what is to declare from the Lord, but so to speake as he may boldly boast, that it is not his owne but the Lords word he to destruction: Which who so lawfully ye, they thinke themselves no more than the ministers of Christ, and therewithal the ministers of the people in Christ. Nowe of the building of the Church, this is the only way, if the ministers themselves endeavoure to preserue to Christ his authority, which can not otherwise be safe unless that be left vnto him, which he receiued of his Father: that is, that he be the only schoolemaster of the Church. For it is written, not of any other, but of him alone, Hearke him. The power of the Church therefore is not to be parlingly set forth, but yet to be enclosed within certaine boundes, that it be not drawn hither & thither after the lust of men. Hereunto it shall be much profitable to note, howe it is described of the Prophetes and Apostles. For if wee simply graunte vnto men such power as they lift to take vppon them, it is plaine to all men, what a slippetie readinesse there is to fall into tyranny, which ought to be far from the Church of Christ.

Therefore here it must be remembered, that whatsoever authority or dignities the holy Ghost in the scripture giveth either to the pricestes or to the Prophetes, or to the Apostles, or to the succesours of the Apostles, al that same is giuen, not properly to the men themselves, but to the ministerie ouer which they are appointed, or (to speake it more plainly in one worde) whereof the ministerie is committed to them. For if we goe through them all in order, we shall not find that they had any authority to teach or to answer, but in the name and worde of the Lorde. For when they are called to the office, it is also enioyed them, that they should bring nothing of themselves, but speake out of the mouth of the Lord. And he himselfe dooth not bring them forth to be heard of any people, before he haue giuen the instruction what they ought to speake, to the intent that they shoulde speake no thing beside his word. Mosell himself, the prince of all the prophetes, was to be heard above the rest: but he was first instructed with his commandements, that he might not declare any thing at all, but from the Lord. Therefore it is said, that the people when they embraced his doctrine, beleued in God, and in his seruant Moses. Also the authority of the pricestes should not growe in con- cepcie, it was stablised with most grievous penalties. But therewithall, the Lorde sheweth vp the 6 edition they were to be heard, when he faith he hath now made his counsell with Levi, the law of truth should be in his mouth. And a little after he addeth: The lips of the pricest shall kepe knowledge, & they shall require the law at his mouth: because he is the angel of the God of hosts. Therefore if the pricest will be heard, let him shew himselfe the messenger of God: ye is, let him faithfully report the commandements that he receiued of his author. And where it is specially entreated of the hearing of them, this is expressly set, That they may answer according to the law of God.

What manner of power the pricestes generally had, is very well described in lift: Thou sonne of man (faith the Lord) I have giuen thee to be a watchman to the house of Israel. Therefore thou shalt hear the word out of my mouth, and thou shalt declare it to them from me. He that is commanded to hear out of the mouth of the Lord, is not forbidden to invent any thing of himself: But what is to declare from the Lord, but so to speake as he may boldly boast, that it is not his owne, but the Lords word he he hath brought: the self same thing is in Hieremias, in other words. Let the prophet (faith he) with whom is a dream, tel a dream: & let him that liath my word speak my word true. Certainly he appointeth a law to the all. And that is such, that he permiteth not any to teach more than he is commanded. And after he calleth it chaffe, all that is not come from himself only. Therefore none of the prophets themselves opened his mouth, but as the Lord told him the wordes before. Whereupon these sayinges are so oft found among them: the worde of the Lord, the burden of the Lord, so faith the Lord, the mouth of the Lord hath spoken. And worthy. For Epsy cryed out that he had defiled lips. Hieremias confesseth that he could not speak, because he was a childe: What could proceede from the defiled mouth of the one, and the foolish mouth of the other, but vnceleane vnwise, if they had spoken their owne speech? But his lips were holy & pure, when they bega to be the instruments of the holy Ghost. When the Prophets are bound with this religion, that they deliuer nothing, but that which they haue receyued, then they be garnished with notable power and excellent titles. For when the Lord testifieth, that he hath set them over nations and kingdomes, to plucke vp and to roote out, to destroy and plucke downe, to builde and to plant, he by and by adioyneth the cause: because he hath put his wordes in their mouth.

ministerie of teaching, prescribed by his own example to all ministers, what rule they ought to follow in teaching. Therefore the power of the church is not infinite, but subject to the word of the Lord, & as it were enclosed in it.
But with this hath from the beginning ben of force in the church, & at this day ought to be in force, that the seruants of God should teach nothing which they haue not learned of him: yet according to the diversity of times they haue diverse orders of learning. But that order which is now, much dif-fereth from those that were before. First if it be true which Christ faith, that none hath scene the Father, but the Sonne, & he to whom it hath pleased the sone to shew him, it beclouded verely that they shoulde bee alway directed by the eternal wisdom of the father, which would come to the knowldg of God. For how should they either haue comprehened in mind, or vuttered the mysteries of God, but by his teaching, to whom alone the secretes of the
the Father are open? Therefore the holy fathers in old time knew God no other wise but beholding him in the Son as in a glasse: Where I say this, I mean that God did neither by any other mean disclose him selfe to men, but by the Son, that is, his only wisdom, light & truth. Out of this fountain did Adam, Noe, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the other draw all the knowledge that they had of heavenly doctrine. Out of the same fountain have also all the Prophets themselves drawn all the heavenly Oracles that they uttered. For verily this wisdom hath alway disclosed it self by more wayes than one. To the Patriarches he vlied secret revelations: but therewithal to confirm their minds, hee adioyned such signes, y it could not be doubfull to them, that it was God that spake. The Patriarches contended ouer from hande to hand to posterity, y which they had received. For the Lorde left it with them to this entend, that they should so spread it abroad. But the children and childrens children, by God secretly informing them, did knowe that that which they heard was from heauen, and not from the earth.

6 But when it pleased God, to raise a more apparant forme of a Church he willed to haue his worde put in writing and noted, that the priests should fetch from thence what they might deliuer to the people, & that all the doctrine that should be taught should be tried by that rule. Therefore after the publishing of the lawe, when the priests are commanded to teach out of the mouth of the Lorde, the meaning is, that they should teach nothing strange or differing from that kind of learning which the Lorde comprehended in the lawe: and to adde and diminish was vnlawfull for them. Then followed the Prophets, by whom in deede the Lord published new oracles to be added to the lawe: but yet not so new, but that they came out of the Law, & had respect vnto it: For, as touching doctrine, they were onely expostors of the law, & added nothing vnto it, but prophecies of things to come. Tho' excepted, they uttered nothing els but a pure exposition of the law. Because it pleased the Lorde that there should be a plainer and larger doctrine, y weake consciences might be the better satisfi'd: he commanded that the Prophecies also should be put in writing, & accounted part of his worde. And hereunto were added the histories, which are also the works of the Prophets, but made by the ending of the holy ghost. I reck'n the Psalmes among the Prophecies: because that which we attribute to the prophecies is also common to the psalmes. Therefore that whole body compactit of the law, prophecies, psalmes & histories, was the word of the Lord to the old people, by the rule whereof the priests and teachers euen vnto Christes time were bound to examine their doctrine: neither was it lawfull for them to swarue either to the right hande or to the left: because all their office was enclosed within these bounds, that they should answere the people out of the mouth of God. Which is gathered of a notable place of Malachie, where he biddeth them to be mindfull of the law, & to glue heed to it, euen to the preaching of the gospel. For thereby he forbiddeth them all new found doctrines, and granteth them no leave to swarue neuer so little out of the way which Moses had faithfully shewed them. And this is the reason why David so honourably setteth out the excellencie of the lawe, and rehearseth so many prais'es of it: that is, that Jews should count no forein thing without it, sith within in it was was all perfection enclosed.

7 But when at last the wisdom of God was openly shewed in the flesh, that same wisdom with full mouth declared vnto vs at that euer cæ with more wit be comprehended, or ought to be thought concerning the heavenly Father. Now therefore since Christ the sonne of righteousness hath shined, wee have a perfect brightness of the truth of God, such as the clearenes is wont to be at mid-day, when the light was before but dimme. For verily the Prophet meant not to speake of any mean thing, when he wrote that GOD in old time spake diversely and many ways to the fathers by the Prophets; but that in these last days he began to speake to vs by his beloved Son. For he signifieth, yea he openly declareth, that God will not hereafter, as hee did before, speake somtime by one, and somtime by other, nor wil addie Prophecies to Prophecies, or revelations to revelations; but that he hath so fulfilled all the parres of teaching in the Sonne, that they must haue this of him for the last and eternall testimony. After which force all this time of the newe Testament where in Christe hath appeared to vs with the preaching of his gospel even to y day of judgement, as expresst by the last hour, the last times the last days to the ende verily that contented with the perfection of the doctrine of Christ, we shoulde learne neither to saine vs any newe beside it, or receive it fained of other. Therefore not without cause the Father hath by singular prerogat Hebrews 1.1.0. made the Sonne to be our teacher: communding him, and, nor any man, to be heard. He did in deed in fewe wordes fet out his schoolemasterhip vnto vs, when he sayde, Heare him: but in which there is more weight & force then men commonly think. For it is as much in effect, as if leading vs away from al docrines of men, he should bring vs to him only, and commund vs to looke for all the doctrine of salvation at himself alone, to hang vpon him alone, to cleave to him alone, finally (as the very wordes do sound) to harken to the voice of him alone. And truly what ought there nowe to be either looked for or desired at the hande of man, when the very wordes of life hath familiarly and openly disclosed himselfe vnto vs? Yea but it is meeke that the mouthes of all men be shut, after that he, in whom the heavenly Father willed to haue all the treasures of knowledge & wisdom to be hidden, hath once spoken, and so spoken as became both the wisdom of God (which is in no part vnperfect) and Messiah at whose hand the revelation of all thinges is hoped for: that is to say, that he left nothing afterwarde for other to be spoken.

8 Let this therefore be a stedfast principle: y there is to be had no other word of God, wherunto place should be given in the church, than that which is contained first in the lawe and the prophets, and then in the writings of the Apostles: & that there is no other maner of teaching rightly, but according to the prescription and rule of that worde. Hereupon alle we gather, that there was no other thing graunted to the Apostles, but that which the prophets had had in olde time: that is, that they should expounde the olde Scripture, and shewe that those things that are therein taught are fulfilled in Christ: and yet that they should not doe the same but of the Lorde, that is to say, the spirit of Christ going before them, and after a certaine maner enditing wordes vnto them. For Christ limited their embassage with this condition. condition when he commanded them to goe and teach, not such things as they themselves had rashly forg'd, but all those things that he had commanded them, and nothing could be more plainly spoken, than that which he faith in another place: but be not ye called maisters, for onely one is your maister, Christ. Then, to imprint this more deeply in their mind, he repeated it twice in the same place. And because their rudeness was such, that they could not conceive those things that they had heard and learned of the mouth of their maisters, therefore the spirit of truth is promised them by whom they should be directed to the true understanding of all things. For that same restraining is to be diligently noted, where this office is assign'd to the holy Ghost, to put them in minde of all those things that hee before taught them by mouth.

9 Therefore Peter who was verie well taught how much hee might lawfully doe, learnt nothing either to himselfe or other, but to distribute the doctrine delivred of God. Let him that speaketh (saith hee) speake as the wordes of God, that is to say, not doubtingly, as they are wont to tremble whole own conscience misguided them, but with sure confidence, which becommeth the seruant of God furnished with assured instructions. What other thing is this, but to forbid all inventions of mans mind, from what head soever they have proceeded, that the pure word of God may be heard and learned in the Church of the faithful; to take away the ordinaces or rather the fainest devises of al men, of what degree soever they be, that the decrees of God only may remaine in force? These be those spirituall armures, mightie through God to cast downe hould by which the faithful seruants of God may throw downe counsels, and all height that aduancceth itselfe against the knowledge of God, & may leade all knowledge captive to obey Christ.

Loo this is the soueraigne power, wherewith it behoueth the Pastors of the Church to be endued, by what name soever they bee called, that is, that by the worde of God they may with confidence be bolde to do all things: may compell all the strength, glorie, wisedome and height of the world to yeeld and obey to his maestie: being vp holden by his power, may commande all eu'n from the highest to the lowest: may build up the house of Christ & pull down the house of Satan: may feede the sheepe & drive away the wolves: may instruct and exhort the willing to learn: may reprooue, rebuke & subdue the rebellious & stubborn: may binde, and loose: finally may thunder & enlighten, if neede be; but all things in the word of God. Howbeit there is, as I have said, this difference between the Apostles and their successors, that the Apostles were the certaine & authentike secretaries of the holy Ghost, and therefore their writings are to be esteemed for the Oracles of God: but the other have none other office, but to teach that which is set forth & written in the holy Scriptures. We determine therefore, that this is now not left to faithfull ministers, that they may coinc any new doctrine, but that they ought simply to cleave to the doctrine, whereunto the Lord hath made all men without exception subject. When I say this, my meaning is not onely to shewe what is lawful for all particular men, but also what is lawfull for the whole universall Church. Now as touching all particular men: Paul verily was ordained by the Lorde Apostle to the Corinthians: but hee denieth that hee hath

Of thour outward dominion over their faith. Who now dare take a dominion upon himselfe, which Paul testifieth that it belonged not to him? If he had acknowledged himselfe to have this libertie of teaching, that whatsoever the Pastor teache, he may therein of right require to be beleaued: he would never have taught the Corinthians this discipliné, that while two or three Propheters speake, the rest should judge, & if it were revealed to any that same, the first should hold his peace. For so he sp are none, whose authoritie he made not subject to the judgement of the word of God. But, wille some man say, of the whole vniuerse Church the cafe is otherwise. I answere that in an other place Paul meeteth with this doubt also, where he saith, that Faith is by hearing, & hearing by the worde of God. Truely, if Faith hang of the worde of God only, hath respect unto & resteth upon it alone, what place is there now left to the word of the whole world? For herein no man may doubt that hath well known what faith is. For Faith ought to be staid upon such assurance, whereby it may stand invincible against Satan, & all the engines of the hell, & against the whole world. This assurance we shall no where finde, but in the only word of God. Again, it is a generall rule which we here ought to have respect unto: that God doth therefore take from men the power to set forth a new doctrine, that he only may be our scholemaster in heavenly learning, as he only is true which can neither ly nor deceive. This rule becometh no lesse to the whole Church then to every one of the faithful, 10 But if this power of the Church, which wee haue spoken of, be compared with that power, whereof the spiritual tyrants, that haue falsely called themselves Bishops and Prelates of Religion, haue in certaine ages past boasted themselves among the people of God, the agreement shall be no better than Christ hath with Belial. Yet it is not in this place my purpose to declare in what sort & with how wicked meanes they have exercised their tyranny: I will but rehearse the doctrine, which at this day they defende, first with writings, and then with sword and fire. Because they take it for a thing confessed, that a generall Counsell is the true image of the Church, when they haue taken this principle, they do without doubt determine, that such counsellers are immediately governned of the holy ghost, & that therefore they cannot erre. But whereas they themselves do rule the counsellors, yea & make them, they doe in deede chalenge to themselues whatsoever they affirm to be due to the Counsellors. Therefore they will haue our faith to stand & fall at their will, that whatsoever they shall determine on the one side or the other, may be established & certaine to our mindes: so that if they allowe any thing we must allowe the same without doubting: if they condemn any thing wee must also hold it for condemned. In the meanes time after their owne lust, & despising the word of God, they coin doctrine, to which afterward they require by this rule to haue faith giuen. For they also say that he is no Christian, that doth not certainly consent to all their doctines as well affirmatiue as negative: if not with expressed yet with vnexpressed faith: because it is in the power of the Church, to make newe articles of the Faith.

11 First let vs heare by what argumentes they prove, that this authoritie is giuen to the Church: and then we shall see how much that maketh for them which they alllege of the Church. The Church (say they) hath no table promisethat it shall never be forsaken of Christ her spouse, but that it shallbe guided by his spirit into all truth. But of the promises which they are wont to allude to, many are giuen no lesse to every one of the faithful particularly, than to the whole Church universally. For though the Lord spake to the twelve Apostles, when he said: Behold I am with you even to the end of the world: Again, I will ask my Father, and he shall giue you an other comforter, namely the Spirit of truth, yet he made the promise not only to the whole number of the twelve, but also to every one of them: yea to the other disciples likewise, either those that he had already received, or those who should afterward be added to them. But when they expound such promises full of singular comfort, as though they were giuen to none of the Christians, but to the whole Church together: what do they else, but take away from all Christians that confidence which they alought to receive thereby to encourage them? Yet I do not here deny, but that the whole fellowship of the faithful furnished with manifold diversifie of gifts, is endued with much larger & more plentiful treasure of the heavenly wisdom, than eche one seuerely; neither is it, in my meaning, that this is spoken in common to the faithful, as though they were all alike endued with the Spirit of understanding & doctrine; but because it is not to be granted, to the aduersaries of Christ, that they should for defence of an evil cause wrest the scripture to a wrong sense. But, omitting this, I simply confeffe that which is true, that the Lord doth perpetually present with his Spirit, and that this Spirit is not the Spirit of error, ignorance, lying or darkness: but of sure revelation, wisdom, truth, & light, of which they not deceitfully may learn those things that are giuen them, that is to say, what is the hope of their calling, and what be the riches of the glory of the inheritance of God in the Saints. But whereas the faithful, even they that are endued with more excellent gifts above the rest, doe in this flesh receive only the first fruits and a certaine taste of that Spirit, there remaineth nothing better to them than knowing their owne weaknesses, to hold themselves carefully within the bounds of the word of God: least if they wander far after their own sense, they by & by stray out of the right way, insomuch as they be yet voice of that spirir, by whose only teaching, truth is discerned from falsehood. For all men doe confeffe with Paul, that they have not yet attained to the marke. Therefore they more endeavoure to daily profiting, than glory of perfection.

12 But they will take exception, & say that whatsoever is particularly attributed to every one of the holy ones, the same doth throughly and fully belong to the Church itself. Although this hath some seeming of truth, yet I deny it to be true. God doth indeed so distribute to every one of the members the gift of his spirit by measure, that the whole body wanteth nothing necessary, when the gifts are giuen in common. But the riches of the Church are alway such, that there ever wanteth much of that highest perfection, which our adversaries doboast of. Yet the church is not therefore to left destitute in any behalf, but that the alway hath so much as is enough. For the Lord knoweth what his necessity requireth. But, to holde her under humility and godly modestie, he giuet her no more than he knoweth to be expedient. expedient. I know what here alo they are wont to object, that is, that the church is cleansed with the washing of water in the word of life, that it might be without wrinkle & spot, & that therefore in an other place it is called the piller and stay of truth. But in the first of these two places is rather taught, what Christ daily worketh in it, than what he hath already done. For if he daily sanctifieth, purgeth, polisheth, wipeth from spots all them that be his: truly it is certain that they are yet besprinkled with some spots & wrinkles, and that there wanteth somewhat of their sanctification. But howe vain & fabulous is it, to judge the Church already in every part holy and spotlesse, wherof all the members are spotty & very vnclene? It is true therefore that the Church is sanctified of Christ. But only the beginning of that sanctifying is here seene: but the end and full accomplisment shalbe, when Christ the holiest of holy ones shall truly and fully fit it with his holiness. It is true also that the spots and wrinkles of it are wipe away: but so that they be daily in wiping away, until Christ with his comming doth utterly take away all that remaineth. For vnlesse we graunt this, we must of necessitie affirm with the Pelagians, that the righteousnesse of the faithfull is perfect in this life: and with the Cathani and Donatists we must suffer no incontinence in the Church.
The other place, as we have else where seene, hath a senfe vitterly differing from that which they pretende. For when Paul hath instructed Timothee, and framed him to the true office of a Bishopp, he sayeth that he did it to this purpose, that hee should knowe howe he ought to behaue himselfe in the Church. And that he should with the greater religiousnes and endeuor rende himselfe thereunto, he addeth that the Church is the very piller and stone of truth. For what else doe these words meane, but that the truth of God is preserved in the Church, namely by the ministerie of preaching? As in another place he teacheth, y Christ gave Apostles, Pastors, & Teachers, that we should no more be carried about with every winde of doctrine, or be mocked of men: but that being enlightened with the true knowledge of the Sonne of God, we should altogether meete in vnitie of Faith. Whereas therefore the truth is not extinguished in the worlde, but remaineth safe, that same commeth to passe because it hath the Church a faithfull keeper of it, by whose helpe and ministery it is sustaine. But if this keping stendeeth in the ministery of the Prophets & Apostles, it foloweth that it hangeth whol-lly hereupon, if the word of the Lord be faithfully preserved and doe keepe his puritie.

13 But that the readers may better understande, vpon what point this question chiefly stadeeth, I wil in few words declare what our adversaries require, and wherein we stand against them. Where they say that the Church can not erre, it tendeth hereunto, and thus they expound it, that forasmuch as it is governed by the spirit of God, it may go safely without the word: that whithersoever it goeth, it can not thinke nor speake any thing but truth; that therefore if it determine any thing without or beside Gods worde, the same is no otherwise to be esteemed than as a certaine oracle of God.
If we graunt that first point, that the Churche can not erre in things necessarie to saluation, this is our meaning, that this is therefore because forsaking all her owne wisedome, she suffereth herselfe to be taught of the holy Ghost
Ghost by the worde of God. This therefore is the difference. They set the authority of the Church without the worde of God, but wee will that it be annexed to the worde, & suffer it not to be seuered from it. And what marvell is it, if the spouse and schole of Christ be subie in to her husbande and scholemaster, that she continually & earnestly hangeth of his mouth? For this is the order of a well governed house, that the wife should obey the authortie of the husband: and this is the rule of a well ordered schole: that the teaching of the scholemaster alone should there be heard. Wherefore let the Church not be wife of her selfe, nor thinke any thing of her selfe: but determine the end of her wise and where he hath made an end of speaking. After this manner she shall also distrust all the inventions of her owne reason: but in those things wherein it standeth upon the worde of God, she shall waue with no distrustfulness or doubting, but that rest with great assuredness & sedfast constancie. So also trusting upon the largeness of those promises, that shee hath, shee shall haue whereupon abundantly to sustaine her faith: that she may nothing doubt that the best guide of the right way, the holy spirit, is alway present with her: but therewithal she shall keepe in memory what the Lord would haue vs to receive of his holy spirit. The spirit (faith he) which I will send from my father shall lead you into all truth. But how? because (faith he) he shall put you in mind of all those things that I haue told you. Therefore he giues warning that there is nothing more to be looked for of this spirit, but that he should enlighten our minde to perceiue the trueth of his doctrine. Therefore Chrysostome faith excellently well. Manie (faith he) do boast of the holy spirit: but they which speake their owne doe fallly pretend that they haue him. As Christ testifie that he spake not of himselfe: because he spake out of the law & the Prophets: so if any thing besides the Gospel be thrust in under the title of the spirit, let vs not beleue it, because as Christ is the fulfilling of the law & the Prophets: so is the spirit of the Gospel. These be his words. Now it is easie to gather how wrongfully our adversaries do, which boast of the holy Ghost to no other end but to set forth under his name strange and foraine doctrines from the word of God, whereas he will with unspeakable knot be conioyned with the word of God, and the same doeth Christ proffe of him when he promiseth him to his Church. So is it truely. What sobrietic the Lord hath once prescribed to his Church, the same he will have to be perpetually kept. But he hath forbidden her, that she should not adde any thing to his word, nor take any thing from it. This is the inviolable decree of God & of the holy Ghost, which our adversaries go about to abrogate, when they faie that the Church is ruled of the spirit without the word.

14. Here againe they murmuure against vs, and say that it behooved that the Church should adde some things to the writings of the Apostles, or that they themeselves shoule afterwarde with lively voice supply many things which they had not cleeely enough taught, namely sith Christ saide into them. I haue many things to be saide to you, which you cannot now beare, and that these be the ordinances, which without the scripture haue beene received onely in vs, and manner. But what shamelesnesse is this? I gravet the disciples were yet rude, and in a manner vnapt to learne, when the Lord saide
said this vnto them. But were they then also holde in with such dulnes, when they did put their doctrine in writing, that they afterward needed to supply with liuely voice that they had by fault of ignorance omitted in their writings? But if they were alreadie led by the spirit of trueth into all trueth when they did set forth their writings: what hindered that they have not therein contained and left written a perfect knowledge of the doctrine of the gospel? But go to, let vs grant them that which they require. One ly let them point out what be those things that is behoved to be revealed without writing. If they dare enterprice that, I wil affall them with Augustines words: that is, When the Lord had said nothing of them, which of vs dare say, these they be or those they be? or if any dare say so, whereby doth he prove it? But why do I strive about a superfluous matter? For a verie child doth knowe, that in the writings of the Apostles, which these men do make in a manner lame and but halfe perfect, there is the fruit of that revelation which the Lord did then promise them.

15 What? say they, did not Christ put out of controversie whatsoever the Church teacheth & decreeth, when he commandeth him to be taken for a heathen man & a Publican that dare say against her? First in that place is no mention made of doctrine, but only the authority of the censures is established for correcting of vices, that they which have beene admonished or rebuked should not refilt her judgemet. But omitting this, it is much maruel, that these losels baue so little shame, that they dare be proud of y place.
For what shall they get thereby, but that the consent of the Church is never to be despifed, which never conseteth but vnto the true of the worde of God? The Church is to be heard, say they. Who denieth it? forasmuch as it pronounceth nothing but out of the word of the Lord. If they require any more let them knowe that these wordes of Christ do nothing take their pare therin. Neither ought I to be thought too much contentious because I stand so earnestly upon this point, That it is not lawfull for the Church to make anny newe doctrine, that is, to teach and deliver for an Oracle any more than that which the Lord hath revealed by his word. For men of sound wit do see how great danger there is, if so great authority be once graunted to men.
They see also how wide a window is opened to the mockings and caullations of the wicked, if we say that that which men have judged is to be taken for an Oracle among Christians. Beside that, Christ speaking according to the consideration of his owne time, giveth this name to the Synagoge, that his discipels should afterwarde learne to reuerence holy assemblies of the church. So should it come to passe that euery citie and village should have equall authority in coyning of doctrines.

16 The examples which they vse, do nothing help them. They say that the Baptizing of infants, proceed not so much from the express commandement of the Scripture as from the decree of the Church. But it were a verie miserable succour, if we were compelled to flee to the bare authority of the Church for defence of the Baptisme of infants: but it shall in ano-other place sufficiently appeare that it is far otherwise. Likewise whereas they objec that that is no where founde in the Scripture, which was pronounced in the Niceene Synode, that the sonne is consubstantial with the father:
The ix. Chapter.

Of Counsellors and of their authoritie.

Nowe, although I graunt them all thinges concerning the Church: yet they shall thereby not much preuaile for their intent. For whatsoever is faide of the Church, the fame they by and by give to the Counsellors, forsooth much as in their opinion those represent the Church. Yea, where they so stifferly contende for the power of the Church, they doe it of no other purpose, but to give all that they can get to the bishop of Rome and his garde. But ere I beginne to discourse this question, I must needs here make protestation of two things aforeshand. First, that where I shall in this point be somewhat rough, it is not because I leffe esteeme the olde Counsellors than I ought to doe. For I reuerence them from my heart, & with them to be had in their due honor with all men. But herein is some meane, that is, that there be nothing withdrawn from Christ. Now this is the right of Christ, to bee the head in all Counsellors, and to have no man fellowe with him in this dignitie. But I say that then onely he is the head, when he gouerneth the whole assembly with his worde and Spirite. Secondly, whereas I giue leffe to Counsellors than the aduersaries require. I doe it not for this caufe that I am afraid of the Counsellors, as though they did make for their side, and were against ours. For as we are abundantly furnished with the worde of the Lorde to the full prooves of our own doctrine fully, and to the overthrow of the whole...
Cap. 9. Of the outwarde meanes

Papistrie that wee neede not much to desire any other thing besseide it: so if the matter require, the olde Counsellors do for a great part minister vnto vs so much as may suffice for both.

Now let vs speake of the thinke it selfe. If it bee sought of the Scriptures, what is the authoritie of Counsels: there is no plainer promisse than in this saying of Christ: Where two or three shall be gathered together in my name, there I am in the midst of them. But that doth no lesse belong to every particular assembly than to a general Counsell. But the doubt of the question standeth not therein: but because there is a condition added, that God will so onely be in the midst of the Counsell, if it be gathered together in his name. Therefore although our adversaries doe a thousand times name Counsellors of bishops, they shall little preuaile: neither shall they make vs to beleue that which they affirme, that is, that they be governed of the holy Ghost, vntil they have proved that they are gathered together in the name of Christ, For it is as possible y wicked & euill Bishops may conspire against Christ, as good & honest bishops may come together in his name. For a verie cleere proofe hereof are manie decrees that have proceeded from such Counsellors. But this shall be seene hereafter. Now do I but answer in one word, that Christ promiseth nothing, but to the that are gathered together in his name. Let vs therefore define what that is. I deny that they be gathered together in the name of Christ, which casting away the commandement of God, wherein he forbidden any thing to be added to his word, or taken fro it, doe decree euery thing after their owne wil: which being not contended with the Oracles of the Scripture, that is to say the only rule of perfect widsom, do imagine some new thing of their owne head. Surely, fith Christ hath not promised, he will be present at all Counsellors, but hath adjoynd a peculiar marque, whereby to make true & lawfull Counsellors different from other: it is meete that we shoule not negleget this difference. This is the couenant, which in old time God made with the Leuitical priests, that they shoule teach out of his mouth. This he always required of the Prophets: this law also we see to haue bin laid vpon the Apostles. Who so brake this couenant, God doth not vouchsafe, to let them haue the honor of Priesthood, nor any authority. Let the adversaries vndo me this knot, if they wil make my faith bounte to the decrees of men beseide the word of God.

For whereas they think not that truth remaineth in the Church, vns- leffe it be among the Pastors: and that the Church itself standeth not, vns- leffe it appeare in generall Counsellors: that is farre from haung beene alwaies true, if the Prophets haue left vnto vs true testimonies of their owne times. There was in the time of Esiae a Church at Hierusalem, which God had not yet forsaken. But of the Pastors he saith thus: the watchmen are al blind, neither know they any thing. They are all dumme dogges, neither are they able to barke. They lie along & sleepe, & love sleeping: & the Pastors themselves know nothing, nor doe understand: & they doe altogether looke backe vnto their owne waies. After the same maner Osee saith: The watch- man of Ephraims with God, the snare of the fouler, harted in the house of God. Whereioyning them with God by way of mockage, he teacheth that their pretence of the priesthood is vaine. The Church also endured vnto the time time of Hierom. Let vs heare what he saith of the Pastors. From the prophecy eucl to the priest, euerie one followeth lying. Againe: The prophets do prophesie a lie in my name, when I haue not sent them, nor commanded them. And last we should be long in reciting his words, let those things be read that he hath written in the whole xxiii. and xi. chapters. At that time on the other side Ezekiel did no more gently inuey against the same men. The conspiracie (faith he) of the prophets in the mids of their vs a roaring lion, & that violently taketh his pray. Her priests have broken my law, and haue defiled my holy things, and haue made no difference betwene holie and prophane: & the rest that he didoyght to the same effect. Like complaints are euyet where in the Prophets, so that nothing is ofter found in them.

4 But perhaps it might be that that was so among the Iews: but our age is free from so great euill. I woulde to God in deede it were so: but the holy Ghost hath giuen warning that it shalbe farre otherwise. The wordes of Peter are plaine. As (faith he) there were in the olde people falso prophets, so shal there also be among you false teachers, flily bringing in sectes of perdition. See you not howe he saith, 'there is danger to come, not by men of the common people, but by them that shal boast themselfes with the title of teachers and pastors? Moreover howe ofte hath it ben fore-spoken by Christ and his Apostles, that there should verie great daungers hang over the Church by the pastors? Yea, Paul plainly sheweth, that Antichrist shal sit in no other place than in the temple of God. Whereby hee signifieth, that the horrible calamity of which he there speakeith, shal come from no where else but from them. y shal sit in stead of pastors in y church.
And in another place he sheweth, 'there shal be beginnings of so great a mischiff are euys already nere at hand. For when he speakeith to the bishops of Ephesus, I know (faith he) after my departure there shal enter into you ra-ueing wolves not sparing the flocke. And they shalbe of your owne felues, that shal speake peruerse things, to leade away discipes after them. Howe much corruption might a long course of yeres bring among pastors, when they could so farre goe out of kind in so small a space of time? And, not to fill much paper with rehearsing them by name: we are admonished by the examples in a maner of al ages, that neither the truth is alway nourished in the bosome of the pastors, nor the safety of the Church doth hang vpon their state. They ought in deede to haue beene y governors and keepers of the peace & fafrtie of the Church, for preseruation whereof, they are ordeined: but it is one thing for a man to performe that which he ought, & another thing to owe that which he perfometh not.

5 Yet let no man take these our worde in such part, as though I would euerie where and rashly without any choice diminish the authoritie of Pastors. I do but onely admonishe that euyn among pastors themselves there is a chose to be had, that we should not immediately thinke them to be pastors that are so called. But the Pope with all his flocke of bishops, vpon none other reason, but because they are called Pastors, shaketh away the obedience of the worde of God, do tumble & tosse all things after their owne lust: and in the meane time they travaile to perswade, that they cannot bee destitute

desitute of the light of truth, that the spirit of God perpetually abideth in them; the church consisteth in them & dieth with them. As though there be now no judgements of the Lorde, whereby he may punish the worlde at this day with the same kinde of punishment, wherewith sometime he took vengeance of the unthankfulness of the old people, that is, to strike the pastors with blindness & amazed dulness. Neither do they, most foolish men understand, that they sing the same song, which those in old time did sing that warred against the word of God. For the enemies of Hieremie did thus prepare themselues against the trueth: Come, & we will imagine imaginations against Hieremie: forasmuch as the law shall not perish from the priest, nor council from the wife man, nor the word from the prophet.

The blinde priests & false prophets what were of olde being assembled in a council together might no doubt have erred, & did, Hier. 4.9

Hier. 18.18

6 Hereby it is easie to answer to that other objection concerning general councils. It cannot be denied but that the Jews had a true church in the time of the prophets. But if there had then ben a generall counsel gathered together of the priests, what manner face of the church had ther appeared? We hear what God faith, not to one or two of the but to the whole order. The priests shalbe astonished, and the prophets shalbe made afraid. Againe, the law shal perish from the priest, and council from the Elders. Againe, Night shalbe to you in stead of a vision, and darkness in steede of prophesying: & the sunne shall fall downe vpon the prophets, and bee darkened vpon these daies &c. Well: if al such had then been gathered together in one, what spirit should haue governed in that assembly? Of that thing we haue a notable example in that counsell which Ahab called together. There were present foure hundred prophets. But, because they were come together of no other mind but to flatter the wicked king, therefore Satan was sent of the Lorde to be a lying spirit in the mouth of them all. There by al their voices the trueth was condemned. Micha was condemned for an heretike, stricken and cast in prison. So was done to Hieremie, so to the other prophets.

7 But let one example suffice for all, which is more notable than the rest. In that counsell which the bishops and pharisees gathered at Hierusalem against Christ, what can a man say that there wanted in so much as pertained to the outward show? For if there had not then beene a Church at Hierusalem, Christ would never haue communicated with their sacrifices & other ceremonies. There was made a solemnne summoning of them together: the high bishop fate as chief; the whole order of priests fate by hym: yet Christ was there condemned, & his doctrine driven away. This doing is a profe of the Church was not enclosed in that counsell. But there is no perils that any such thing should happen to vs. Who hath giue vs his face thereof? For it is not without fault of sluggishnes, to be too careless in so great a matter. But when the holy Ghost doth with express words prophecy by thy mouth of Paul, that there shall come a departing (which cannot come but that the pastors must be the first that shall forsake God) why are we here in wilfully blinde to our owne destruction? Wherefore it is in no wise to be granted, that the Church consisteth in the company of pastors, for whom the Lord hath no where undertake that they shall perpetually bee good, but he hath pronounced that they shall sometime bee still. But when
What wilt thou say: Shall the councils have no authoritie in determining: Yes for sooth. For neither do I here argue that all councils are to be condemned, or all their acts to be repelled, or (as the saying is) to bee defaced with one blotte. But (thou wilt say to mee) thou bringest them all into subjection, that it may bee free for every man to receive or refuse that which the councils haue determined. Not so. But so oft as the decree of any council is brought forth, I would have it first to be diligently weighed at what time it was holden, for what cause it was holden, what manner of men were present and then the very thing that is intreated of, to bee examined by the rule of the scripture: and that in such sort as the determination of the council may have his force, and be as a forejudged sentence, and yet not hinder the aforesaid examination. I would to God all men did keep that moderation which Augustine prescribeth in the thirde booke against Maximine. For when bee minded briefly to put to silence this heretike contending about the Decrees of councils: Neither (faith he) ought I to object against thee the Synode of Nice, nor thou against me the Synode of Ariminum, as to the extent to conclude one another by forejudged sentence, neither am I bound by the authoritie of the one, nor thou of the other. By authorities of Scriptures, not such as are proper to either one, but such as are common to both, let there strive matter with matter, cause with cause, reason with reason. So should it come to passe, that councils should have the majestie that they ought: but in the mean season the Scripture shoulde bee alone in the higher place, that there might be nothing that shoulde not bee subject to the rule thereof. So these olde Synodes, as of Nice, of Constantinople, the first of Ephesus, of Chaledon, and such other, which were holden for confuting of errors, wee willingly embrace and reverence as holy, so much as belongeth to the doctrines of faith: for they containe nothing but the pure and natural exposition of Scripture, which the holy fathers with spiritual wisdom have applied to the subduing of the enemies of Religion that then rose vp. In some of the latter councils also, we see to appeare a true zeal of godlinesse, and plain tokens of wit, learning, and wisdom. But as things are wont commonly to grow to worse, we may see by the latter Councillers, how much the Church hath now and then degenerate from the purenciss of that golden age. And I doubt not but that in these corrupter ages also, councils have had some bishops of the better sort. But in these the same happened which the Senators themselves complained to be not well done in making of ordinances of the senate of Rome. For while the sentences are numbred, not weighed, it is of neceffitie that oftentimes the better part is overcom of the greater. Truely they brought forth many wicked sentences. Neither is it here needfull to gather the speciall examples, either because it should be too long, or because other have done it so diligently, that there cannot much be added.

9 Now, what needeth to rehearse Councells disagreeing with councells? And it is no cause that any should murmur against mee, and say, that of thse councils that disagree the one is not lawfull. For, howe shall we judge that? By this, if I bee not deceived, that wee shall judge by the Scriptures, that
Cap. 9. Of the outwarde meanes that the decrees thereof are not agreeable with true doctrine. For this is the onely certaine lawe to discerne them by. It is nowe about nine hundred yeares agoe, since the Synode of Constantinople gathered together vnder Leo the Emperor, judged that images set vp in Churches should bee overthrown, and broken in pieces. A little afterward, the council of Nice, which then the Empresse assembled in spite of him, decreed that they should be restored. Whether of these two shall we acknowledge for a lawfull councell? The latter which gaue images a place in Churches, hath preuailed among the people. But Augustine faith that that cannot be done without moste present peril of idolatry. Epiphanius which was before in time, speaketh much more sharply: for he faith that it is wickednesse and abomination to have images seene in a Church of Christians. Woulde they that so speake, allowe that councell, if they were aliue at this day? But if both the historians tell truth, and the verie affeets be beleued, not onely images them selues, but also the worshipping of them was there receiued. But it is evident that such a decree came from Satan. How faie you to this, that in depraung and tearing the Scripture, they shew that they made a mocking stocke of it? Whiche thing I haue before sufficiently made open. Howsoever it be, we shall no otherwise bee able to discerne betwixt contrarie & disagreeing Synodes, which were many, vnlesse we trie them all by that balance of all men and angels, that is, by the worde of the Lorde. So we embrace the Synode of Chalcedon, refusing the seconde Synode of Ephesus, because in this latter one the wickednesse of Eutiches was confirmed, which the other former condemned. This thing holy men haue judged none otherwise but by the scripture: whome we followe in judging: that the worde of God which gaue light to them doeth also nowe giue light to vs. Now let the Ramanistes goe and boast, as they are wont, that the Holy ghost is fastened and bounde to their counsels.

To Howbeit there is also somewhat which a man may well thinke to be wanting in those auncient and purer counsell: either becausethat they that then were at them, beeing otherwise learned and wise men, wholly bent to the businesse then in hand, did not foresee many other things; or for that many things of lighter importance escaped them being busied with weightier and more earnest matters; or for that simply, as beeing men they might bee deceived with vnskillfulness: or for that they were sometime carried headlong with too much affecttion. Of this last point (which seemeth the hardest of all) there was a plain example in the Nicene Synode, the dignific whereof by consent of all men, as it was worthie, beene received with most high reverence. For when the principal article of our faith was there in danger, Arrius the enimie was present in readinesse, with whom they must fight hande to hande, and the chief importance lay in the agreement of them that came prepared to fight against the eurror of Arrius: this notwithstanding, they carelesse off great dangers, yea, as it were hauing forgotten gravenigne, modestie and al humanitie, leaving the battalle that they had in hand, as if they had come thither of purposer to doe Arrius a pleasure, began to wounde themselves with inwarde dissensions, and to turne against themselves the stile that should hauebeene bent against Arrius: There were heard heard soule obiectings of crimes, there were scattered booke of accusations & there would have ben no end made of contentions, vntill they had with mutual wounds one destroyed another , vnlesse the Emperour Constantine had prevented it , which professing that the examining of their life was a matter aboue his knowledge, and chastised such intemperance rather with praise than with rebuking. Howe many waies is it credible that the other counsels also failed, which followed afterwarde? Neither doeth this matter neede long prooфе. For if a man reade over the actes of the councelles, he shall note therein many infirmities: though I speake of nothing more greevous.

11 And Leo bishop of Rome ticketh not to charge with ambition and vnadvised rashnesse, the Synode of Chalcedon, which yet he confesseth to be founde in doctrines. He doth in deed not deny that it was a lawfull Synode: but he openly affirmeth, that it might erre. Some man peradventure will think me fonde for that I buffer my selfe in thewinge such errors: forasmuch as our aduersaries do confesse, that counsels may erre in those things that are not necessarie to salvation. But this labour is not yet superfluous. For although because they are copelled, they do in deed confesse it in word; yet when they thrust vnto vs the determinatiο of al counsels in every matter whatsoever it be, for an oracle of the holy Ghost, they do therin require more than they toke at the beginning. In so doing what do they affirm, but that counsels can not erre: or if they erre, yet it is not lawfull for vs to see the truth, or not to southe their errors? And I intend nothing els, but that it may thereby be gathered that the holy Ghost, so governed the godly and holy Synodes, that in the meanes time he suffered somewhat to happen to them by the nature of men, leaft we shoude too muche trust to men. This is a much better sentence, than that of Gregorie Nazianzenē he neuer saw a good end of any coucelf. For he that affirmeth that al without exception ended ill doth not leave them much authority. It is nowe nothing needeful to make mention severally of provincial counsels: forasmuch as it is easie to judge by the general, how much authoritie they ought to haue to make newe articles of faith and to receiue what kinde of doctrine focuer it pleaseth them.

12 But our Romanistes, when they see that in defence of their cause all helpe of reasone doth faile the, do report to that extreme & miserable shift: that although the men themselves be blockish in wit and counsel, and most wicked in minde and will, yet the word of God remaineth, which commandeth to obey Rulers. Is it so? what if I deny that they be rulers that are such? For they ought to take vpon themselves, no more than Iofua had, which was both a prophete of the Lorde, and an excellent pastor. But let vs heare with what words he is set by the Lorde into his office. Let not (faith hee) the volume of this lawe depart from thy mouth; but thou shalt studie vpon it daies and nightes. Thou shalt neither bowe to the right hande nor to the left; then shalt thou direct thy way & vnderstand it. They therefore shalbe to vs spiritual rulers which shal not bow frō the law of the Lord, neither to the one side nor to the other. But if the doctrine of al pastors whatsoever they be, is to be receiued without any doubting, to what purpose was it that we shoude should so oft and so earnestly be admonished not to harken to the speech of false prophets. Hear not (saith he by Hieremis) the words of the prophets that prophesie to you. For they teach you vanity, & not out of the mouth of the Lord. Again, beware you of false prophets, that come vnto you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves. And John shoulde in vain exhort vs, that we shoulde prove the spirites, whether they be of God. From which judgement the very Angels are not exempted, much leffe Satana with all his lies. What is to be said of this saying: if the blind lead the blind, they shall both fall into the ditch? Doth it not sufficiently declare, that it is of great importance what manner of prophets he be heard, and that not all are rashly to be heard (Wherefore there is no reason that they shoulde make vs afraid with their titles, therby to draw vs into partaking of their blindness. Forasmuch as we see on the other side, the Lord had a singular care to fray vs away from suffering our selves to be led with other mens error, under what vse of name sooner it lurketh. For if the answer of Christ be true, they shall guides, whether they be called fathers of the Church, or prelates, or bishops, can do nothing but throw their partners into the same headlong downfall. Wherefore let no names of counsels, Pastors, bishops, (which may as well be falsely pretended as truly vsed,) hinder us, but that being taught by lessons both of words and examples, we may examine all spirites of all men by the rule of the word of God, that we may prove whether they be of God or no.

13 Forasmuch as we have proued that there is not given to the church a power to sett vp a new doctrine, now let vs speake of the power which they attribute vnto it in expounding of scripture. Truly we doe willingly grant, that if there happen debate about any doctrine, there is no better nor surer remedy than if a Synode of true bishops assemble together, wher the doctrin in controversie may be discuessed. For such a determination, whereunto the pastors of Churches shal agree in common together, calling upon the spirite of Christ, shal haue much greater force, than if every one severally shoulde conceiue it at home, and so teach it to the people, or if a fewe private men shoulde make it. Again, when bishops are gathered in one, they doe the more commodiously take aduise in common, what and in what forme they ought to teach, least diversitie shouldbreede offence. Thirdly Paul prescribeth this order in discerning of doctrines: For whereas he gueueth to euery fuculent Church a power to discerne, he sheweth what is the order of doing in weightier causes, that is, that the Churches should take upon them a common triall of the matter together. And so doth the very feeling of godlines instruct vs, that if any man trouble the church with an vnwonted doctrine, and the matter procede so farre that there be peril of greater dis-sention, the churches should first meete together, & examine the question propounded: at last, after just discussing had, bring forth a determination taken out of scripture, such as may both take away doutting out of the people, & stop the mouths of wicked & greedy men, they may not be so hardy to proceed any further. So when Tertius was rifen, the Nicene Synod was gathered together, which with the authority thereof did breake the wicked endevours of the ungodly man, and restored peace to the churches which which he had vexed, and defended the etenall godbeade of Chrifte, against his blasphemous doctrine. When afterward Eumomius and Macedonius stirred vp newe troubles, there madenefs was resifted with like remedy by the Synode of Conftantinoile. In the Councell at Ephesus the wickednes of Ne-torius was banifhed. Finally this hath beene from the beginning the ordinarie meane in the Church to preferue vnitie, fo oft as Satan began to work any thing. But let vs remember, that not in all ages or in all places are found Athanafies Basiles Cyrilles, and such defenders of true doctrine whom the Lorde then raised vp. But let vs thinke what happened at Ephesus in the second Synode, where the heresie of Euliches prevaile, the man of holy memony Flavianus was banifhed with certaine other godly men, and many fuch mifchiefes committed: even because Dioscorus a feditious man and of a very naughty nature, was there the cheefe, and not the spirite of the Lorde.
But there was not the Church, I grant. For this I determine vterly that the trueh doth not thefore die in the Church, although it be oppressed of one councell: but that the Lorde merceluolously preferueth it, that it may againe in due time rife vp, and get the ouerhande. But I denye that this is perpetually, that is a true and certaine exposition of scripture which hath bin receiued by confents of a councell.

14. But the Romanists shewe at another marke, when they teach that the power to expounde the Scripture belongeth to the councelles, yea and that without appellation from them. For they abufe this colour, to call it an exposition of the Scripture whatsoever is decreed in the counsels. Of purg-atorie, of the interceflion of Saints, of auricular confession, and fuch other there cannot be founded one syllable in the scriptures. But because all these things haue beene stablished by the authoritie of the church, that is to say (to speake truely) receiued in opinion and vfe, therefore every one of them must be taken for an exposition of scripture. And not that onely: But if a coucell decree any thing, though scripture crye out againft it, yet it shall beare the name of an exposition thereof, Christ commandeth all to drink of the cup, which hee reacheth in the Supper. The councell of Conftance forbade that it should not be giuen to the lay people, but willed that the prifft one-ly should drinke of it. That which fo directly figheth against the institu-ton of Christ, they will haue to bee taken for an exposition of it. Paul calleth the forbidding of marriage, the hyprocify of deuils: And the holy Ghoste in another place pronounceth that mariage is in all men holy and honourable. Whereas they have afterwarde forbidden prieftes to marrie, they require to haue that taken for the true & naturall exposition of the Scripture, when nothing can be imagined more againft it. If any dare once open his mouth to the contrary, hee shall bee judged an heretike: because the determination of the Church is without appellation: and to doubt of her expofition, that it is not true, is a hainous offence. Why should we liney against so great shamelesnesse? For the very shewing of it is an overcomming of it.
As for that which they teach of the power to allow the scripture, I wittingly passe it ouer. For in such sort to make the Oracles of God subject to the judgement of men, that they should therefore be of force because they have pleased men, is a blasphemy vnworthie to be rehearsed: and I haue before

before touched the same matter alredie.Yet I will aske them one thing: If the authoritie of the scripture be founded vpon the allowance of the church, what counells decree will they alledge of that matter? I thinke they haue none.Why then did Arius suffer himself to be overcome at Nice with testimonies brought out of the gospel of John: For after these mens saying it was free for him to haue refused them, forasmuch as there had no allowance of a generall counsell gone before. They alledge the olde roll, which is called the Canon, which they say to haue proceeded from the judgement of the church, But I aske them againe, in what counsell that Canon was set forth. Here they mutt needs be dumme. Howbeit I desire further to knowe, what manner of Canon they think it was. For I see that the same was not very certainlie agreed among the olde writers. And is that which Hierome sayth ought to bee of force, the Booke of Machabees, Tobie, Ecclesiasticus and such other shall be thrust among the Apochrypha: which those Canons doe in no wise suffer to be done.

The x. Chapter.

Of the power in making of Lawes: vnder the Pope and his haue used a most cruelly tyranny and butchery among foules.

Nowe followeth the seconde part, which they will have to consist in making of lawes, out of which spring haue flowed innumerable traditions of men, euie to many finite to Strange pore foules. For they haue had no more conscience, than had the Scribes and Pharisees to lay burdens vpon other mens shoulders, which they themselues woule not touch with one finger. I haue in another place taught how cruell a butcherie is that which they commande concerning auricular confession. In other lawes there appeareth not so great violence: but those which seeme the most tolerable of all, doe tyrannously oppresse conscience. I leaue unspeake how they corrupt the worshippe of God, and do spoile God hymselfe of his right, which is the onely lawmaker. This power is newe to be intreated of, whether the Church may binde conscience with her lawes. In which discourse the order of policie is not touched, but this onely is intended, that God be rightly worshipped according to the rule which himselfe hath preferred, & that the spirituall libertie, which hath regarde vnto God, may remaine safe vnto vs. We haue made that all those decrees be called traditions of men, whatsoever they be that haue concerning the worshipping of God proceeded from men beside his word. Against these doe we strive, not against the holy and profitable ordinances of the Church which make for the preservation either of discipline or honestie or peace. But the end of our striving is, that the immeasurable and barbarous Empire may bee restrained, and they vsurpe vpon foules, that would bee counted pastors of the Church, but in very deed are most cruell butchers. For they say that the laws which they make are spirituall, and pertaining to the soule, and they affirme them to bee necessarie to eternall life. But so (as I euie nowe touched) the kingdom of Chriftes is invaded, so the liberty by him giuen to the conscience of of the faithful is utterly oppressed & thrown abroad, I speake not now with how great ungodliness these stablimd, * offering of their lawes, while out of it they teach men to seake both forgiveness of sinnes, & righteousness, & salvation, while they set in it the whole summe of religion & godlines. This one thing I earnestly hold, that there ought no necessity to bee laid upon confciences in those things wherein they are made free by Christ, & vnlesse they be made free, as we have before taught, they cannot rest with God. They must acknowledge one only king Christ their deliverer, and bee governed by one law of libertie, even the holy worde of the Gospel, if they will keepe still the grace which they have once obtained in Christ: they must be holden with no bondage, and bound with no bonds.

2 These Sylene do in deedes faine that their constitutions are lawes of libertie, a sweete yoke, a light burden: but who cannot see that they be meere lies? They themselves in deedes do feel no heauinesse of their owne lawes, which casting away the fear of God, do carelesly & stoutly neglect both their owne and Gods lawes. But they that are touched with any care of their salvation, are farre from thinking themselues free so long as they be intangled with these snares. We see with how great warinesse Paul did deal in this halfe, that he durft not so much as in any one thing lay vpon men any snare at all, & that not without cause. Truely he foresaw with how great a wound confciences should be striken, if they should be charged with a necessity of those things whereof the Lord had left them libertie. On the other side the constitutions are almost innumerable, which these men have most grievously stablished with threatening of eternall death, which they most feuerely require as necessarie to salvation. And among those there are many most hard to be kept, but all of them (if the whole multitude of them be laid together) are impossible: so great is the heape. How then shall it bee possible, that they vpon whom so great a weight of difficulty lieth, shoule not be vexed in perplexitie with extreme anguith & terror? Therefore my purpose is here to impute such constitutions as tend to this ende, inwardly to bind soules before God, and charge them with a religion, as though they taught them of things necessarie to salvation.

3 This question doth therefore incumber the most part of men, because they do not sofetely enough put difference betweene the outward court (as they call it) and the court of conscience. Moreover this increaseth the difficulty, that Paul teacheth that the magistrate ought to be obeyed not only for faine of punishment, but for confciences sake. Whereupon followeth, that confciences are also bound with y politike lawes. But if it were so, then all should fall that we have spoken in the last Chapter and intende nowe to speake concerning the spiritual gouernment. For the loosing of this knot, fist it is good to learne what is conscience. The definitio is to be gathered of the proper derivation of the word. For, as when men do with minde and understanding conceive the knowledge of things, they are thereby saide to knowe, whereupon is derived the name of science knowledge; so when they have a feeling of Gods judgement as a witness adioyned with them which doth not suffer them to hide their sinnes, but that they bee brought accused to the judgement seat of God, that same feeling is called conscience.

For
Cap. 10. Of the outwarde meanes

For it is a certayne meanes betweene God and man; because it suffereth not man to suppress that which he knoweth, but pursueth him so far til it bring him to guiltynesse. This is it that Paul meaneith when he teacheth that conscience doth together witness with men, when their thoughtes doe accuse or acquite them in the judgement of God. A simple knowledge might remaine in man as inclosed. Therefore this seeing which presenteth man to the judgement of God, is as it were a keper ioyned to man, to marke and watche all his secretes, that nothing should remaine buried in darkenesse.

Whereupon also commeth that olde prouerbe, conscience is a thousande witnesses. For the same reason also Peter hath set the examination of a good conscience, for quietnesse of minde, when wee be persuaded of the grace of Chrift, doe without feare present our selves to God. And the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes setteth these words, to have no more conscience of sinne, in stead of, to bee delivered or acquited, that sinne may no more accuse vs.

Therefore as worke have respect to men, so the conscience is referred to God: so that conscience is nothing else but the inwarde purenesse of the heart. In which sense Paul wrighteth that charitie is the fulfilling of the law, out of a pure conscience, & faith not fained. Afterward also in the same chapter he sheweth how much it differeth from understanding, saying that some had suffered shipwrack from the faith, because they had forsaaken good conscience. For in these wordees hee signifieth, that it is a lively affection to worship God, and a sincere desire to live godly and holy. Sometime in deed vs is referred also to men, as in Luke, when the same Paul teacheth, that he indewered himselfe that hee might walke with a good conscience toward God and men. But this was therefore saide, because the fruitees of good conscience doe flowe, and come euene to men. But in speaking properly, it hath respect to God onely, as I haue alreadie saide. Hereupon commeth that a lawe is saide to binde conscience, which sinply bindeth a man, without regard of men, or not having any consideracion of them. As for example, God commandeth not onely to keepe the minde chaste and pure from all lust, but also forbidden of all manner of filthinesse of wordees & outwarde wantonness whatsoever it be. To the keeping of this law my conscience is subject, although there liued not one man in the worlde. So he that behaueth himselfe intemperately, doeth not onely sinne in this that hee giueth euil example to his brethren, but he hath his conscience bound with guiltynesse before God. In things that are of themselves meanes, there is another consideracion. For we ought to abstaine from them, if they breed any offence, but the conscience still being free. So Paul speaketh of flesh consercate to idoles. If any (faith he) make doubt, touch it not, for conscience sake. I say for conscience, not thine owne, but the others. A faithfull man should sinne, which being first warned should never he elles eat of such flesh. But howsoever in respect of his brother, it be necessary for him to abstaine, as it is prescribed of God, yet he ceaseth not to keepe still the libertie of conscience. Wee see how this lawe binding the outwarde worke, leaueth the conscience vnbound.

ende, to charge us with a religion, as though the asserting of them were of itself necessary, then we say that that is laid upon conscience which was not lawfull to be laid upon it. For our consciences have not to do with men, but with God only: whereunto pertaineth that common difference between the earthly court and the court of conscience. When the whole world was wrapped in a most thicke mist of ignorance, yet this small sparkle of light remained, they acknowledged a mans conscience to be above all judgments of men. Howbeit the same thing that they did with one worde confess, they did afterwarde indeede overthrow: yet it was Gods will that there should then also remain some testimonie of Christian libertie, which might delier consciences from the tyranny of men. But that difficulty is not yet dissolued, which ariseth out of the words of Paul. For if we must obey Princes not onely for penalties fake, but also for conscience, it seemeth therupon to follow that Princes lawes have also dominion over conscience. If this bee true, then the same also ought to be said of the lawes of the church, I answer first here we must put a difference between the generallie & specialitie. For though all speciallawes doe not touch the conscience, yet we are bound by the general commandement of God, which commendeth vnto vs the authoritie of magistrates. And vpon this point standeth the disputatio of Paul that magistrates are to be honored because they are ordained of God. In the mean time he teacheth not that those lawes that are prescrib'd by them, do belong to the inward governement of the soule: whereas hee eache where ex-tolled both the worshipping of God and the spiritual rule of liuing righteously, above all the ordinaces of men whatsoever they be. An other thing also is worthy to be noted, (which yet hangeth vpon the former) that lawes of men, whether they be made by the magistrate or by the Church, although they be necessary to be kept, (I speake of the good and righteous lawes) yet therefore do not by them selues binde conscience, because the whole necessitie of keeping them is referred to the general end, but consisteth not in the things commanded. From this sort do farre differ both those that prescrib a new forme of the worshipping of God, and those that appoint necessitie in things that be at libertie.

But such are those that at this day be called Ecclesiastical constitutions in the Papacie, which are engrafted in the tree of the true and necessary worshipping of God. And as they be innumerable: so are there infinite bonds to catch and snare soules. But although in the declaration of the law we have somewhat touched them; yet because this place was fitter to entreat fully of them, I will now traile to gather together the whole summe in the beft order that I can. And because we have already discoursed so much as seemed to be sufficient, concerning the tyrannie which the false bishops do take vpon themselues, in libertie to teach whatsoever they list. I will now omitte all that part: & I will herearry only vpon declaring the power, which they saie they have, to make lawes. Our false bishops therefore doe burden conscience with new lawes, under this pretence, that they are ordained of the Lord spiritual lawmakers, since the governement of the Church is committed vnto them. Therefore they affirm, that whatsoever they commande and prescribe, ought necessarily to be observed of the Christian people: & that hee \[\text{The authoritie which the popish prelacie chaineth us making lawes.}\]

Cap. 10.

Of the outwarde meanes

that breaketh it, is gilty of double disobedience, for he is rebellious both to God and to the Church. Certainly, if they were true bishops, I would in this behalfe grant to them some authoritie, not so much as they require, but so much as is requisite to the well ordering of the policie of the Church. Now if they are nothing lesse than that which they would be accounted, they can not take any thing to them, be it never so little, but they shall take too much. But because this hath beene eile where considered, let vs grant them at this present, that whatsoever power true bishops have, the same rightly belongeth to the all: yet I deny that they be therefore appointed lawmakers over the faithful, that may of themselves prescribe a rule to live by, or ccept to their ordinances the people committed unto them. When I say this, I mean, that it is not lawfull for them, to deliuer to the church to be obferved of necessity, which they have devised of themselves without the word of God. For as much as that authoritie both was unkown to the Apostles, and so oft taken away from the ministers of the Church by the Lords own mouth: I maruell who haue bin so bold to take it upon them, and at this day are so bold to defend it, beside the example of the Apostles, & against the manifest prohibition of God.

All things needful to the perfect rule of a well living contained in the law.

Iam. 4. 12.

7 As touching that that pertained to the perfect rule of well living, the Lord hath so conteined all in his law, that he hath left nothing for me that they might adde to that sum. And this he did first for this purpose, because the whole vperightnes of living standeth in this point, if all works be governed by his will as by a rule, he should be holden of vs the only maker and director of life: then to declare that he requireth of vs nothing more than obedience. For this reason James saith he that judgeth his brother judgeth the law: he that judgeth the law, is not an obferuer of the law, but a judge. But there is one only lawmaker, that can both save & destroy. We heare God doth claime this one thing as proper to himselfe, to rule vs with the government & lawes of his word. And the same thing was spoken before of Esay, although somwhat more darkly: the Lord is our king, the Lord is our lawmaker, the Lord is our judge, he that saue vs. Truly in both these places is shewed, he that hath power over the soule, hath the judgement of life & death. Yea James pronounceth this plainly. Now, no man can take that vpon him. Therefore God must be acknowledged to be the only king of soules, to whom alone belongeth the power to save & destroy, as those words of Esay expresse, & to be the king, and judge, & lawmaker & Saviour. Therefore Peter, when he admonisht the Pastors of their dutie, exhorteeth them so to feed the flocke, not as vuing a Lordship over the Clergy, by which word Clergy he signifieth the inheritance of God, that is to say the faithful people. This if we rightly weigh, that it is not lawful, that that should be transferred to any, which God maketh his own only: we shall understand that so all the power is cut off whatsoever it be, that they challenge, which advance themselves to command any thing in the Church without the word of God.

Esa. 33. 22.

1.Pet. 5. 2.

The way to judge what ordinances are repugnant to the word of God.

8 Nowe, forasmuch as the whole cause hangeth thereupon, that if God be the onely lawmaker, it is not lawfull for men to take that honour to themselves: it is meete also therewithall to keepe in minde those two reasons which we haue spoken, why the Lorde claimeth that to himselfe alone.
The first is that his will may be to vs a perfect rule of all righteousness & holinesse: and that so in the knowing of him may be the perfect knowledge to live well. The other is, that (when the manner is sought how to worship him rightly and well) he only may have authoritie over our soules, whose wee ought to obey, and upon whose becke wee ought to hang. These two reasons being well marked, it shall be easie to judge, what ordinances of men are contrarie to the worde of God. Of that sort be all those which are fained to belong to the true worshipping of God, and to the obseruing whereof conscience are bound. as though they were necessarie to be obserued. Let vs therefore remembret that all lawes of men ought to be weighed with this balance, if we will have a sure tryall that may never suffer vs to erre. The first of these reasons Paul in the Epistle to the Coloffians saith in contending against the false Apostles that attempted to oppress the Churches with newe burdens. The second reason he more saith with the Galathians in the like case. This therefore he trauelleth to prove in the Epistle to the Coloffians, that the doctrine concerning the true worshipping of God is not to be sought at mens hands: because the Lord hath faithfully & fully instructed vs how hee ought to be worshipping. To prove the same in the first chapter, hee saith that in the Gospel is concealed a wisdom, whereby the man of God may be made perfect in Christ. In the beginning of the second chapter hee saith, that all the treasures of wisdom & understanding are hidden in Christ, Therupon he afterward concluded, let the faithful beware that they bee not by vaine Philosophie led from the flocke of Christ, according to the constitutions of men. But in the end of the chapter, he doth yet with greater boldnes condemne all Ethelothreskias, that is to say, all sained worshippinges, which men devote to themselvese, or receive of other, & whatsoever precepts they dare of themselves give concerning the worshipping of God. Wee have therefore, that all those ordinances are wicked, in obseruing whereof the worshipping of God is sained to be. As for the places in the Galathians wherewith he earnestly affirmeth that conscience, which ought to be ruled of God only, ought not to be intangled with snares, they are open enough specially in the fift chapter. Therefore let it be sufficient to have but noted them.

But because the whole matter shall better be made open by examples, before that wee go any further, it is good also to apply this doctrine to our own times. We say the constitutions which they call Ecclesiastical, where with the Pope and his doe burden the Church, are pernicious, and wicked; our adversaries defend that they be holy and auayable to saluation. There be two kindes of them: for some concerne Ceremonies & rites, other some pertain more to discipline. Is there then a just cause to move vs to impugne them both? Truely a infer that we would. First doe not the authors themselves clearly define, what the true worshipping of God is contained in them? To what purpose do they apply their ceremonies, but that God should bee worshipped by them? And that cometh to passe not by the only error of the ignorant multitude, but by their allowance that haue the place of teaching. I doe not touch the grosse abominations, where with they have gone about to oversowe all godlynesse. But it should not be imagined among them to bee so hainous an offence, as to have sained in any of the least pettie
A lefse faults in the Papacie to transgresse the lawe of God than to mifie in the keeping of human constitutions.

Cap. 10.

Of the outwarde meanes

traditions, vnlesse they did make the worshipping of God subject to their sained deuises. What do we then offende, if at this day we cannot beare that which Paul taught to bee intolerable, that the lawfull order of the worshipping of God should bee reduced to the will of men: specially when they command men to worship according to the elements of the world, which Paul testified to bee against Christ? Againe it is not vnownen, with howe precife necessitie they binde consciences to keepe whatsoever they commande. Here when wee erie out to the contrary, wee haue all one caufe with Paul, which in no wise suffereth faithful consciences to be brought into bondage of men.

10. Moreover this worst of all is added, that when religion hath once begun to bee defiled with such vaine inventions, there euer followeth after that peruerse knesse another abominable forwardnesse, whereof Christ reproched the Pharifecs that the commandement of God is made vnde for the traditions of men. I will not vfe mine owne words in fighting against our lawmakers at these dayes. Let them haue the victorie, if they can by any meanes purge themselves from this accusation of Christ. But howe should they excuse them, when among them it is thought infinitely more hainous, to haue omitted auricular confeffion when the time of yeare commeth about, than to haue continued a moft wicked life a whole yeare together? to haue infected their tongue with a little tasting of flesh on a Friday, than to haue defiled their bodie with whoredome in the dayes of the weeke? to haue put their hand to an honest worke vpon a day consecrate to Iω not what petie Sainctes, than to haue continually exercised their members in moft wicked offences? for a Priest to be coupled with one lawfull mariage, than to be entangled with a thousand adulteries? not to haue performed a vowed pilgrimage, than to breake faith in all promises? not to haue wasted somewhat vpon monstrous and no lesse superfluous and unprofitable excessive gorgeousnesse of temples, than to haue failed to helpe the extreme necessities of the poore? to haue passed by an idol without honour, than to haue despitefully intreated all kindes of men? no not to haue mumbled vp at certain houres a great number of words without understanding, than neuer to haue conceived a true prayer in their heart? What is to make void the commandement of God for the traditions of men, if this be not: when commending the keeping of Gods commandementes but coldly and as it were lightely by the way, they doe no lesse earnestly and busily exact the obeying of their owne, than if they contained in them the whole pith of godlinesse? when reuenging the transgression of Gods lawe, with light penalties of satisfaction, they punishe the verie least offence of one of their owne decrees with no lesse paine than with prisonment, banishment, fire or sword: Being not so sharpe and hard to intreate against the despiers of God, they persecute the despiers of themselfes with vnappeasable hatred to the extremite, and doe so instruct all those, whose simplicitie they holde captiue, that they would with more contented minde see the whole lawe of God ouerthowen, than one small tittle (as they call it) in the commandements of the church to be broken. First in this point is grecuous offence committed, that for small matters, and such as (if it should bee tried by Gods judgement) are at libertie, one man despiseth, judgeth and casteth away another. But now as though that were not cuill enough, those trilling elements of the worlde (as Paul calleth them in writing to the Galatians) are weighed of more value than the heavenly oracles of God, And he that is in a mener acquired in a dulterie, is judged in meane: he that hath leave to use a harlot, is forbidden to have a wife, This profile verily is gotten by that transgressing obedience, which is so much turned from God as it declineth to men.

11 There be also other two not slender faultes, which we disallow in the same ordinances. First, because they prescribe for the most part vnprofitable, and somet ime also fond observations: then, because godly consciences are oppressed with the infinite multitude of them, & being rouled backe into a certaine Lewdines, they so cl. aue to shadowes, they cannot attain to Christ. Whereas I call the fond & vnprofitable, I know that that will not seeme credible to the wisdome of the flesh, which so well liketh them, that it thinketh the church to be utterly deromned when they be taken away. But this is it, y Paul writeth of, to have a resemblance of wisdome in counterfeit worshipping in humilitie, and in this that they thinke that with their Sharpnede they be able to tame their flesh. This is truely a most wholesome admonition, such as ought never to flip away frovs. Mes traditions (faith he) do deceive vnder the shee of wisdome, whence nave they this colour: because they are fained of men, therefore the wit of man doth therein acknowledge his owne, and acknowledging it, doth more gladly embrace it, than any thing were it never so good, that lesse agreed with his vanitie. Againe they have hereby an other commendation, because they seeme to be fit introductions to humilitie, for that with their yoke they hold the minds of me pressed down to the ground. Last of all, because they seeme to tend to this end to restrain the daintines of the flesh, and to subdue it with rigour of abstinence, therefore they are thought to be wisely devised. But what faith Paul to these things? doth he not shake off those visors: leaft the simple should be deceived with false pretence? Because he judged this enough for confutation of the, that he had said they were the inuentiones of men, he passeth over all these things without confutation, as though he esteemed them for nothing: Yea, because he knew that all fained worshipping in the Church were condemned, & are so much more suspicous to the faithfulfull as they more delight the wit of man: because he knew that that faind image of outward humilitie doeth so much differ from true humilitie, as it might easly be discerned: finally because he knew that that childish introduction was no more esteemed than an exercise of the body: therefore he willd y the very same things should be to the faithfull in stead of a confutation of mens traditions, by faviour of which they were commended among the ignorant.

12 So at this day not only the vunlearned common people, but every man as he is most puffed vp with worldly wisdome, so is he most marvellously delighted with beholding of ceremonies. But hypocrites and foolish women thinke that there can be nothing devised more glorious nor better. But they which do more deeply search, & more truely weigh according to the rule of godlines, of what value so many & such ceremonies are, doe understand first that they are trifles, because they have no profit: the, that they are deceits,

because they do with vain pompbe beguile the eies of the beholders. I speak of those Ceremonies, under which the Romish masters will that there be great mysteries, but we find them by experience to be nothing els but very mockeries. And it is no mattell that the authors of them have fallen so far as to mocke both themselves and others with trifling follies: because they partly tooke their exampler out of the dotages of the Gentiles, and partly after the manner of apes did vnferetly counterfeit the old visages of the law of Moses, which no more pertained to vs than the sacrifices of beasts & such other things. Truly although there were none other argument, yet no man that hath his sound wit will looke for any goodness of a heape to ill patched together. And the thing is selene plainly theweth, that manie Ceremonies have no other use but to amase the people rather than to teach them. So in these new found Canons, that do rather pervert than preserve discipline, the hypocrites repose great importance: but if a man do better looke into them he shall finde that they are nothing else but a shadowish and vanishing shew of discipline.

13 But now (to come to the other point) who doth not see that tradition with heaping one uppon another, are ouergrown into so great a number, that the Christian Church may in no wise bare them. Hereby it is come to passe, that in Ceremonies there appeareth I wot not what Iewithnesse, and the other observations bring a grieuous butchery to Christian soules. Auguisticus complained that in his time, the commandementes of God neglected, all things were ful of so many presupositions, that he was more grieuously rebuked that in his Octaves had touched the ground with bare foot, that he that had buried his wit with drunkennes. He complaineth that the church, which the mercy of God willed to be free, was so burdened, the state of the Jews was much more tolerable. If that holy man had happened to live in our age, with what complaints would he have bewailed the bondage that now is? For both the number is ten times greater, and every small title is a hundred times more rigorously looked vnto, than at that time. So is wont to be done: when these peruerse lawmakers have gotten the dominion, they make no end of bidding & forbidding, till they come to extreme preuishes. Which thing Paul hath also very well declared in these words: If ye be dead to the world, why are ye holden as though ye were living with traditions, as eate not, tast not, handle not? For whereas the Greek word apesibai, signifieth both to eate & to touch, doubtlesse in this place it is taken in the first of these two significations, leaft there should be a superfluous repetitiō. Therefore he doth here excellently well describe the proceedings of the false Apostiles. They begin at superstition, so that they do not only forbid to eate, but also even slenderly to chawe: when they have obtained this, they then also forbid to tast. When this is also granted the, they reckon it not lawful so much as to touch with a finger.

14 This tyrannie in the ordinances of men we doe at this day worthy blame, by which it is come to passe that poore conscience are maruellously tormented with innumerable decrees & immeasurable exacting of keeping of the. Of Canons pertaining to discipline we have spoken in another place. Of the Ceremonies what shall I saye, by which it is brought about that Christi
Christ being half buried, we are returned to Jewish figures: Our Lord Christ (faith Augustine) hath bound together the fellowship of the new people, with Sacraments very few in number, most excellent in signification, most easy in observing. How farre the multitude & diversity of viages wherewith at this day we see the Church to be entangled, doth differ from this simplicity, it cannot be sufficiently declared. I knowe with what crafty shift some subtle men do excuse this peruersenesse. They say that among vs there are many as rude as they were in the people of Israel, that such introduction was ordained for their sakes, which although the stronger may well want, yet they ought not to neglect it, forasmuch as they fee it to be profitable for the weak brethren. I answere, that we are not ignorant, what we owe to the weaknesse of our brethren: but on the other side we take exception and say, that this is not the way whereby the weak may be provided for, that they should be overwhelmed with great heapes of Ceremonies. The Lord did not in vaine put his difference betwene vs and the old people, that his wil was to instruct them like childrē with signes & figures, but vs more simply without such outward furniture. As (faith Paul) a childe is ruled of his schoolemaster, and kept vnder custody, according to the capacitie of his age; so the lewes are kept vnder the law. But we are like unto ful growē me, which being set at liberty from tutorshippe and government, have no more neede of childish introductions. Truely the Lord did foresee what manner of common people there should be in his Church, and how they should be ruled. Yet he did in this manner as we have said, make difference betwene vs and the lewes. Therefore it is a foolish way, if we will provide for the ignorant, in raising vp lewifhnes which is abrogate by Christ. Christ also touched in owne words this difference of the olde & newe people, when he said to the woman of Samaria, that the time was come wherein the true worshippers should worship God in Spirituell and truth. This verily had alway beene done: but the newe worshippers differed from the olde in this pointe, that under Moses the Spirituall worshipping of God was shadowed & in a manner entangled with many Ceremonies, which being abolished, hee is nowe more simply worhipped. Therefore they that confound this difference, do overthrow the order institute & stablishe by Christ. Shall there then (will thou say) no ceremonies be given to the ruder sort to helpe their unskilfulness? I say not, for I verely thinke that this kind of helpe is profitable for them. I do here trannte only that such a meane may be vfed, as may brightely set out Christ and not darken him. Therefore there are given vs of God few Ceremonies, & those not laborome, they should thewe Christ being present. The lewes had moe gien them, that they should be images of him being absent. Absent I say he was, nor in power, but in manner of signifying. Therefore, that meane may be kept, it is necessarie to kepe y fewnes in number, easinesse in observing, and dignity in signifying, which also confieth in clearenes. What neede I to say that this hath not beene done? For the thing itselfe is in all mens eyes.

15 Here I omit with how pernicious opinions mens minds are filled in thinking that they be sacrifices wherewith oblation is rightly made to God, whereby sinnes are clenched, whereby rightousnes & saluation is obtained.
They will deny that good things are corrupted with such forsworn errors: forasmuch as in this behalf a man may no leisely offend in the virc works also commanded of God. But this hath more hainousnes, that so much honor is giuen to works rashly fained by the wil of man, that they are thought to be things deserving eternal life. For the works commanded of God have reward therefore, because the lawmaker himself in respect of obedience accepteth them. Therefore they receive not their value of their own worthines, or of their owne deserving, but because God so much esteemeth our obedience toward him. I speake here of the perfection of works which is commanded of God, & is not performed of men. For therefore the virc works of law which we do, haue no thanke but of the free goodness of God, because in the our obedience is weake & lame. But because we do not here dispute, of what value the virc works are without Christ, therefore let vs passe over that question. I come backe againe to which properly belongeth to this present argument, that whatsoever commendation works haue in the, they have it in respect of the obedience, which only the Lord doth looke vpon, as he testifieth by the Prophet. I gaue not commandement of sacrifices & burnt offerings, but only that ye should with hearing, heare my voice. But of vailed works hee speaketh in another place, saying: Ye wey your fluer, & not in bread. Again, they worship me in vaine with the precepts of men. This therefore they can by no wares excuse, that they suffer the silly people to fecke in those outward trifles the righteousnes whereby they may stand against God & uphold themselves before the heavenly judgement seat. Moreover, is not this a fault worthy to be imputed against, that they shew forth ceremonies not understonded as it were a stage play, or a magical enchantment? For it is certaine that all ceremonies are corrupt & hurtful, vnles men be by the directed to Christ. But the ceremonies that are used under the papacy, are feuered from doctrine, that they may the more hold men in signes without all significations. Finally (such a cunning craftman is the belly) it appeareth that many of the haue been invented by couetous sacrificing priests, to bee snares to catch mony. But what beginning they haue, they are all gone for in common for filthy gaine, that we must needs cut down a great part of them, if we wil bring to passe that there be not a proflane market, and ful of sacrilege used in the Church.

16 Although I seeme not to teach a continual doctrine concerning the ordinances of men, because this speaking is altogether applied to our owne time: yet there is nothing spoken shall not be profitable for all times. For so oft as this superstition creepeth in, that men wil worship God with their owne fained ceremonies, whatsoever they lawes be that are made to that purpose, they do by & by degenerate to those grosse abuses. For the Lord threateneth not this curse to one or two ages, but to all ages of the world; he will strike them with blindness and amazed dulness that worshippe him with the doctrines of men. This blindness continually maketh that they flee from no kind of absurdity, which despising so many warnings of God, do wilfully wrap them selves in those deadlie snares. But if, setting aside circumstances, you will have simply shewed what be the men's traditions of all ages, which it is meet to be rejected of the church, and to be disallowed of all the godly, that same shall be a sure and plain definition which we have above set: that all laws without the word of God are made by men to this end, either to prescribe a manner of worshipping God, or to bind conscience with religion, as though they gave commandment of things necessary to salvation. If to the one or both of these there be joined other faults: that with the multitude they darken the brightness of the Gospel; that they nothing edifie, but be rather vnprofitable and trifling occupations than true exercises of godliness: that they be laid abroad to filthiness and vnhoneste gained: that they be too hard to be kept: that they be defiled with euil superstitions: these shall bee helps that we may the more easely finde how much euill is in them.

17 I heare what they answere for themselues, that their traditions are not of themselues, but of God. For, they say that the Church is governed of the holy Ghost, that it cannot err: and that the authoritie thereof remaineth with them. When this is obtained, it thereafter followeth, that their traditions are the revelations of the holy Ghost, which cannot be despised but wickedly and with the contempt of God. And that they should not seem to have attempted any thing without great authoritie, they will have it beliefed that a great part of their observations came from the Apostles: and they affirme that by one example is sufficiently declared what the Apostles did in other things, when being assembled in one Councell, they did by the decree of the Councell command the Gentiles to abstaine from things offered to idols, from bloud and strangled. Wee haue already in another place declared, howe falsely for boasting of themselues they lyingly usurpe the title of the Church. So much as concerning this present cause: if, plucking away visors, and deceitfull colours, we truely look on that which we ought principally to care for, and which cheelesly is for our behoole, that is, what manner of Church Christ will haue, that we may fashion and frame our selues to the rule thereof: it shall easely bee evident vnto vs, that it is not the Church, which passing the boundes of the worde of God, doth outrage and runne at riot in making of newe laws. For doeth not that lawe which was once prescribed to the Church, remaine eternall? What I commaunde thee, that thou shalt keepe that thou mayest do it. Thou shalt not adde any thing nor take any thing from it. And in another place: Adde not to the worde of the Lord, nor minish any thing: lest he peraduenture reproexe thee, & thou be found a lier. Sith they cannot deny that this was spoken to the church, what do they else but report the stubborne of that church, which they boast to haue bene so bold as after such prohibitions neuer thelesse to adde & mingle of her owne with the doctrine of God? But God forbid that we should affent to their lies, whereby they burden the church with so great a slander: but let vs understonde, that the name of the Church is falsely pretended, so oft as this luft of mens rashnesse is spoken of, which can not hold it self within the prescribed boundes of God, but it wildly rangeth & runneth out into her owne inuentiones? There is nothing entangled, nothing darke, nothing doubtful in these words, in which the whole Church is forbidden to adde to the word of God, or to take any thing from it, when the worshipping of God: and precepts concerning salvation, are entreated of. But this (say they) was spoken of the lawe onely, after which followed the prophecies and the whole.
whole ministration of the Gospel I grant in deed: and I add also, which are rather fulfillings of the law, than additions or diminishing. But if your lord suffered nothing to be added to or take from the ministration of Moses, which was (as I may so term it) dark by reason of many doubfull enwrappings, till he sent them, the Prophets, and at length by his beloved sonne, he ministered a clearer doctrine: why should we not think it much more severely forbidden vs, that we should not add nothing to the lawe, the Prophets, the Psalms, and the Gospel? The Lorde is not gone out of kinde from himself, which hath long ago declared, that he is with nothing so highly offended, as when he is worshipped with the motions of men. Whereof came those notable sayings the Prophets, which ought to have continually founded in our ears: I spake no words to your fathers, in the day that I brought them out of Egypt, concerning sacrifice and burnt offering. But this word I commanded them, saying: With hearing heare my voice: and I will bee your God, and you shall be my people, and you shall walk in all the way that I shall command you. Againe, I had with protesting protested unto your fathers, Heare my voice. And other like sayings: but this is notable about the rest. Will God have burnt offerings and sacrifices, and not rather that his voice be obeyed? For obedience is better than sacrifice, and to harken is better than to offer the fat of Rammes. For, to resist is as the sinne of foolishe saying, and not to obey is as the wickednesse of idolatry. Therefore whatsoever intentions of men are in this behalfe defended with the authoritie of the church, forasmuch as the same cannot be excused from the crime of vngodlines, it is easy to prove that it is falsely imputed to the Church.

The Apostles no authors of those things, for which their names are pretended in the Church of Rome.

18 After this sort we freely inuync against this tyranny of mens traditions, which is prouduely thrust in among vs, under the title of the church. For neither doe we scorne the Church (as our adversaries, to bring vs in hatred, do vniustly lie vpon vs) but we giue vs to her the praise of obedience, than which the knoweth no greater praisse. They rather are very sore wrong doers to the Church, which make her obstinate against her Lorde, while they feyne that the hath proceeded further than shee lawfully might doe by the word of God: though I speake nothing how it is a notable shamelesnes joyned with as great malice, continually to cry out of the authoritie of the church, & in the mean time difsemblingly to hide both what is commanded her by the Lord, & what obedience be oweth to the commandement of the Lord. But if we have a mind, as it is meete we should have, to agree with the church, this pertaineth rather to the purpose, to have an eye vnto & remember what is commanded by the Lord both to vs and the Church, that wee should with one agreement obey him. For ther is no doubt but we shall very well agree with the Church, if wee doe in all things shewe our selves obedient to the Lorde. But now to father vpon the Apostles, the original of all the traditions wherewith the church hath bene hither to oppressed, was a point of meere deceit: forasmuch as the doctrine of the Apostles trauaileth wholly to this end, that consciences should not be burdened with new observations, nor the worshipping of God be defiled with our inventions. Moreover if there be any faithfulness in histories and ancient monuments, the apostles not only never knew, but also never heard of this, that they attribute vnto them.
Neither let the prate, that the most part of their decrees were received in vfe & in mens behauiors, which never were put in writing; euery those things forsooth, which, while Christ was yet living, they could not understand, after his ascending they learned by the revelation of the holy ghost. Of the expostion of that place we have els where already seene. So much as is sufficient for this present cause: truly they make these elues worthy to be laughed at, while they saine y those great mysteries, which so long time were un- knowen to the Apostles, were partly obseruations either Jewish or Gentile (of which all the one sort had ben long before published among the Jewes, & all the other sort among the Gentiles), and partly foolish gesticulings & vayne pety ceremonies, which foolish sacrificing priests that can neither skill of swimming nor of letters, vse to do very trimly: yea such as children & fools do so aptly counterfeit that it may seeme y there be no better ministers of such holy mysteries. If there were no histories at all: yet men y haue their sou’d wit might consider by the thing it selfe, y so great a heape of ceremonies & obseruations did not sodenly burst into the Church, but by little & little creeping. For when those holier Bishops, which were next in time to the Apostles, had ordained some things that belonged to order & discipline, afterward there followed men, some after other, not discretion enough, and too curious and greedie, of which the later that every one was, so he more striued with his predecessors in foolish envious counterfattig, not to give place in inventing of new things. And because there was peril leaft their deuises woulde shortly grow out of vse, by which they coueted to get praise among their posteritie, they were much more rigorous in exact calling vpon the keeping of them. This wrongfull zeale hath bred vs a great part of these ceremonies which they set out vnto vs for Apostolike. And this also the histories doe testifie.

19. Least in making a regifter of them we should be too tedious: we will be content with one example. In the ministring of the Lords supper, there was in y Apostles time great simplicity. The next successors, to garnish the dignity of the mystery, added somewhat that was not to be disallowed. But afterward there came those foolish counterfeiters, which with now & then patching of pieces together, have made vs this apparel of the priests which we see in the Mass, those ornaments of the altar, thse gesticulings, & the whole furniture of vnprofitable thinges. But they obiect, this that in old time was the perusadiso, that those things which were with one consent done in the vnuerseall Church, came from the Apostles themselfes, whereof they cite Augustine for witness. But I will bring a solution from no other where than out of the wordes of Augustine himselfe. Those things (sayeth hee), that are kept in the whole world, we may understand to have beene ordained either of the Apostles themselfes, or of the general Councels, whose authoritie is most healthfull in the Church: as, that the Lords passion, and resurrection, and his ascending into heaven, and the coming of the holy Ghost, are celebrate with yearely solemnitie: and whatsoever like thing be found, that is kept of the whole Church, which way soever it be spread abroad. When he reckeneth vppen so fewe examples, who doth nor see that he meant to impute to authors worthy of credit and reverence, the obser-observations that then were vned, even none but those simple, rare, & sober ones, with which it was profitable the order of the Church should be kept together. But how far doth this differ from that which the Romish masters would enforce men to graunt, that there is no petie ceremony among the that ought not to be judged Apostolike.

20 That I be not too long, I will bring forth only one example. If any man aske them, whence they have their holy water: they by & by answere, from the Apostles. As though the histories do not attribute this invention to I sot not what Bishop of Rome, which truly, if he had called the Apostles to counsel, would never have defiled Baptisme with a strange & vnitive signe. Albeit I do not think it like to be true, that the beginning of that halowing is so old as it is there written. For, that which Augustin saith, that certain Churches in his time did shun that solemn following of Christes example in washing of feet, I aske that vslave should seeme to pertaine to Baptisme, secretly sheweth that there was then no kind of washing that had any likeenes with baptism. Whatsoever it be, I will not graunt that this proceeded fro an Apostolike spirit, by baptism, while it is with a daily signe brought into remembrance, should after a certaine manner be repeated. And I passe not vp this, the selfsame Augustine in an other place ascribeth other things also to the Apostles. For that he hath nothing but coniectures, judgement ought not vp them to be guen of so great a matter. Finally, admit that we graunt them also, that those things which he reheareseth came from the time of the Apostles: Yet there is great difference betweene instituting some exercise of godlines, which the faithful with a free conscience may vie, or if the vs: of it shal not be profitable for them, they may forbear it: and making a law that may shre conscience with bondage. But now, fro what author soever they proceeded, sith we see they are slidden into so great a abuse, nothing with standeth, but that we may without offence of him abolis them: forasmuch as they were never so commendd, that they must be perpetually immovable.

21 Neither doth it much helpe them, that to exce their tyranny they pretend the example of the Apostles. The Apostles (say they) & the elders of the first church, made a decree beside the commandement of Christ, wherein they commanded all the Gentils to abstaine from things offered to idols, from strangled, & from bloude. If that was lawfull for them, why is it not also lawfull for their successors, to follow their example so oft as occasio so requireth? I would to God, they did both in all other things & in this thing folowe the. For I deny that the apostles did there institute or decree any new thing, which is eafe to be proued by a strong reason. For wheres Peter in his counsell pronounceth, that God is tempted, if a yoke be laid upon the necks of the disciples: he doth himselfe overthrow his owne sentence, if he afterward consent to have any yoke laid vpon them. But there is a yoke laide, if the Apostles do decree of their own authoritie that the Gentils should be forbidden, they should not touch things offered to idols, bloude, & strangled. In deede there yet remaineth a doubt, for that they do notertheless seeme to forbid. But this doubt shall easelie be dissolued, if a man do more nerely consider the meaning of the decree it selfe: in the order and effect whereof the chiefe chiefe point is, that to the Gentiles their libertie to be left, and that they ought not to be troubled, nor accommbred about the observation of the law. Hitherto it very well maketh of our side. But the exception that immediately followeth, neither is any new lawe made by the Apostles, but the divine & eternal commandement of God, y'charitie ought not to be broken, nor doth diminish one title of that libertie but only admonisheth the Gentiles, how they should temper themselves to their brethren, that they abuse not their liberty to the offence of them. Let this therefore be the second point, that the Gentiles should vs a harmlesse libertie, & without offence of their brethren. But yet they prescribe some certain thing; y'is, they teach and appoint, so far as was expedient for the time, by what things they might run into the offence of their brethren, that they might beware of those things: but they add no newe thing of their own to the eternall law of God, which forbiddeth the offending of brethren.

22 Like as if the faithful Pastors which governo the Churches not yet well reformed, should command all their people, till the weak with whom they live do growe stronger, they should not openly eate flesh on Friday, or openly labour vpon holy dayes, or any such thing. For although these things setting superstitious aside, are by themselves indifferent; yet when is added offence of brethren, they cannot be done without a fault. But the times are such, that the faithful cannot shewe such a sight to the weake brethren, but they shall sore wound their consciences. Who but a carefull, will say that so they make a newe lawe, whereas, it is certaine, that they doe only prevent offences, which are expressly enough forbidden of the Lorde? And no more can it be said of the Apostles, whose purpose was nothing els, but in taking away the matter of offences, to call vpon the law of God concerning the avoiding of offence: as if they had sayde: It is the Lorde's commandement that ye offend not a weake brother. Yee can not eate things offered to images, strangled and bloud, but that the weake brethren shal be offended. Therefore we command you in the word of the Lorde, that ye eat not with offence. And that the Apostles had respect to the same thing, Paul himselfe is a very good witness, which writeth thus verily none other wise than according to the meaning of the Counsell: Concerning meats that are offered to idols, we know that the idol is nothing. But forre with conscience of the Idoles, doe eat it as offered to idols, and their conscience, forasmuch as it is weake, is defiled. See that your libertie bee not made an offence to the weak. He that shall have well weighed these things, shall not afterwards bee deceived with such a false colour as they make, that pretend the apostles for defence of their tiranie, as though the apostles had begun with their decree to breake the liberty of the Church. But, that they may not bee able to escape, but bee driven even with their own confession to allow this solution, lette them aunswere mee, by what right they were so bolde to abrogate the same decree. Because there was no more perill of those offences and dissentions which the Apostles meant to provide for, and they know that the lawe was to be weighed by the end thereof. Forasmuch as therefore this lawe was made in respect of charitie, there is nothing prescribed in it, but so much as pertaineth to charity. When they confesseth the transgressing of this lawe is nothing.
nothing but a breaking of charitie, do they not therewithall acknowledge, if it is not a forged addition to the law of God, but a natural and simple appliance to the times and manners whereunto it was directed?

23 But although such laws be a hundred times vnuist and injurious vnto vs, yet they affirm, that they must be heard without exception: for they say that this is not here intended, that we should consent to errors, but only that being subjectes we should bære the hard commandements of our gouern-sours, which it is not our partes to refuse. But here also the Lorde very well refisteth them with the truth of his word, and deliuereth vs out of such bondage into the libertie, which he hath purchased for vs with his holy bloude, the benefit whereof he hath more than once confirmed with his worde. For that is not here only intended (as they maliciously faine) yet we should suffer some grievous oppression in our body, but that our consciences being spoiled of their liberty that is of the benefit of the bloud of Christ, should be feruirely tormented. But ifbeit let vs passe over this also, as though it made little to the matter. But of how great importance do we think it is, that y Lords kingdom is taken away from him, which he claimeth to himself with so great feuerity? But it is taken away so oft as he is worshipped with the lawes of mens inuictions, whereas he will be holde for the onely lawmaker of his owne worship. And leaft any man shoulde think it to be a matter of nothing, let vs see here how much the Lord efteemeth it. Because (sayth he) this people hath feared me with the commandement and doctrine of men, behold I wil astonish them with a great and wonderous miracle. For wisdome shall perish from the wisemen thereby, & understanding shall depart from the elders. In an other place, They worship me in vaine, teaching doctrines, the commandements of men. And truely whereas the children of Israel defiled themselues with many idolatries, y cause of all that evil is ascribed to this vncclean mixture, y tranfgressing the commandements of God, they have forged newe worshipping. And therefore the holy history reheareth y the new strangers y had bin transplanted by the king of Babylon to inhabit Samaria, were torne in peeces & consumed of wilde beasts, because they knew not y judgements or statutes of the God of that land. Although they had nothing offended in the Ceremonies, yet God would not have allowed a vaine pompe but in the meane time he ceas'd not to take vengeance of the desiling of his worship, for that men did thrust in deuises strange from his word, Whereupon it is afterward said, that they being made asaide with that punishment, received the Ceremonies prescribed in the lawe: but because they did not yet purely worship the true God, it is twice repeated that they did feare him & did not feare him. Whereupon we gather, y the part of reverence which is giuen to him, consisteth in this, while in worshipping him wee simply followe what he commandeth with mingling none of our inuictions. And therefore the godly kings are oftentimes prayed, because they did according to all the commandements, and declined not to the right hand nor to the left. I go yet further, although in some fayned worshipping ther do not openly appeare vn godlines, yet it is feuerely condemned of the holy Ghoste, so soone as men depart from the commandement of God, The Altar of Abar, the patern wherof was brought out of Samaria, might have seemed to encrease y garnishment of the temple, whereas his devise was to offer Sacrifices thereto God only, which he should do more honorably than upon the first and old Altar, yet we see how the spirit detesteth that boldness, for none other cause but for that the inventions of men in the worshipping of God are unconsciences corruptions. And how much more clearly the will of God is opened unto vs, so much the less excusable is our frowardness to attempt any thing. And therefore worthily with this circumstance the crime of man's wisdom is enforced, for that he builded a new Altar in Jerusalem, of which God had pronounced, I will there set my name, because the authority of God is now as it were of let purpose refused.

24 Many doe marvel why God so sharply threateneth that hee will do things to be wondred at to the people of whom he was worshipped with the commandements of men, and pronounceth that he is worshipped in vaine with the precepts of men. But if they considered, what it is in the cause of religion, that is to say of heavenly wisdom, to hang upon the only mouth of God, they would therewithall see, that it is the slender reason why God so abhorreth such pernicious services, that are done to him according to the luft of man's wit. For although they that obey such laws for the worshipping of God, have a certaine degree of humilitie in this their obedience, yet they are not humble before God, to whom they praiseth the same laws which they themselves do keep. This is the reason why Paul will eth vs so diligently to beware, that we be not deceived by the traditions of men, and that which he calleth the heathens, that is, Wilworship invented of men beside the doctrine of God. This is verily true, both our owne wisdom, and men's wisdom must be foolish vs, that wee may suffer him alone to be wise. Which way they keepe not which doe studie with pettie observations tained by the will of men to commend themselves unto him, and do thrust vs, as it were against his will, a transgresing obedience toward him, which is indeede given to men. As if hath been done both in many ages heretofore, & in the time within our own remembrance, and is also at this day done in those places where the authority of the creature is more esteemed than of the creator: where religion (if yet the same be worthy to be called religion) is defined with more & more vnauctic superstitious, than ever was any Paynim wickednes. For what could the wit of men breed but all things carnall and foolish & such as truly resemble their authors?

25 Whereas also the Patrons of superstitions alledge, that Samuel sacrificed in Ramatha, & although the same was done beside the law, yet it pleased God: the solution is easie, that it was not a certaine second Altar to set against the one only Altar: but because the place was not yet appointed for the arke of covenant, he appointed the town where hee dwelled for sacrifices, as the most convenient place. Truely the mind of the holy prophet was not to make any innovatation in holy things, whereas God had so straitly forbidden any thing to be added or diminish. As for the example of Menasha, I say it was an extraordinarie & singular case. He being a private man offered sacrifice to God & not without the allowance of God: verily because he enteredprised it not of a rash motion of his own mind, but by a heavenly institution. But how much the Lord abhorreth those things, men devise of them.

Iud. 8. 27

The ministeriall authoritie of Scribes & Pharisees confirmed by Christ but not their presumption to burden men with what they listed.

Mat. 23. 3 & 16. 6

In Joh. Tract. 46

In forbidding mens confessions to be charged with humane traditions, lawses whereby the Church is set in order are not premised.

Jesu's to worship him withal, another not inferior to Menoba Cedeon is a notable example, whose Ephod turned to destruction not only to him & his familie, but to the whole people. Finally, every new found invention, where with men court to worship god, is nothing else but a defiling of true holines.

26 Why then (say they) did Christ will that those intolerable burdens should be borne, which the Scribes and Pharisees bound upon men: But why in another place did the same Christ will that men should beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, calling Leauen (as Matthew the Evangelist expounded it) their own doctrine that they mingled with the purenesse of the word of God? What would we have more plaine, than that wee bee commanded to flee and beware of all their doctrine? Whereby it is made most certaine unto vs, that in the other place also the Lord willed not, that the consciences of his should be vexed with the Pharisees own traditions. And the verie words, if they be not wrested, sound of no such thing. For the Lord purposing there to inuige sharply against the manners of the Pharisees, did first simply instruct them that heard him, that although they sawe nothing in their life meete for them to follow, yet they should not cease to do those things which they taught in words, while they sat in the chaire of Moses, that is, to declare the Lawe. Therefore he meant nothing else but to provide that the common people shoulde not with the evil examples of the teachers be brought to despise the doctrine. But as many are nothing at all moued with reasons, but alway require authoritie, I will alledge Augustines words, in which the verie same thing is spoken. The Lords sheepefold hath governours, some faithfull, and some hirelings. The governours that are faithfull, are true Pasteors: but hear ye, that the hirelings also are necessaries: for many in the Church following earthly profites, do preach Christ, and by them the voice of Christ is heard: and the sheepe do follow, not a hireling, but a Pastor by the meanes of a hireling. Hear ye that hirelings are shewed by the Lord himselfe. The Scribes (saith hee) and the Pharisees sit in the chayre of Moses. Doe ye see those things that they saye, but doe not those things that they doe. What other thing saide he, but hear ye the voice of the Pastor by the hirelinges? For in sitting in the chaire they teach the lawe of GOD: therefore God teacheth by them. But if they will teach their owne, hear ye it not, doe ye it not. This faith Auguistine.

27 But whereas many vskillful men, when they heare that consciences are wickedly bounde and God worshipped in vaine with the traditions of men, do at once blot out altogether all lawes whereby the order of the Church is set in frame: therefore it is convenient also to meete with their error. Verily in this point it is easie to bee deceived, because at the first sight it doeth not by and by appeare what difference is betwene the one sorte and the other. But I will so plainly in fewe wordes set out the whole matter, that the likeness may deceive no man. First let vs hold this, that if we see in euery fellowship of men some politic to bee necessarie, that may ferue to nourish common peace, and to retaine concorde: if we see that in the doing of thinges there is alway some orderly forme, which is behoouefull for publike honestie and for verie humanitie not to be refued: the the same ought chiefly to be observed in Churches, which are both best maintained by a well framed disposition of all things, and without agreement are no Churches at all. Therefore if we will have the safety of the Church we must altogether diligently procure that which Paul commandeth, that all things be done comely and according to order. But forasmuch as there is so great diversity in the manners of men, so great variety in minds, so great disagreement in judgments & wits: neither is there any politic so fast enough, vnleffe it bee established by certaine laws, not any orderly usage can be observed without a certaine appointed forme: Therefore we are so farre off from condemning the laws that are profitable to this purpose, that we affirm that when those be taken away, Churches are dissembled from their finenes, and vitally deformed and scattered abroad. For this which Paul requireth, that all things bee done decently and in order, cannot bee had, vnleffe the order it selfe and comelinesse bee established, with observations adoinned as with certaine bondes. But this onely thing is alway to be excepted in those observations, that they bee not either beleued to be necessarie to salvation, and so bind consciences with religion, or be applied to the worshipping of God, and so godlines be reposied in them.

28 We have therefore a very good and most faithfull marke, which pur- that difference betweene those wicked ordinances, by which we have said that true religion is darkened and consciences subverted, and the lawfull observations of the Church; if we remember that the lawfull observations tende alway to one of these two thinges or to both together, that in the holy assemblie of the faithfull all thinges bee done comely and with suche dignitie as befemeth; and that the very common fellowhippe of men should bee kept in order as it were by certaine bondes of humanitie and moderation. For when it is once vnderstonde that the lawe is made for publike honesties sake, the superstition is now taken away, into which they fall that measure the worshipping of God by the inventions of men. Again when it is known that it pertaineth to common vse, then that false opinion of bondes and necessitie is ouerthrown, which did strike a great terror into consciences, when traditions were thought necessarie to salvation. For herein is nothing required but that charitie should with common ducitfull doing be nourished among vs. But it is good yet to define more plainely, what is comprehended vnder that comelinesse which Paul commendeth, and also what vnder order. The ende of comelinesse is, partly that when such Ceremonies are vsed as may procure a reverence to holy thinges, we may by such helps be stirred vp to godlinesse: partly also that the modesty and grauitie which ought to be seen in all honest doinges may there in principally appeare.

In order this is the first point, that they which gouerne may knowe the rules and lawes to rule well: and the people which are gouerned may be accustomed to obeying of God, and to right discipline: Then, that the state of the Church being well framed, peace and quietnes may be provided for.

29 Therefore wee shall not say that comelinesse is, wherein shall be nothing but vaine defection: such as we see in that playerlike apparet, which

The differences betweene vnic- ked observations and the lawfull observations of the Church.
Of the outwárde meane of the Papistes use in their ceremonies, where appeareth nothing else, but an unprofitable visor of gaines, and excuse without fruite. But we shall account that to be comelinesse which shall be meeke for the reverence of holy mysteries, that it be a fit exercise to godlinesse, or at least such as shall serve to convenient garnishing for the celebrating thereof; and the same not without fruite, but that it may put the faithfull in mind, with howe greate modestie, religiousnesse and reverence, they ought to handle holy things. Nowe, that ceremonies may be exercises of godlinessse, it is necessary that they leade vs the right way to Christ. Likewise wee maie not say that order consisteth in those trifling pomps that have nothing else than a vanishing gaines: but that it standeth in such an orderly framing as maie take away all confusion, barbarousnesse, obstinacie, and strife, and disentions, Of the first sorte are these examples in Paul's prophane bankettings should not bee mingled with the holie Supper of the Lorde: that women should not come abrade, butcovered: and many other which wee have in common vs: as this, that we pray kneeling and bare headed: that we minister the Lordes Sacramentes not vnleanly, but with some dignite: that in the burying of the dead we vs some honest shewe: and other things that are of the same sorte. Of the other kinde are the houres appointed for publicke prayers, sermons, and celebrations of mysteries: at sermons, quietnesse and silence, places appointed, singing together of hymnes, daies prefixed for celebrating of the Lordes Supper, that Paul forbidde that women should teach in the Church: and such like. But specially those things that concern discipline, as the teaching of the catechisme, the censures of the Church, excommunication, fastings, & such as may be reckoned in the same number. So all the constitutions of the Church, which we receive for holy and wholesome, we may referre to two chiefe titles: for some pertaine to rites, & ceremonies, and the other to discipline and peace.

But because here is peril, least on the one side the false bishops should thereby catch a pretence to excuse their wicked and tyrannous lawes, and least on the other side there be some men too fearfull, which admonished with the aforesaid evils do leave no place to lawes, be they never so holic: here it is good to protest, that I allow only those ordinances of men which be both grounded upon the authoritie of God, & taken out of the scripture, ye and altogether Gods owne. Let vs take for an example the kneeling which is used in time of common prayer. It is demanded, whether it be a tradition of man, which every man may lawfully refuse or neglect. I say that it so of me, that it is also of God. It is of God; in respect that it is a part of that comelinesse, the care and keeping whereof is commended unto vs by the Apostle; it is of men, in respect that it specially berokeneth that which had in generallie rather beene pointed to, than declared. By this one example wee may judge, what is to be thought of that whole kinde: verily because the Lorde hath in his holic Oracles both faithfully contained and clearly set forth both the whole summe of true righteousnesse, and all the parts of the worshipping of his divine Maieftie, and whatsoever was necessary to salvation: therefore in these things he is onelie to be hearde as our Schoolemaister. But because in outward discipline and ceremonies his will will was not to prescribe each thing particularly what we should do (because he foresaw this to hang upon the state of times, and did not think one form to be fit for all ages) herein we must flee to those general rules which he hath given, that thereby all those things should be tried which the necessity of the Church shall require to be commanded for order and comliness. Finally, Forasmuch as he hath therefore taught nothing expressly, because these things both are not necessary to salvation, and according to the manners of every nation and age ought diversly to be applied to the edifying of the Church; therefore as the profite of the church shall require, it shall be convenient as well to change and abrogate those that be used, as to institute newe. I grant it indee, that we ought not rashly, nor yet, nor for light causes to runne to innovation. But what may hurt or edifie, charity shall best judge: which if we will suffer to be the gouernes, all shall be safe.

31 Nowe it is the dutie of Christian people, to keepe such things as have beene ordained according to this rule, with a free conscience & without any superstition, but yet with a godly and easie readiness to obey, not to despise them, nor to passe them over with carelesse negligence. So farre is it of, that they ought by pride and obstinacie openly to breake them. What manner of libertie of conscience (will thou say) may there bee in so great observation and warinesse? Yea, it shall stand excellently well when wee shall consider, that they are not stedfast and perpetuall stayed lawes, whereunto wee be bounde, but outwarde rudimentes for the weakenesse of men: which although we do not all neede, yet wee doe all use them, because wee are mutually one bound to another, to nourish charitie among vs. This wee may reknowledge in the examples about rehearsed. What? Doeth religion stande in a womans veile, that it is not lawfull to goe out of dores with her head uncoveredd? Is that holy decree of his concerning silence, such as cannot be broken without most hainous offence? Is there any mysterie in kneeling, or in burying of a dead carcase, that may not be omitted without sinne? No, For if a woman neede, for the helping of her neighbour, to make such haste as may not suffer her to cover her head, shee offendeth not if shee runne thither with her head uncovered. And it may sometime befall that it may be no lesse convenient for her to speake, than at another time to holde her peace. And there is no cause to the contrarie, but that he which by reason of disease cannot bow his knees may pray standing. Finally, it is better to bury a dead man speedily in time, than when they lacke a winding sheet, or when there be not men present to convey him, to carrie till he be not vnburied. But nevertheless these things there is somewhat which the manner and ordinances of the country, and finally very natural honestie and the rule of modestie appoineth: to bee done or avoided: wherein if a man swarte any thing from them, by vnwarines, or forgetfulnesse, there is no crime committed: but if vpon contempt, such stubbornesse is to bee disallowed. Likewise the dayes themselves, which they bee, and the houres, and howe the places be builded, and what Psalmes be song vpon which day, it maketh no matter. But it is meete that there bee both certaine dayes, and appointed houres, and a place fitte to receiue all, if there bee regardde had of the preservation

The obedience required unto lawful ordinances of the church.
Cap. 11.  Of the outwarde meanes utation of peace. For how great an occasi on of these things bee, if it were lawful for every man as he list, to change those things that belong to common state: forasmuch as it will never come to passe that one same thing shall please all men, if things be left as it were in the midstst to the choice of every man? If any man do carpe against vs, and will herein bee more wise than hee ought, let him see himselfe by what rea son hee can defende his owne preciseness to the Lorde. As for vs, this say ning of Paul ought to satisfie vs, that wee haue not an vs to contend, nor the Churches of God.

32 Moreover it is with great diligence to be indented, that no error creepe in, that may corrupt or obscure this pure vs. Which shallbe obtei ned, if all obseruations, whatsoever they shall be, shall have a shew of manifest profit, and if very fewe bee received: but principally if there be adoyed a faythfull doctrine of the Pastors, that may stoppe vp the waye to perverse opinions. This knowledge maketh that in all these things every man may have his owne libertie preferred, and nevertheless shall willingly charge his owne libertie with a certaine necessitie, so farre as either this cornelineffe that wee haue spoken of, or the order of Charitie shal require.
Secondly, that both wee our selves shoule without any superstition be bu sied in the observing of those things, and shoule not too precisly require them of other, so as wee shoule thinke the worshipping of God to bee the better for the multitude of ceremonies: that one Church shoule not despise another for the diuersitie of discipline: lest of all that setting herein no perpetuall lawe to our selves, wee shoule referre the whole vs and ende of obseruations to the edification of the Church, that when it requireth we may without any offence suffer not onely somewhat to bee changed, but all the obseruations that were before in vs among vs, to bee altered. For this age is a present experience, that certaine rites, which otherwise are not ungodly nor vncomely, may according to the fit occasion of the matter, bee conveniently abrogated. For (such hath bene the blindenesse and ignorance of the former times) Churches haue heretofore, with so corrupt opinion and with so stiffe affection, stuck in ceremonies, that they can scarcely be sufficiently purged from monstrous superstitions, but that many cememo ries must be taken away, which in olde time were peraduenture ordered not without cause, and of them selves haue no notable ungodlines in them.

The xi. Chapter.

Of the jurisdiccon of the Church, and the abuse thereof, such as is seen in the Papacie.

No we remaineth the thirde part of the power of the Church, yea & the cheefe part in a well ordered state, which wee haue said to consist in iu risdiction. The whole jurisdiction of the Church pertaineth to the disci pline of maner, of which we shall entreat by and by. For as much as nocitie or no town can stand without magistrate & policie: the church of God (as I have
To Salutation. Lib.4. 404

I have already taught, but now I am compelled to repeat it again, needeth her certain spiritual policies; but such as is utterly severed from the ciuile policy, and doth so nothing hinder or diminish it, that it rather doth much help and further it. Therefore this power of jurisdiction shall in a summe be nothing else but an order framed for the preservation of spiritual policy. To this end from the beginning were ordained judiciall orders in Churches, which might vfe examination of maners, correct vices & exercise the office of the keys. This order Paul speaketh of in the Epistle to the Corinthians, when he nameth governments. Again, to the Romans, when he faith: let him that ruleth, rule in carefulnes. For he speaketh not to the magistrates, (for at that time there were no Christian magistrates) but to them y were joinyned with the Pastors for the spiritual government of the church. Also in the Epistle to Timothee, he maketh two sorts of Elders: some that labor in the word: other some, that do not vfe the preaching of the word, & yet doe rule well. By this latter sort it is no doubt that he meaneth the y were appointed to looke vnto maners, and to the whole vfe of the keys. For this power, of which we nowe speake, hangeth wholly vpon the keys which Christ gaceth to the Church, in the xviii. Chap. of Matthew : where hee commandeth, that they should be sharply admonished in the name of the whole Church, that have despised private monitions: but if they goe forwarde in their obstinacie, he teacheth that they should be put out of the fellowship of the faithfull. But these monitions & corrections cannot be done without knowledge of the cause: therefore there needeth both some judgement and order. Wherefore vnlesse we will make voide the promise of the keys, & take vnto vs excommunication, solemne monitions, & all such things whatsoever they be: we must needs give to the Church some jurisdiction. Let the readers marke that that place entretareth not of the generall authority of doctrine, as in the xvi. Chapter of Matthew, and the xxi. of John: but that the power of the Synagogue is for the time to come transferred to the flock of Christ. Untill that day the lewes had their order of governours, which Christ establisheth in his Church, and that with great penalitie, so much as concerneth the pure institution of it. For so it behoved, forasmuch as otherwise the judgement of an vnnoble and vnregarded congregation might be despised of rath and proude men. And that it shoulde not encomber the readers, that Christ doeth in the same wordes express things somewhat differing one from the other, it shall be profitable to dissolve this doubt. There be therefore two places, that speake of binding and loosing. The one is in the xvi. Chapter of Matthew, where Christ, after that he had promised that he would give to Peter the keys of the kingdom of heaven; immediately added, that whatsoever he shall bind or loose in earth, shall be confirmed in heaven. In which wordes he meaneth none other thing, than hee doeth by other wordes in John, when sending his discipiles to preach, after that he had breathed vpon them he saide: whose sins ye forgiv, they shall be forgiven, and whose ye retaineth, they shall be retained in heaven, I will bring an exposition not sultte, not enforced, not wrestled: but natural, flowing, and offering itself. This commandement of forgiving and retaining sinnes, & that promise of binding and loosing made to Peter, ought to be referred to...
Cap. 11. Of the outwärde meanes

no other thing but to the ministerie of the worde: which when the Lorde committed to the Apostles, he did therewith also armé them with this office of binding and loosing. For what is the summe of the Gospel, but that wee all being the bond-servantes of sinne, and of death, are loosed and made free by the redemption that is in Christ Jesus: and that they which do not receive nor acknowledge Christ their deliverer and redeemer, are damned and adjudged to everlasting bonds? When the Lord delivered this message to his Apostles, to be carried into all nations: to approve that it was his owne & proceeding from himself, he honored it with this noble testimonie: and that to the singular strengthening both of the Apostles themselves, and of all those to whom it should come. It beoved that the Apostles should have a steadfast and founde certaintie of their preaching, which they should not only execute with infinite labours, cares, troubles and dangers, but also at the laft scale it with their blood. That they might (I say) knowe the same to bee not vaine nor voide, but full of power and force: it beoved that in so great carefulnesse, in so great hardnesse of thinges, and in so great dangers, they should be persuadé that they did the business of God: that when all the worldes worshode them, and fought against them, they should knowe that God stoode on their side: that having not Christ the author of their doctrine present by sight in earth, they should understand him to be in heaven, to confirme the truth of the doctrine which he had delivered them. It beoved againe that it should also be most certainly proved by testimonie to the earthen, that that doctrine of the Gospell was not the worde of the Apostles, but of God himselfe: not a voice bred in earth, but come downe from heaven. For these thinges, the forgivingnesse of sinnes, the promise of everlasting life, the message of salvation, cannot bee in the power of man. Therefore Christ hath testified, that in the preaching of the Gospell there is nothing of the Apostles, but the onely ministerie: that it was bee himselfe that spake and promiséd all thinges by their mouthes as by instruments: and therefore that the forgivingnesse of sinnes which they preached, was the true promise of God: and the damnation which they pronounced, was the certaine judgement of God. But this testifying is given to all ages, and remaineth in force, to certify and assure all men, that the worde of the Gospell, by what man soever it bee preached, is the verie sentence of God, published at the soueraigne judgement seat, written in the booke of life, ratified, firme and fixed in heaven. Thus wee see that in those places the power of the keyes is nothing but the preaching of the Gospell: and that it is not so much a power as a ministerie, if we have respect to men. For Christ hath not given this power properly to men, but to his owne worde, whereof he hath made men ministers.

2. The other place which we have said to be concerning the power of binding and loosing, is in the xviii. Chapter of Matthew, where Christ faith: If any brother heare not the Church, let him be to thee as a heathen man or a publicane. Verily I say vnto you: what soever ye bind upon earth, shalbe bounde also in heaven: what soever ye loose shalbe loosed. This place is not altogether like the first, but is a little otherwise to be understood. But I doe not so make them diverse, that they have not great affinity together.
This first point is like in both, that either of them is a general sentence: that in both there is always all one power of binding and loosing, namely by the word of God, all one commandment, all one promise. But herein they differ, that the first place peculiarly belongeth to preaching, which the ministers of the word do execute: his latter place to the discipline of Excommunication, which is committed to the Church. The Church bindeth, whom the excommunicateth not that the sower him into perpetual ruine and desperation, but because he condemneth his life and manner, and unless he repent, doth already warn him of his damnation. She leseth whom the receiceth into communion: because she doth make him as it were partaker of the vitriolic which he hath in Christ Iesus. Therefore that no man should obstinately dispute the judgement of the church, or little regard that he is condemned by the consenting oyces of the faithfull: the Lord testifieth that such judgment of the faithful is nothing else but a publishing of his own sentence: and that whatsoever they do in earth, is confirmed in heaven. For they have the wordes of God, whereby they may condemne the peruserse: they haue the wordes, whereby they may receive the repentaunte into grace. And they can not err, nor dissent from the judgement of God; because they judge not but after the law of God, which is not an uncertaine or earthly opinion, but the holy will of God, & a heavenly oracle. Out of these two places, which I think I have both briefly & familiarly and truly expounded, those surious men without difference as they be caried with their owne giddinesse, go about to establish sometime confection, sometime excommunication, sometime jurifidiction, sometime the power to make lawes, sometime pardons, But the first place they aledge to establish the supremacy of the Sea of Rome: they can so well skill to fit their keyes to all lockes and doores, that a man may say they have practised smithes craft all their life.

3 For whereas many thinke that those things endured but for a time, when the Magistrats were yet strangers from the profession of our religion: they are deceived in this, they consider not, howe great difference and what manner of vilenesse there is of the Ecclesiastical & civill power. For the Church hath not the power of the sword to punish or restraine, no empire to commande, no prison, no other paines which the Magistrate is wont to lay upon men. Again, it tendeth not to this ende, that he that hath sinneth should be punished against his will, but should with willing chastisement profession his repentance. Therefore there is a farre diverser order, because neither doth the Church take to itselfe any thing which properly belongeth to the Magistrate, nor the magistrate can execute that which the church doth. This shalbe made plainer by an example. Is any man dronke? In a well ordered citie prison shalbe his punishment. Hath he committed fornication? He shal haue like, or rather greater punishment. So shal both the lawes, & the magistrate, & outward judgement be satisfied: But it may be that he shal give no signification of repentance, but rather murmure & grudge against it. Shall the Church in this case doe nothing? But such cannot be receiued to the Supper, without doing wrong both to Christ and his holy institution. And reason requireth this, that hee which offendeth the Church with an evil example

The difference be-

senr's judgement & civill, and the

for the one as the other to continue.
example, should with solemn declaration of repentance take away the offence which he hath raised. The reason which they bring that are of contrary opinion, is too cold. Christ say they committed these doings to the Church, when there was no magistrate to execute them. But it happeneth often times that the magistrate is more negligent, yea sometime peradventure that himselfe is to be chastised, which happened to the Emperor Theodosius. There may be side to this much be said of the ministration of the worde. Now therefore after their sentence, let Pastors cease to blame manifist wicked doings, let them cease to chide, to reproove, to rebuke, for there be Christian magistrates, which ought to correct these things with the law and with the sword. But as the Magistrate ought by punishing, and by restraining with force, to purge the Church of offences, so likewise the minister of the worde for his part ought to helpe the magistrate that there may not so many offend. So ought their workings to be contynued, that the one may bee a help, not a hinderance to the other.

4 And truly if a man more secretly wry the words of Christ, he shall easilie perceiue that in these places, is described a stayed state, and a perpetuall order of the Church, not such as endureth but for a time. For it is not meete that we should accuse them to the magistrate, that will nor obey our monitions; which yet should be necessarie if the magistrate succeede into the office of the Church. What is this promise? Shall we say that it is a promise of one or a few yeres? Verily verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye see in deed. Moreover Christ did here institute no new thing, but followed the custome alway observed in the ancients Church of his owne nation: whereby he signified that the Church cannot want the spirituall jurisdiction, which had beene from the beginning. And this hath beene confirmed by the consent of all times. For when Emperors and magistrates began to profess Christ, the spirituall jurisdiction was not by & by abolished: but only so ordered, that it should diminish nothing of the civill jurisdiction, or be confounded with it. And rightfully. For the magistrate, if he be godly, will not exempt himselfe from the common subjection of the children of God, whereof it is not the laft part to submitt himselfe to the Church, judging by the word of God: so farre it is off, that he ought to take away that order of judgement. For what is more honorable (faith Ambrose) for the Emperor, than to be called the sonne of the Church? For a good Emperor is within the Church, not aboue the Church. Therefore they, which to honor the magistrate doe spole the Church of his power, do not only with false exposition corrupt the sentence of Christ, but also doe not slenderly condenmne so many holy bishops which have beene from the time of the Apostles, that they have by false pretence vsluped the honor & office of the Magistrate.

5 But on the other side it is good to see this, what was in old time the true use of the jurisdiction of the Church, and howe great abuse is crept in, that we may know what is to be abrogate, and what is to be restor'd of antiquitie, if we will ouerthrowe the kingdom of Antichrist, and set vp the true kingdom of Christ againe. First this is the marke to be shot at, that offences be prevented, and if any offence be risen vp, that it may be abolisht. In the use two things are to be considered: first, that this spirituall power bee alto-altogether seuered from the power of the sword: then that it be not executed by the will of one man, but by a lawfull assembly. Both these things were observed in the purest Church. For the holy byshopps did not exercise their power with fines, or imprisonments, or other civil punishmentes: but they used the onely word of the Lord, as they ought to do. For the seuerest revenge, and as it were the uttermost thunderbolt of the church is excommunication, which is not used but in necessity. But this requireth neither force nor strong hand, but is content with the power of the word of God. Finally, the jurisdicition of the old Church was nothing else but a declaration in practice (as I may so call it) of that which Paul teacheth concerning the spiritual power of Pastors. There is (faith he) power gien to vs, whereby we may throwe downe strong holdes, whereby we may make low all height that lifteth vp it selfe against the knowledge of God, whereby we may subdue all thought, & may lead it captive into the obedience of Christ, and we have in readiness a revenge against all disobedience. As this is done by the preaching of the doctrine of Christ: so, least the doctrine should be scorned, according to that which is taught ought they to be judged which profess the selves of the household of faith. But that cannot be done, unknow their being joined with the ministery, a power to call them that are to be privately admonished, or to be more sharply corrected, and also a power to exclude them from the communion of the supper, which cannot be received without prophaning of so great a mystery. Therefore when in another place he faith, that it belongeth not to vs to judge straungers, hee maketh the children subject to the censures of the Church, which may chastize their faultes, and he secretly signifieth that there were then judicall orders in force from which none of the faithfull was free.

6 But such authoritie (as we haue declared) was not in the power of one man, to do every thing according to his own will: but in the power of the assembly of the Elders, which was the same thing in the Church that a Senate is in a citie. Cyprian, when hee maketh mention by whom it was exercised in his time, saith in the whole cleargy with the bishop. But in another place also he writeth, that the very cleargy so governed, that in the mean time the people was not excluded from the hearing of matters. For thus he writeth: Since the beginning of my byshoprick I haue determined to do nothing without the counsel of the cleargy and consent of the people. But this was the common and vsual manner, that the jurisdicition of the Church should bee exercised by a Senate of elders of whom (as I haue saide) there were two sortes: For some were ordained to teaching, and other some were onely judges of matters. By little and little this institution grew out of kinde from the first beginning of it: so that even in the time of Ambrose onely clearkes were judges in ecclesiastical judgements. Which thing he him selue complaineth of in these words: The old Synagoge (faith he) and since that time the Church hath had Elders, without whose counsel nothing was done. Which by what negligence it is growne out of vs, I know not, vnselfe peradventure by the floutherfulnesse or rather the pride of the teachers, while they alone woulde be thought to bee somewhat. Wee see how much the holy man is displeased, that any thing of the better state is decayed, when Although I was not wholly in favor of the Law, the event has shown that we all too often became the victims of our own destruction. What befell these defiled relics of the ancient building? What became of their influence? To this day, it is a melancholy sight.

First, against law and right, the bishop has claimed to himself alone, that which was given to the whole Church. For it is as if the Consul, driving out the Senate, should take the Empire upon himself alone. But as he is above the rest in honor, so in the whole assembly is more authority than in one man. Therefore it was too wicked a decree, that one man, removing the common power to himself, hath both opened an entry to tyrannous lust, and hath taken from the Church that which belonged to her, and hath suppressed and put away the assembly ordained by the Spirit of Christ.

7. But (as of one evil always growth another) By shops disdaining it as a thing unworthy of their care, have committed it over to others. Hereupon are created officials to serve that roome: I do not yet speake what kinde of men they be, but onely this I say, that they nothing differ from prophane Judges. And yet they still call it a spirituall jurisdiction, where men contend about nothing but earthly matters. Although there were no more euill, with what face dare they call a brawling court the judgement of the church? But there are monitions, there is excommunication. So verily they mock with God. Doeth a poor man owe a little money, he is cited: if he appeare, he is condemned. When he is condemned, if he do not satisfie it, he is monished: after the second monition they proceede one steppe toward excommunication: if he appeare not, he is monished to come, and yeld him selfe to judgement: if he then make delay, he is monished, and by and by excommunicate. I beseech you, what is there any thing like either to the institution of Christ, or to the auncient manner, or to an Ecclesiastical order? But there is also correction of vices, but how? verily they not onely suffer but with secret allowance do after a certain manner cherish and confirm adulteries, wantonnesse, drunkenesse, and such kind of mischievous doings: and not only in the common people, but also in the clergey themselves. Of many they call a fewe before them, either that they should not seeme slouthfull in winking at them, or that they may milke out some money. I speake not of the pillages, robberies, bribes, &c. and other devises that are gathered ther by. I speake not what manner of men are for the most part chosen to this office. This is enough & too much, that when the Romanists do boast that their jurisdiction is spirituall, it is easy to shew that there is nothing more contrary to the order in the institute of Christ, and that it hath no more like censers to the auncient custome than darkness hath to light.

8. Although wee have not spoken all things that might be alleaged for this purpose, and those things that wee have spoken of are knitte vp in fewe words: yet I trust that wee haue so fought it out, that there is nowe no more cause why any man shoulde doubt, whether the spirituall power whereof the Pope with all his kingdom proudly glorieth, is wicked against God: & an unjust tyranny over his people. Under the name of spirituall power I comprehend both boldnesse in framing newe doctrines, wherewith they have turned away the silly people from the naturall purenesse of the wordes of God, and the wicked traditions wherewith they have snared them, and also the false ecclesiastical jurisdiction which they execute by Suffrages and Officiales. For if we grant unto Christ a kingdom among vs, it is not possible but that all this kind of dominion must immediately be overthrown and fall downe. As for the power of the sword which they also give to themselves, because it is not exercised upon consciences, it pertaineth not to our present purpose to intreat of it. In which behalf yet it is also to note, that they be always like themselves, verily nothing lesse than that which they would be take for, that is to say, Pastors of the Church. Neither doe I blame the peculiar faultes of men, but the common wickednes of the whole order, yea the very pestilence of the order: forasmuch as it is thought that the same should be named vnlesse it be gloriously set foorth with wealth and proud titles. If we require the authoritative of Christ concerning this matter, it is no doubt but that his mind was to debar the ministers of his word from ciuill dominion and earthly government, when he saide. The kings of the Gentils beare rule over them: but you shall not so. For he signifieth not only that the office of Pastor is distinct from the office of a Prince, but that they be things so seuered, that they can not meete together in one man. For whereas Moses did beare both the offices together: First that was done by a rare miracle againe, it was but for a time till thinges were better sette in order. But when a certaine forme was once prescribed of God, the ciuill government was left vnto him, and he was commaunded to resigne the priesthoode to his brother. And worthily. For it is above nature, that one man should suffice to beare both burdennes. And this hath in ages ben diligently observed in the church. And there was never any of the bishops, so long as the true forme of the Church endured, that once thought of vlupring the power of the sword: so this was a common prouerbe in the time of Ambrose, that Emperours rather counted the priesthood than priests the empire. For this which he afterward faith, was emprinted in the minds of all men, that palaces pertained to the Emperour, and Churches to the Priest.

9 But since that way hath ben devisd, whereby bishops might hold the title, honor & riches of their office without burden or care: least they should be left altogether idle, the power of the sworde was given them, or rather they did by usurpation take it upon themselves. By what colour will they defende this shamelesnes? Was this the dutie of Bishops to wrappe themselves with judicall hearing of causes, with the gournementes of cities and provinces, and through large circuites to meddle in businesse so vnpertaining to them: which have so much worke and businesse in their owne office, that if they were wholly & continually occupied in it, and were withdrawn with no callinges away from it, yet they were scarcely able to satisfie it? But (such is their wherelse) they sticke not to boast, that by this meane the Church doth flourish according to her worthinesse, and that they themselves in the mean time are not too much drawn away from the duties of their vocation. As touching the first point: if this be a comely ornament of their holy office, that they be aduanced to such height, that the highest monarques may stande in feare of them: then they have cause to quarrell with Christe, which hath in such sort grievously pinched their honor. For, at least in their opinion opinion, what could have been spoken more dishonorably than those words: The kings of the Gentiles and princes bear rule over them, but you shall not so? And yet he laid no harder law upon his servants than he first laid and received upon himself. Who (faith he) hath made me a judge or divider among you? We see that he plainly puteth away from him self the office of judging, which he would not do if it were a thing agreeing with his office; wilt not the servants suffer themselves to be brought into that order whereunto the Lord hath yeilded himself subject: As for the other point, I would God they could so prove it in experience as it is easie to speake it. But as much as the Apostles thought it not good, to loose the word of God and minister at tables: thereby, because they will not bee taught, they are convinced, that it is not all one to work to be both a good bishop & a good prince. For if they (which according to the largeness of the gifts wherewith they were endued, were able to suffer much greater care than any men that have beene borne since them) have yet confessed that they cannot at once apply the ministerie both of the wordes and of tables, but that they should faint under the burden: howe colde these that bee men of no valor in comparison of the Apostles a hundred foldexell the industri of the Apostles? Truely, to attempt it was a point of most shamelesse and too presumptuous boldnesse: yet wee see that it hath beene attempted: but with what successes, it is evident. For it could not otherwise come to passe, but that for taking their owne office they should remooue into other mens charge.

And so doubt is not small beginning they have by little and little grownen to so great encrease. For it was not possible that they should at the first step clime vp so high. But sometime with subtiltie & croked craf tic means they pruillie avauanced themselves, so as no man could foresee that it would come to passe till it was done: sometime when occasion serued they did by terror and threatnings wring from princes some augmentation of their power: sometime when they lawe Princes not harde laced to gue, they abused their fond & vnaduised gentlenesse. In olde time if anye controversie happened, the godly, to escape the necessitie of going to lawe, committed the arbitrement to the bishop, because they doubted not his vprightnesse. With such arbitrementes the olde bishops were oftentimes encumbered, which in deed greatly displeased them (as Augustine in one place testifieth) but least the parties should runne to contentious lawing, they did though against their wills take that encumbrence vpon them. These men have of voluntarie arbitrementes, which were altogether differing from the noise of judicall courtes, made an ordinarie jurisdiction. In a little while after when cities and countries were troubled with diversse haarde distresses, they resorted to the protection of bishops, to be safegarded by their faithfull succour: the bishops by maruellous subtiltie, of protectors made themselves Lords. Yea, and it cannot be denied that they have gotten the possession of a great parte by violent seditious partakings. As for the Princes, that willinglie gave jurisdiction to bishops, they were by diversse affections moud thereunto. But admitting that their gentlenesse had some shewe of godlienesse: yet with this their wrongfull liberalitie they did not verie well well provide for the profit of the Church, whose auncient and true discipline they have so corrupted, yea (to say truth) have utterly abolished. But those bishops, have abus'd such goodnes of princes to their owne commoditie, haue by thewinge of this one example enough & too much testified y they are not bishops. For if they had had any sparcle of an apostolike spirit, they wold without doubt haue answer'd out of the mouth of Paul: the weapons of cur warfare are not carnal, but spiritual. But they being rais'd with blind gree- dines, have destroy'd both themselues, their succ致ours, & the church.

11 At length the bishop of Rome not contented with meane Lordships, first layd hand vpon kingdoms, & afterward vpon the very empire. And that he may with some color whatsoever it be retain the possession gotte by mere robbery, he sometime boasteth that he hath it by the law of God, he sometime pretendeth the gift of Constantine, sometime some other title. First launfwer with Bernard. Admit that he do by any other reason whatsoever, claime this vnto him, yet hee hath it not by Apostolike right. For Peter could not give that which he had not: but he gave to his successors y which he had, the care of Churches. But when the Lord and master faith, that he is not appointed judge between two, a seruant and a seruant, he ought not to think scorn if he be not judge of all men. But Bernard speaketh of ciuill judgments. For hee ad- deth: Therefore your power is in crimes, not in posessions: because for tho: & not for these ye haue receiv'd the keys of the kingdom of heauen. For which seemeth to theee the greater dignety to forgive sinnes, or to divide landes? There is no comparision. Thee base and earthly things haue Kings & Princes of the earth their judges. Why do ye invade the bounds of other &c. Againe, Thou art made a superiour: (he speaketh to Pope Eugenius) but whereunto? Not to beare lordship, I think. Therefore how much lo- fuer we thinke of our felues, let vs remember that there is a ministryst layd vpon vs, not a lordship giuen vs. Learne that thou haft need of a weede hooke not of a scepiter, that thou maist do the worke of a Prophet. Againe, it is plaine: Lordship is forbidden to the Apostles. Go thou therefore, & presume to usurp to thy self either being a Lord, an Apostleship: or being an Apostle, a Lordship. And by and by after the forme of an apostleship is this, Lordship is forbidden them, ministryst is hidden them. Whereas these things are so spoken of a man, y it is cendifent to al men that the very truth speaketh them, yea whereas the very thing itselfe is manifest without all wordes: yet the Bishoppe of Rome was not ashamed in the Counsell at Orleance to decree that the supreme power of both the swordes belong to him by the lawe of God.

12 As for the gift of Constantine, they that be but meaneably practiced in the histories of those times need not to be taught how much this is not only fabulose, but also to be laughed at. But to passe over histories, Gregory himselfe is both a sufficient & most full witness hereof. For so oft as he speaketh of the Emperour, he calleth him most noble Lord, and himself his unworthy seruant. Againe, in another place: But let not our Lord by the earthly pow- er be the sooner angry with the priestes: but with excellent consideration, for his sake whole seruants they be, let him so rule over them, that he also give them due ingerence. We see howe in common subjection hee woulde be.
be accounted as one of the people. For hee there pleadeth not any other mans cause, but his owne. In an other place, I trust in the almighty God, that he will giue a longe life to our godly Lorde, and will dispose vs vnder your hande according to his merie. Neither haue I therefore alleaged these things, for that it is my purpose throughly to discuss this question concerning the gift of Constantine; but onely that the Readers should se vs the way how childishly the Romanistes do lie, when they go about to challenge an earthly Empire to their bisho(p. And so much the more fowle is ye shamelesnes of Augustine S cenbus, which in such a dispeined cause hath beene so bolde to fell his trauisle, and tongue to the bisho(p of Rome. Vallas (as it was not hard for a man learned, and of a sharp wit) had strongly confuted that fable. And yet (as a man little exercised in ecclesiastical matters) he had not saide al that might haue made for that purpose. S cenbus burst in, and scattered stinking trifles to oppresse the cleare light. And truely he doth no lease coldly handle the cause of his master, than if some merry conceited fellowe faining him felle to do the same, would in deede take Vallas part. But verily it is a worthy cause, for which the Pope should e hire such patrones for mony: and no lease worthy are those hired losels to be deceived of their hope of gaine, as it happened to Eugubinus.

13 But if any man require to knowe the time, since this fained Empire began to rise vp, there are not yet passed five hundred yeares, since the Bishops yet remained in subiection of the Princes, neither was the Pope created without authoritie of the Emperour. The Emperour Henry the fourth of that name, a light and rash man, and of no forecast, of great boldnesse and dissolute life, gave first occasion to Gregory the seuenth to alter this order. For when he had in his court the byshoprickes of all Germany partly to bee sold, and partly layde open for spoile: Hildebrand, which had received displeasure at his hand, caught hold of a goddy colour to revenge himself; but because he seemed to pursue an honest and a godly cause, hee was furthered with ye favour of many. And Henry was otherwise, by reason of his insolent manner of governing, hated of the most part of princes. At the length Hildebrand, which called himselfe Gregory the seuenth, as he was a filthy & naughtie man, bewrayed the malice of his heart, which was the cause that hee was forsaken of many that had confired with him. But he thus much prevailed, that his successors might freely without punishment not onely shake off the yoke, but also bring Emperours in subiection to them. Hereunto was added ye from thence foorth there were many Emperours liker to Henry than to Iulius Cæsar; whom it was no hard thing to subdue, while they sate at home carelesse of all things & slothful, when they had most neede with vertue & lawfull meanes to represse, the greedines of the bisho(pes. Thus we see with what colour that same godly gift of Constantine is shadowed, whereby the Pope faineth that the empire of the West was deliuered vnto him.

14 In the meane time the Popes ceased not, sometime with fraud, sometime with treason, and sometime with force to invade other mens dominions: & the very city it selfe, which before was free, within a hundred & thirty yeares, or there about they brought into their subiection, till they grew to the same power which they haue at this day: & for the obtaining or increasings whereof, whereof they have so troubled Christendome by the space of two hundred years, (for they beganne before that they tooke to them the dominion of the Civile) that they have almost destroyed it. In the olde time when under Gregorie the keepers of the goods of the church, did take possession of the lands which they reckned to belong to the Church, and after the maner of feasing to the vnc of the Prince did let titles upon them for token of claime, Gregorie assembling a council of bishops, inuying force against that profane maner, asked whether they did not judge that Clerke accourced which did of his owne will by writing of any title attempt to enter vpon any possession. They all pronounced, accoried. If to clame a peace of ground by writing of a title in Clarke an offence worthy of accourcing: when whole two hundred yeres together Popes do prudie nothing eile but barbel, shedding of blood, destructions of armes, sackings of some cities, racing of other, overthrowes of nation, wastings of kingdoms, onely that they might catch holde of other mens possessions: what cursings can be enough to punish such examples? Truely it is very plain that they seeke nothing lesse than the glorie of Christ. For if they of their owne will doe wholly renigne all the secular power that they haue, therein is no danger to the glory of God, no danger to sound doctrine, no danger to the safetie of the Church: but they are caried blind and headlong with only greediness of dominion: because they thinke nothing lafe, vnlesse they may beare rule with rigorousnesse (as the Prophet faith) and with power.

15 To jurisdiction is annexed immunitie, which the Romish Clergie tooke to themselves. For they thinke it against their dignitiie, if they answer in personal causse before a temporall judge: and therein they thinke both the libertie and dignitiie of the Church to consitt, if they be exempt from comon judgements and lawes. But the old bishops, which otherwise were most rigorous in defending the right of the Church, judged themselues and their order to bee nothing hurt, if they were subiect to them. And the godlie Emperours, without gainseying of anie man, did alwaye call Clarks to their judgement feates so oft as need required. For thus faith Constatine in his Epistle to the Nicomedians: If any of the bishoppes shalld vn dicietly disordor him selfe, his boldnes shall be restrained by the execution of the minister of God, that is by my execution. And Valentinian faith: good bishoppes doe not speake against the power of the Emperour, but doe sincerely both keepe the commandements of God the great king, and also obey our lawes. At that time all men were persuaded of this without controversie. But Ecclesiasticall causes were referred to the judgement of the Bishop. As if any Clerke had offended nothing against the lawes, but only was accused by the Canons; he was not cited to the comon judgement seate, but in his cause had a bishop for his judge. Likewise if there were a question of Faith in controversie, or such a matter as properly pertained to the Church, the judgement thereof was committed to the Church. So is yt to be understanded, which Ambrose wrieth to Valentinian: Your father of honoueroble memorie, not onely answered in worde, but also decreed by lawes, that in a cause of Faith he ought to bee judge that is neither vnfit in office nor vnlike in right. Againe: If we haue regard to the Scriptures or olde examples, who is there that can denie
Cap. II. Of the outwarde meanes

that in a cause of Faith, in a cause (I say) of Faith, bishops are wont to judge of Christian Emperors, and not Emperors of bishops? Against I would have come, O Emperour, to your consitiorie, if either the bishops or the people would have suffered me to goe, saying, that the cause of Faith ought to be debated in the Church before the people. He affirmeth verily that a spiritual cause, that is, to say the cause of religion, ought not to be drawn into a temporal court where profane causes are pleaded. Worthy do all men praise his constancie in this behalfe. And yet in a good cause hee proceeded but little, so that if it come to violence and strong hand, hee faith that he will give place. Willingly (faith he) I will not forfake the place committed unto me; but when I am enforced, I know not how to refist: for our armour are prayers and teares. Let vs note the singular modestie & wisdom of the holy man, joyned with stoutnesse of courage and boldnesse. Insine the Emperours mother, because shee could not drave him to the Arrians side, practised to drive him from the government of the Church. And so should it haue come to passe, if hee had come when hee was called to the palace to plea the cause. Therefore hee denieth the Emperour to bee a competent judge of so great a controversy. Which manner of doing both the necessitie of that time, and the continual nature of the matter required, For hee judged that he ought rather to die, than that such an example should by his consent bee gien to posteritie: & yet if violence be offered, he thinketh not of resistence. For hee denieth it to be bishoplike, to defend the faith & right of the church with armes, but in other causes he produceth himselfe ready to doe whatsoever the Emperour shall command him. If hee demand tributes (faith he) wee denieth it not; the lands of the Church doe pay tribute. If hee aske landes, he hath power to claim them, none of vs resisteth. As in the same manner also speaketh Gregorie. I am not ignorant (faith he) of the mind of our most noble soueraigne Lorde, that hee woulde not to intermeddle in causes pertaining to Priests, least hee should in any thing be burdened with our finses. Hee doth not generally exclude the Emperour from judging of Priests: but hee faith that there be certaine causes, which he ought to leave to the judgement of the Church.

16 And by this verie exception the holy men sought nothing else, but that Princes leve zealous of religion shoulde not with tyrannous violence and wilfulnesse interrupt the Church in doing her office. For neither did they disallow, if princes sometime did use their authoritie in Ecclesiastical matters, so that it were done to preserve the order of the Church, not to trouble it, to stablish discipline, not to dissolve it. For with the Church hath not the power of compelling, nor ought to require it (I speake of civill constraining;) it is the office of Godly Kings and Princes to maintain religion with lawes, proclamations, and judicall proceedings. After this manner, when the Emperour Maurice had commanded certaine bishops that they shoulde receiue their fellowe Bishops that were their neighbours and driven out by the barbarous nations: Gregorie confirmeth that commandement, and exhorteth them to obey it. And when hee himselfe is admonished by the same Emperour to come to attonement with John the Bishop of Constantinople, hee doeth in deede render a reason why hee ought not

The xii. Chapter.

Of the discipline of the Church, or whereof the chief use is in the conferrures and excommunication.

The discipline of the Church, the entreatings whereof we have differed unto this place, is briefly to be declared, that wee may at length passe over to the rest. But that fame for the most parte hangeth upon the power of the keies and spiritual jurisdiction. That this may bee the more easily understood, let vs divide the Church into two principal degrees, that is to say the Clergy, and the people. Clearkes I call the visuall name those that execute publicke ministerie in the Church. First wee will speake of common discipline, to which all ought to bee subject: then we will come to the Clergy, which besides that common discipline, haue several discipline by themselves. But because many for hatred of discipline do abhorne the very name thereof, let them heare this: If no fellowship, yea no house though it haue but a small household, can be kept in right state without discipline, y name is much more necessary in the church, whose state ought to be most orderly of all. Therefore as the doctrine of Christ which bringeth salvation is the soule of the Church, so discipline is in stead of finewes therein: whereby it is brought to passe, that the members of the body hang together every one in his fit place, wherefore who soever do either desire to haue discipline taken away, or hinder the restoring thereof, whether they do it of set purpose or by vnaduisednes, verily they fecke the extreme dissipation of the Church. For what shall betide, if what is lustfull be lawfull to every man? But so would it be, if there were not with the preaching of doctrine adjoyned private admonishments, corrections, & such other helps which sustaine doctrine and suffer it not to be idle: discipline therefore is as it were a bridle wherewith they may be holden backe & tamed which coltishly resist against Christ: or as it were a pricke, wherwith they y are not willing enough may be stirred vp: and sometime, as a fatherly rod, wherewith they which haue more grievously fallen may be chastised mercifully and according to the mildnese of the Spirit of Christ. Sith therefore we doe nowe see at hande certaine beginnings of a horrible wasting in the Church, because there is no care nor order to keep the people in awe, very necessitie crieth out that there is neede of remedy. But this is the onely remedy, which both Christ hath commanded, & hath alway bin vsed among the godlie.

2. The first foundation of discipline is, that private monitions should haue place: that is to say, that if any man of his owne accord doe not his duty, if he beaue himselfe licentiously, or live not honestly, or linae committed any thing worthy of blame, he should suffer himselfe to be admonished: and that every man should study to admonish his brother when occasion shall require. But specially let the Pastors and Priestes bee watchfull to do this, whose office is not only to preach to the people, but in every house to admonish & exhort at any time they do not sufficiently persuade by general doctrine: as Paul teacheth, when he reheareth that he taught privately & in houses, and protesteth that he is clean from the blood of all men, because he hath not ceas'd with tears day & night to admonish every one. For doctrine doth then obtain force & authority, the minister not only doth declare to all together what their duty is to Christ, but also hath power & order to require the keeping thereof of the who he marketh to be either not obedient to doctrine, or filthful. If any man do either stubbornly refuse, or in going forward in his faultes, do despite such admonishmentes: when he hath bin the second time admonished with witnesses called to it, Christ commendeth them to be called to the judgement of the church, which is the assembly of Elders : and there they should be more grievously admonished as it were by publike authority; that if he reverence the Church he may submit himself & obey. But if he be not hereby subdued, but do continue in his wickednes, then he commandeth him, as a despiser of the church, to be put away from the fellowship of the faithfull.

3. But because he speaketh here only of secret faults, we must make this distinction: that some sinnes be private, and some publique or openly manifest. Of the first sort Christ faith to every private man, Reproue him betweene thee and him alone. Of manifest sins Paul faith to Timothee. Reproue him before all men, that the rest may have feare. For Christ had saide before, If thy brother haue offended against thee, Which words (against thee) vndelee thou wilt be contentious, thou canst not otherwise vnderstand than vnder thine owne secret knowledge, so that there be noe more proue to it. But the same thing which the Apostle teacheth Timothee concerning the rebuking of them openly that sinne openly, he himselfe followed in Peter. For when Peter sinned eu'n to publike offence, hee did not admonishe him a parted by himselfe, but brought him foorth into the sight of the Church. Therefore this shalbe the right order of doing, if in secrete faultes wee goe forward according to those degrees that Christ hath set: but in manifest faultes, we immediately proceede to the Churches solenme rebuking, if the offence be publike.

4. Let this also be an other distinction: that of sinnes some be defaults, other some be wicked doinges, or hainous offences. To the correcting of this later sort, not only admonishment or rebuking is to be used, but also a seuerer remedy: as Paul theweth which not only chaftised with words the Corinthian that had committed incest, but also punished him with excommunication, so soon as he was certified of his wicked deed. Now therefore we beginne better to see how the spiritual jurisdiction of the Church: which punisheth sinnes according to the word of the Lord, is the best maintenance of health, and foundation of order, & bondes of vnitie. Therefore when the Church doth banish out of her company manifest adulterers, whoremongers, theues, robbers, seditious persons, perjured men, false witnesse, and suche other, againe, obstinate men, which being orderly admonished eu'n of small faultes do scorne God and his judgement, the taketh nothing vpon her self without reason, but exerciseth the jurisdiction guien her of the Lorde.

Moreover, that none should despise such judgement of the Church, or lightly regard that he is condemned by the conflicting voices of the faithful; the Lord hath testified, that the same is nothing else but a pronouncing of his owne sentence, and that whatsoever they doe in earth is confirmed in heaven. For they have the words of the Lord, whereby they may condemn the sower: they have the word of the Lord, whereby they may receive the repentant into favour. They say that trust that without this bond of discipline Churches may long stande, are deceived in opinion: unlesse perhaps we may want that helpe which the Lord foresaw that it should be necessarie for vs. And truly how great is the necessitie thereof, shall be better perceived by the manifold vie of it.

5 There bee three endes which the Church hath respect vnto in such corrections and excommunication. The first is, that they shoule not, to the dishonour of God, be named among Christians, that lead a filthie and sinfull life, as though his holy Church were a conspiracie of naughtie and wicked men. For if the Church is the body of Christ, it cannot bee defiled with such filthie & rotten members, but that some shame must come to the head. Therefore that there should not be any such thing in the Church, whereby his holy name may be spotted with any reproch, they are to be driven out of their household, by whose dishonestie any flaunder might redound to the name of Christians. And herein also is consideration to be had of the Supper of the Lord, it be not profaned with giving it to all without choice. For it is most true, that hee to whom the distribution of it is committed, if he willingly and willingly admit an vnworthy man whom he might lawfull put backe, is as guiltie of Sacrilege, as if he did give abroad the Lordes body to dogges. Wherefore Christesome grievously inuengeth against the priests, which while they feare the power of great men, dare debarre no man. The bloud (faith he) shalbe required at your handes. If yee feare man, hee shall laugh you to scorne: but if yee feare God, ye shalbee reverenced also among men. Let vs not feare maces, nor purple, nor crownes: we have here a greater power. I verily will rather deliuer mine owne bodie to death, and suffer my bloud to be shed, than I will be made partaker of this defiling. Therefore leaft this most holy mysterie be spotted with slander, in the distributing thereof choice is greatly requisite: which yet cannot bee had but by the jurisdiction of the Church. The second end is, leaft (as it is wont to come to passe) with the continual company of the euill, the good should be corrupted. For (such is our readie inclinatiō to go out of the way) there is nothing easier than for vs to be led by euill examples from the right course of life. This vie the Apostle touched, when he commanded the Corinthians to put the incefluous man out of their companie. A little leauen (faith he) corrupteth the whole lumpe of doo. And he foresaw herein so great danger, that hee forbade him euen from all fellowship. If any brother (faith he) among you bee named either a whoremonger, or a covetous man, or a worshipper of Idol, or a drunkard, or an euill speaker, with such a one I grant you not leave so much as to cate. The third end is, that they themselves confounded with shame may begin to repent of their filthinesse. So it is profitable for them alfo to have their owne wickednesse chastised, that with feeling of the rodd they may be awaked, which otherwise by tender bearing with them would have become more obstinate. The same thing doth the Apostle meane where he faith Thus: If any do not obey our doctrine, mark him, and keepe no company with him, that he may be ashamed. Againe in another place, when he wrote that he had delivered the Corinthian to Satan, that his spirit might be saved in the day of the Lorde: that is (a) I expound it) that he went into a damnation for a time, that he might be saved for ever. But he therefore faith that he deliuers him to Satan, because the diuile is out of the church as Christ is in the Church. For whereas some do referre it to a certaine vexing of the flesh, I thinkne that to be verie uncertaine.

6 When these endes bee set forth, nowe it remaineth to see howe the Church executeth this part of discipline which consisteth in jurisdiction. First let vs keepe the diuision aboue set, that of sinnes some be publique, and other some be private or more secrete. Publique are those that haue not only one or two witnesses, but are committed openly & with the offence of the whole Church. Secrete I call those, not which are altogether hidden from men, as are the sinnes of hypocrites, for those come not into the judgement of the Church, but those of the meane kind which are not without witnesses, & yet are not publique. The first kind requireth not those degrees which Christ rehearseth: but when any such thing appeareth, the Church ought to do her dutie in calling the sinner & correcting him according to the proportion of the offence. In the second kinde according to the rule of Christ, they come not to the Church till there be also obstinacie added. When it is once come to knowledge, then is that other diuision to be noted betwene wicked doings & defaultes. For in lighter sinnes there is not to be vsed so great severitie, but chastisement of words sufficeth, and the same gentle & fatherly, which may not harden nor confound the sinner, but bring him home to himselfe, that he may more reioyce than be sorrow that he was corrected. But it is meete that hainous offences bee chastified with sharper remedy. For it is not enough if he that by doing a wicked deed, of such example hath grievously offended the Church, should be chastised onely with wordes, but he ought for a time to be deprivd of the communion of the supper, till he have giuen assurance of his repentance. For against the Corinthian Paul writeth not only rebuking of words, but driveth him out of the church, & blameth the Corinthians that he had so long borne him. The old & better Church kept this order, when rightfull government flourished. For if any man had done any wicked deed whereupon was grown offence, first he was commanded to abstaine from partaking of the holy supper, then both to humble himselfe before God, and to testify his repentance before the Church. There were also certaine solemn vioages, which were enjoyned to them that had sinned, to be tokens of their repentance. When they had so done, that the church was satisfied, then by laying on of hands hee was received into fauour. Which receiuing is oftimes called of Cyprian peace, who also briefly describeth this vioage. They do penance (faith he) in a certaine full time: then they come to confession, & by the laying on of hands of the bishop & the cleragie they receive power to come to the communion. Howbeit the Bishop and his cleragie had so the ruling of reconciliation, that they did therewith all require the consent of the people: as he sheweth in another place.

7 From this discipline there was no man exempted, that even the princes together with the common people did submit themselves to bear it. And rightfully, as it was evident that it was the discipline of Christ, to whom it is meete that all scepters and crowns of kings be submitted. So when Theodotius was deprived by Ambrose of power to come to the communion of the Church committed in Thessalonica, he threw downe all the royal ornament wherewith he was clothed; he openly in the Church bewailed his sinne, which had crept upon him by fraud of other men: he craued pardon with groining and tears. For great kings ought not to think this to be any dishonor to them, if they humbly throw downe themselves before Christ the king of kings, neither ought it to displease them, they be judged by the Church. For sith in their court they heare nothing elie but mere flattery, it is more necessary for them to be rebuked of the Lord by the mouth of the priests. But rather they ought to know, that the priests should not spare them, that the Lord may spare them. In this place I omit to speake by whom this jurisdiction is to bee exercised, because it is spoken of in another place. This onely I addde that is, the lawfull manner of proceeding in excommunicating a man which Paul sheweth: if the Elders do it not alone by themselves, but with the Church knowing & allowing it; that is, in such sort that the multitude of the people may not gouerne the doing, but may mark it as a witness & a keeper: nothing should be done of a few by wilful affection: But the whole manner of doing, beside the calling upon the name of God, ought to haue such gravity, as may reseble a preface of Christ, y it may be vndoubted that he there fitteh for ruler of his own judgement.

8 But this ought not to be passed over, that such severitie becommeth the Church as isjoyed with the spirite of mildnes. For we must alway diligently beware (as Paul teacheth) that he which is punished be not swallowed vp of sorrow; for so should a remedy be made a destruction. But out of the end may better be gathered a rule of moderation. For whereas this is required in excommunication that the sinner should be brought to repentance, and evil examples taken away, least either the name of Christ should be evil spoken of, or other men be provoked to follow them: if we shall have an eie to these things, we shallbe able easilly to judge how farre severitie ought to proceede & where it ought to end. Therefore when the sinner giueth a testimonie of his repentance, & doth by his testimonie, as much as in him lieth, blot out the offence, he is not to be enforced any further: but if he bee enforced, rigorousnes doth then exceed measure. In which behalfe the immeasurable severitie of the old fathers cannot be excused which both disagreed from the prescribed order of the Lord, & also was maruellously dangerous. For when they charged a sinner with solemn penance, & deprivation from the holy communion sometyme for seuen yeres, sometyme foure yeares, sometyme three yeares, sometyme for their whole life: what other thing could follow thereof but either great hypocriſe or most great desperation? Likewise wereas no man had fallen the second time was admitted to seconde penance but was cast out of the Church even to the ende of his life: that was neither profitable nor agreeing to reason. Therefore whosoever shall weigh the matter with foud judge.
Cap. 12. Of the outewarde meanes judgement, shall herein perceive want of their discretion. Howbeit I do here rather disallow the publike manner, than accuse all them that said it, whereas it is certain that many of them disliked it: but they did therefore suffer it, because they could not amend it. Truely, Cyprian declareth, how much beside his owne will he was so rigorous. Our patience (faith he) & cæsars & gentlenesse is ready to them that come. I withall all to returne into the Church: I with all our fellow soldiers to be enclosed within the tentes of Christ & in the houses of God the father, I forgive all things, I dissemble many things, for zeal & desire to gather brotherhood together, I examine not with full judgement those things that are committed against God, in pardoning defaults more than I ought, I am myself almost in default, I do with readie and full love embrace them that returne with repentance, confessing their sinnes with humble and plaine satisfaction. Chrysostome is somewhat harder, and yet he faith thus: If God be so kind, why will his Priest seeme so rigorous? Moreover we know what gentleness Augustine vied toward the Donatistes, in so much that he sticked not to receive into bishoprike those that had returned from schism, even immediately after their repentance. But because a contrarie order had grewe in force, they were compelled to leave their owne judgement to follow it.

Men scarce to the Church by excommunication rashely to be condemned in the judgments of me.

But as this mildnes is required in the whole body of the church, that it should punish them that are fallen, mercifully & not to the extremity of rigor, but rather according to the precept of Paul, should confirme charity toward them, so every private man for himselfe ought to temper himselfe to this mercifullnes & gentlenesse. Therefore it is not our part to wipe out of the number of the elect such as are driven out of the Church, or to despaine of them as though they were already lost. We may indeed judge them strangers from the Church, & therefore strangers from Christ: but that is onely during the time they abide in disrue. But if they do shew a greater resemblance of stubbornnes then of gentlenesse, yet let vs comit them to the judgement of the Lord, hoping better of them in time to come than we see in time present, & let us not therefore cease to pray to God for them, & (to comprehend all in one word) let vs not condemn to death the person it selfe, which is in the hand & judgement of God alone, but let vs rather weigh by the law of the Lord of what for every mans works be. Which rule while we follow, we rather stand to the judgement of God then pronounce our owne. Let vs not take to our selues more libertie in judging, vnlesse wee will binde the power of God within boundes, & appoint a lawe to his mercie, at whose pleasure whè he thinke it good, very euil men are turned into very good, strangers are graffed & foreins are chose into the church. And this the Lord doth, thereby to mocke out the opinion of men, & rebate their rashenes: which if it be not restrained, presumeth to take to it selfe power of judging more than it ought.

For whereas Christ promiseth that that shalbe bounde in heavne, which they that be his shal bind in earth, he limiteth the power of binding to the Censure of the church: by which they are excommunicate, are not thrown into everlasting ruine & damnation: but hearing their liues & manners to be condemned, they are also certified of their owne everlasting condendemnation, vnlesse they repent. For excommunication herein differeth from accursing, that accursing taking away all pardon doth condemne a man and adiudge him to eternal destruction: excommunication rather.reuengeth and puniseth maner. And though the same doe also punish the man, yet it doth so punish him, that in forewarning him of his damnation to come, it doth call him backe to salvation. If that be obtained, reconciliation & restoring to the communion is readie. But accursing is either very seldome or never in vse. Therefore, although ecclesiasticall discipline, permiteth not to live familiarly, or to have friendly conversation with them that be excommunicate: yet we ought to endeavoure by such means as we may, that returning to amendment, they may return to the fellowship and vnitie of the Church: as the Apostle also teacheth. Do not (saith he) thinke them as enemies, but correct them as brethren. Vnlesse this gentleness be kept as well privately as in common, there is danger left from discipline we foorth-with fall to butchery.

11. This also is principally required to the moderation of discipline, which Augustine entreateth of in disputing against the Donatistes: that neither private men, if they see faules not diligently enough corrected by the Council of elders, should therefore by and by depart from the Church: nor the Pastors themselves, if they cannot according to their hearts desire purge al things that neede amendment, should therefore throw away the minifterie, or with vnwonted rigoroussnesse trouble the whole Church. For it is most true which he writeth: that he is free & discharged from curse, whoseuer he be that either by rebuking amendeth what he can: or what he cannot amend, excluding, sauing the bond of peace: or what he cannot exclude, sauing the bond of peace, he doth disallow with equitie, and beare with it's fatines. Here render the reason thereof in another place: because all godly order & manner of ecclesiasticall discipline ought alway to have respect unto the vnitie of the Spirit in the bond of peace: which the Apostle commandeth to bee kept by our bearing one with another, and when it is not kept, the medicine of punishment beginneth to be not only superfluous, but also hurtfull, and therefore easeth to be a medicine. He that (faith he) doth diligently thinke upon these things doth neither in preferring of vnitie neglect the seueritie of discipline, nor doth with immeasurablelneffe of correction breake y bonde of fellowship. He sanctly deede, that not onely the Pastours ought to trauaile to this point, that there may remaine no fault in the Church, but also that euery man ought to his power to endeavoure thereunto: & he plainly declareth that he which neglecteth to monithe, rebuke, & correct the eui, although he do not sinne them, nor sinne with them, yet is gilte before the Lord. But if he be in such degree, that he may also seuer them from the partaking of sacraments, and doth it not, now he sinneth not by another eui, but by his own. Only he willerth it to be done, with ving of discretion, which the Lord also requireth, leaft while the cares be in rooting out, the corn be hurt. Hereupon he gathereth out of Cyprian. Let a man therefore mercifully correct what he can: & what he cannot, let him patiently suffer, & with loute grone and lament it.

12. This he faith because of the precelines of the Donatistes, who when The precifens of the Donatistes.
they saw faults in the Churches which the bishops did in deede rebuke with words, but not punish with excommunication, (because they thought that they could this way nothing preuaile) did sharply inuey against the bishops as betrayers of discipline, and did with an vngodly schisme diuide the fleshe from the flocke of Christ As the Anabaptiftes doe at this day, which when they acknowledge no congregation to be of Christ, vnlesse it doe in euery point shewe with angelike perfection.

Such faith Augustine not for hatred of other mens wickednes, but for desire to maintaine their owne contentions, do count either wholly to draw away, or at leaft to diuide the weake people naiere with the bonart of their name, they swelling with pride, mad with stubbornnes, traiterous with flaunders, troublesome: with seditions, leaft it should openly appeare that they want the light of truth, do pretend a shadow of rigorous feueritie: and those things which in scripture are commanded to be done with moderate healing for correcting of the faults of brethren, preferring the syncerenes of love, and keeping the vnnie of peace, they abufe to facriedge of schisme & occasiion of cutting off. So doth Satan transforme himselfe into an angell of light, when by occasion as it were of iust feueritie he perfwadeth vmerciful fructfie, conceiting nothing else but to corrupt & break the bond of peace & vnnie: which bond remaining fast among Christians, all his forces are made weake to hurt, his traps of treasons are broken, & his counells of overthrowing do vanish away.

13 This one thing he chiefly commendeth, that if the infection of sin have entred into the whole multitude, then the feuer mercy of liueye discipline is necessarie. For (faith he) the deuises of separation are vaine, and hurtful & full of facrilege; because they are vngodly & proud, & do more trouble the weake good ones, than they amend the stout eui ones. And which he there teacheth other, he himselfe also faithfully followed. For writing to Aurelius bishop of Carthage, he complaineth that drunkenness which is moste condemned in scriptures, doth range vnpunished in Africa; & hee aduise\d him, that assembling a Councell of bishops he shoulde provide remedie for it. He addeth by and by after, These things (as I thinke) are taken away not roughly, nor hardly, nor after an imperious manner, but more by teaching than by commanading, more by admonishing than by threatenning. For so muft we deal with a multitude of sinners, but feueritie is to be exercized vp-pon the sinnes of few. Yet he doth not meane that Bishops shoulde therefore winke or hold their peace at publique faults, because they cannot severely punish them: as he himselfe afterward expoundeth it: But he willeth that the measure of correction be so tempered, that so farre, as may be, it may rather bring health then destruction to the body. And therefore at length he concludeth thus: Wherefore both this commandement of the Apostle is in no wise to be neglected, to feuer the eui, when it may be done without peril of breaking of peace: & this is also to be keepe, y bearing one with another, we should endeavour to preserve vnnie of the Spirit, in the bond of peace.

14 The part that remaineth of discipline, which properly is not contained in the power of keies, standeth in this, & according to the necessitie of times the pastors should exhorte the people either to falling, or to common suppli.
supplications, or to other exercises of humility, repentance, & faith, of which things there is neither time, nor measure, nor form prescribed by the word of God, but is left in the judgement of the church. The observing of this part also, as it is profitable, so hath alway bin used of the old church even from y verie Apostles. Howbeit the Apostles themselves were not the first authors of them, but they took example out of the law & the Prophets. For we see that there so oft as any weightie businesse happened, the people were called together, common prayers enioyned, & fasting commanded. Therefore the Apostles followed that which both was not new to the people of God, & they foresawe that it should be profitable. Likewise is to be thought of other exercises, where with the people may either be stirred vp to their dutie, or be kept in awe and obedience. There are examples eche where in holy histories, which we neede not to gather together. In summe this is to be holdèd that so oft as there happeneth any controversie of religion, which must be determined either by a Synode or by ecclesiastical judgement, so oft as they be about choosing of a minifter, finally, so oft as any hard matter or of great importance is in doing: againe, when there appeare tokens of the wrath of God, as pestilence, & warre, & famine: this is a holy ordinance & profitable for all ages, that the Pastors should exhort the people to common fasting, & to extraordinary prayers. If any man doe not allowe the testimonies which may be alleaged out of the old testament, as though they were not meete for the Christian Church, it is certaine that the Apostles also did the same. Howbeit of prayers I thinke there will scarcely any be found that will muse any question. Therefore let vs say somewhat of fasting: because many when they understand not what profit it hath, do judge it not to be necessary: some also do utterly refuse it as superfluous: and when the vse of it is not well known, it is easie to slide into superstition.

15 Holy & true fasting hath three endes. For wee vs it, either to make leane and subdue the flesh, that it should not waxe wanton, or that we may be better disposed to prayers & holy meditations, or that it should be a testimonie of our humbling before God, when we be willing to confesse our giltnesse before him. The first end hath not so often place in common fasting, because all men have not like estate of body, nor like health: therefore it rather agreeith with private fasting. The second end is common to both, for as well the whole Church as every one of the faithfull hath neede of such preparation to prayer. The third also is likewise common. For it shall sometime befal that God shal strike some nation with warre, or pestilence, or with some calamite. In such a common scourge the whole people must accuse themselves, and openly confesse their owne giltnesse. But if the hand of the Lord do strike any private man, he ought to do the same, either alone, or with his own family. That standeth chiefly in the affection of the mind. But when the minde is affected as it ought to be, it is scarcely possible, but that it will break out into outward teuffling: and then chiefly if it turne to common edifying, that al together in openly confessing their sinne should yeeld praine of righteousness to God, and every one mutually exhorte other with their example.

16 Wherefore fasting, as it is a signe of humbling, hath more often vse publikely.
Cap. 12. Of the outwarde meanes

publicly, than among private men, howsoever it be common, as is already faide. Therefore as touching the discipline whereof we now entreate: so oft as we must make supplication to God for any great matter, it were expedit to commaunde fasting together with prayer: So when the Antiochians laide hands upon Paul & Barnabas, that they might the better commend to God their ministry which was of so great importance, they joined fasting with prayer: So both they afterward, when they made ministers over churches, were wont to pray with fasting. In this kinde of fasting they had regard to none other thing, but that they might bee made fressher and more vncombered to pray. Verily this we finde by experience, that when the bellie is full, the minde is not so lifted vp to God, that it can both with heartie and fervent affection be caried to prayer, and continue in it. So is that to be understande which Luke reheareseth of Anne, that shee feared the Lorde in fastinges and prayers. For hee doth not set the worshipping of God in fasting; but signifieth that the holy woman did after that manner exercise her selfe to continuance of prayer: Such was the fasting of Nehemias when he did with earnestly bent zeale pray to God for the deliverance of his people. For this cause Paul saith that the faithfull do well, if they abstaine for a time from their wedding bed, that they may the more freely apply prayer and fasting: Where joining fasting to prayer in stead of a helpe, he putteth vs in minde that it is of no value but so farre as it is referred to this ende. Againe, when in the same place hee giueth a rule to married folkes, that they shoulde mutually render good will one to another, it is plaine that hee doeth not speake of daily prayers, but of such prayers as require a more carnest intentiuceneffe.

Nechem. 1:4.

1. Cor. 7:5.

Publicke fasting in the publicke calamities of the Church.

17. Againe, if either pestilence, or famine, or warre beginne to range abroad, or if any calamite otherwise seem to hang ouer any country & people; then also it is the duty of Pastors to exhort the Church to fasting, y they may humbly beseech the Lord to turne away his wrath. For he giueth warning that he is prepared and in a maner armed to reuenge, when hee maketh any danger to appeare. Therefore as accused men in time past with long hanging beard, with vncombed haire, with blacke array, were wont humbly to abase themselves, to procure the mercie of the judge: so when we are accused before the indgement seat of God, it behoveth both for his glorie, & for common edification, and also is profitable and healthfull for vs, that we should in piteous array crave to escape his severitie. And that this was vsed among the people of Israel, it is easie to gather by the wordes of Joel: For when he commandeth a trumpeter to be sounded, the congregation to be gathered together, fasting to be appointed, and the rest that follow he speaketh of thinges received in common custome. Hee had a little before said, that examination is appointed of the wicked decees of the people, and had declared that the day of judgament was nowe at hande, and had summoned them being accused to plade their cause: then hee cried out that they shoulde haft to sacke cloth and ashes, to weeping and fasting: that is, that they shoulde also with outwarde testifyinges throwe themselves downe before the Lorde. Sacke cloth and ashes, peradventure did more agree with those times: but there is no dout that the calling together, and weeping, and fasting & such like do likewise pertain also to our age, so oft as the state of our things doth so require. For by it is a holy exercise, both to humble men, and to confess humility, why should we lesse vs it than the olde people did in like necessitie? We read in that not only the people of Israel, which were informed and instructed by the worde of GOD, but also the Ninivites which had no doctrine, but the preaching of Jonas, fasted in token of sorrow. What cause is there therefore why we should not doe the same; But it is an outwarde ceremonie, which was with the rest ended in Christ. Yea rather even at this day it is, as it alway hath beene, a verie good helpe to the faithfull, and a profitable admonition, to stirre vppe themselues, that they should not with to great carelesnesse & sluggisnesse more & more profane God when they are chastified with his courges. Therefore Christ when hee exhorted his Apostles for that they fast not, doth not say that fasting is abrogate; but he appointeth it to times of calamitie, & joyneth it with mourning. The time shall come (faith he) when the bridegrome shall be taken away from them.

18 But that there should be no error in the name, let vs define what fasting is. For we do not here understande by it only abstinence and sparing in meate and drinke, but a certaine other thing. The life of the godly ought in deed to be tempered with honest sparing & sobrie, for soe neere as is possible it may in the whole course thereof beare a certaine resemblance of fasting. But beside this there is an other fasting for a time, when we withdraw any thing of our woted diet, either for one day or for a certaine time, and do charge our selves with a straiter and severer abstinence in diet than ordinarie. This consisteth in three things, in time, in qualitie of meates, & in smallnes of quantitie. I mean by time, that we should vs those doings fasting, for which fasting is ordained. As for example, if a man fast for common prayer, that he come emptie unto it. Qualitie standeth in this, that all daintinesse should be absent, & being content with common & baser meates, we should not stirre vp appetite with delicates. The rule of quantitie is in this, that wee eate more sparingly and lese than we be wont, onely for necessitie, and not alfo for pleasure.

19 But we must alway principally beware, that no superstitioncreep vapon vs, as it hath heretofore happened to the great hure of the Church. For it were much better that there were no vs at all of fasting than that it should be diligently kept, and in the meanetme be corrupted with false & hurtfull opinions, whereby the world sometime falleth, yt unless the Pastors do with great faithfulness and wisdome prevent it. The first point therefore is, that they should alway enforce that which Joel teacheth, that they should cut their hearts and not their garmentes: that is, that they should admonish the people, that God doth not greatly esteem fasting of vs selfe, yt unless there bee an inward affection of the heart, a true mistaking of sinne and of himselfe, true humbling, & true sorrow through the tears of God: yea that fasting is profitable for no other cause, but for that it is joyned to these as an inferior helpe. For GOD abhorreth nothing more than when men in setting signes and an outwarde shewe in stead of innocencie of heart do labor with false color to deceie themselues. Therefore Esaiie most sharely instrueth against against this hypocrite, that the Iews thought that they had satisfied God, when they had only fasted, howsoever they did nourish vngodlines and vn-clean thoughts in their heart. Is it (saith he) such a fasting which the Lord requireth and so forth as followeth. Therefore the hypocrical fasting is not only an vnprofitable & superfluous weareyng, but also a great abomination. An other euill necesse vnto this is chiefly to be taken heed of, that it be not for a meritorious worke, or a forme of worshipping God. For sith it is a thing of it selfe indifferent, & hath no value but by reason of those ends which it ought to have respect vnto, it is a most hurtfull superstition, to confound it with the workes commanded of God and necessaries of them, selues without other respect. Such was in olde time the doctrine of the Mani-cheer whom when Augustine conturseth, he doth plainly enough teach, that fasting is to be made by no other ends than those which I haue spoken of,

and is no otherwise allowed of God, unlese it be referred to the same.
The 3rd error is in deed not so vngodly, yet it is perillous: to require the keeping of it more precyseely and rigorously as it were one of the chief dueties, and so to aduaunce it with immeasurable praifes, that men shoulde thinke they haue done some excellent thing when they have fasted. In which behalfe I dare not altogether excuse the olde fathers, but that they have sowed some seedes of superstition, and giuen occasion to the tyranie which hath risen since. There are founde in deed sometymes in them found and wise sentences of fasting, but afterward we nowe and then meete with immeasurable praifes of fasting which aduaunce it among the chief vertues.

20 And at that time the superstitious observinge of Lent was such where grown in virc; because both the common people thought that they did ther-insome notable seruice to God: and the Pastors did commend it for a holy e folowing of Chri$t whereas it is playne, that Chri$t did not fast to prectrib an example to other, but that in so beginning the preaching of the Gospel, he might in very deed prove that it was no doctrine of men, but descende d from heauen. And it is maruelous, that so grosse an error, which is confused with so many and so euerent reasons, could creepe into men of so sharpe judgement. For Chri$t did not fast oft (which hee must needes haue done if he would haue set forth a lawe of yearely fasting) but only once whi he prepared himselfe to the publishing of the Gospel. And hee fasted not after the manner of men, as it was meete that he shoulde haue done if hee would haue prouoked men to follow him: but rather he shewed an example, whereby he may rather drawe men to wonder at him than stirre them up to followe him. Finally there is none other cause of this fasting, than of that which Moses fasted when he receiued the lawe at the hande of the Lorde. For fith that miraicle was shewed in Moses to stablish the authority of the Lawe, it ought not to have beene omitted in Chri$t, lest the Gospel should token to giue place to the lawe. But since that time it never came in any mans minde vnder colour of following of Moses to require such a forme of fasting in the people of Israel. Neither did any of the holy Prophetese and fathers follow, when yet they had minde and zeale enough to godly exercises. For, that which is saide of Elias, that hee passed fortie daies without meat
meate and drinke, tended to no other ende but that the people should know that he was stirted up to be a restorer of the law from which almost al \textit{Israel} had departed. Therefore it was a mere wrongful zeale & ful of superstition, y they did set forth fasting with the title & color of following of Christ. Howbeit in the manner of fasting there was then great diuersitie, as \textit{Cassiodorus} rehearseth out of \textit{Socrates} in the ninth booke of his historie. For the \textit{Romans} (faith he) had but three weeks, but in these three there was a continual fasting, except on the Sunday and Saturday. The \textit{Slavonians} and \textit{Grecians} had sixe weikes: other had seuen: but their fasting was by diueded times. And they disagreed no leffe in difference of meates. Some did eate nothing but bread and water: some added herbes: some did not forbeare fishe and fowles: some had no difference in meates. Of this diuersitie \textit{Augustine} also maketh mention in the latter Epistle to \textit{Januarie}.

21 Then followed worse times, and to the preposterous zeale of the people was added both ignorance and rudenesse of the Bishops, and a luft to beare rule, and a tyrannous rigor. There were made wicked lawes, which straine conscience with pernicious bonds. The eating of flesh was forbidden, as though it defiled a man. There were added opinions full of sacrifice one vpon an other, til they came to the botome of all errors. And that no puerusionse should be omitted, they began with a most fonde pretence of abstinence to mocke with God. For in the most exquisite deitines of fare is sought the praye of fasting; no delicates doe then suffice, there is neuer greater plentie, or diuersitie or sweetnesse of meates. In such and so gorgious preparation they think that they serve God rightly. I speake not how they neuer more fowly glute themselves, than when they would bee counted most holy men. Briefely, they count it the greatest worshipping of God to absteyne from flesh, and (these excepted) to flowe full of all kind of deities. On the other side they think this extremest vngodlineesse, and such as scarcely may be recompened with death, if a man taue none but little a pece of bacon or vnsauery flesh with brownie bread. \textit{Hierome} tellethe, that euen in his time were some where with such follies did mock with God: which because they would not eat oyle, caused most diuertie meates from every place to be brought them; yea to oppress nature with violence, they abstained from drinking of water, but cauased sweete and costly supplings to be made for them, which they did not drinke out of a cup, but out of a shell. Which fault was then in a fewe, at this day it is a common fault among all rich men that they fast to no other ende but that they may banke more sumptuously and deintily. But I will not wast many wordes in a manner not doubtfull. Only this I say, that both in fasting and in all other partes of discipline, the Papists so haue nothing right, nothing pure, nothing well framed and orderly, whereby they may haue any occasion to be proud, as though there were any thing remaining among them worthy of praise.

22 There followeth another parte of discipline, which peculliarly belongeth to the clergie. That is conteined in the canons which the olde Bishops haue made over themselues and their order. As these be; y no clercke shoulde give himselfe to hunting, to dicing, nor to banketting: that none should

Shoude occupy vsurie, or marchandise: that none shoule be present at wanton dauncings and such other ordinances. There were also added penalties whereby the authority of the canons was stablished, that none shoule break them unpunished. For this ende to every byshop was committed the government of his owne clery, that they shoule rule their clearkes according to the canons, and hold them in their dutie. For this ende were ordained yearly overseeings and Synodes, that if any were negligent in his dutie, he shoule be admonished: if any had offended, he shoule be punished according to the measure of his offence. The bishops also themselves had yearly their prouincial Synodes, and in the olde time yearly two Synodes, by which they were judged if they had done any thing beside their dutie. For if any byshop were too harde or violent against his clergie, they might appeale to those Synodes, although there were but one that complained. The severest punishment was that he which had offended should be remoued from his office, and for a time be deprived of the communion. And because his fame was a continuall order, they never vied to dismisse any Synode, but they appointed a place and time for the next Synode. For, to gather a generalc Council, pertained to the emperour onely, as all old summonings of Councils do testify. So long as this seueritic flourished, y clearks did require in word no more of y people, than themselves did perform in example and deed. Yea they were much more rigorous to themselves than to y people. And verily so it is meete, that the people should be ruled with a gentler and looser discipline, as I may so term it: but the clearks should vie sharper judgements among themselves, and should leffe beare with themselves, than with other men. How all this is growne out of yse, it is no neede to rehearse, when at this day nothing can be imagined more unbridled and distolute than the clergy, and they are broken forth to so great licentiousnes, that the whole world crieth out of it. That all antiquitie should not seeme to be utterly buried among them, I grant indeede that they doe with certaine shadowes deceive the eyes of the simple: but those are such as come no nearer to the auncient manners, than the counterfating of an ape approcheth to y which men do by reason and aduise. There is a notable place in Xenophon, where he teacheth how howly the Persians had swarwed from y ordinances of their Elders, and were fallen from the rigorous kind of life, to softnes and daintines, yet they couered this shame, saying that they diligently kept y ancient visages. For when in the time of Cyrus sobriety and temperance so farre flourished that men needed not to wepe, yea and it was accounted a shame: with posterty this continued a religious observation, that no man shoule draw snoute out of his nostrilles, but it was lawfull to sucke it vp, and feede with in euen till they were rotten the flinking humors which they had gathered by gluttonous eating. So by the olde order it is vnlawfull to bring winepots to the borde: but to swill in wine that they neede to be caried away drunken is tolerable. It was ordered to eat but once in a day: this these good sufferers have not abrogate, but they gaue leaue to continue their sursettinges fro mid day to midnight. The custome was that men shoule make an ende of their dayes journey fasting: But it was at liberty and vsted the custome, for... for avoiding of weariness, to shorten their journey to two hours. Wherefore the Papistes shall pretend their bastaarde rules, to shew themselves to be like to the holy fathers: this example shall sufficiently reprove their fond counterfeiting, that no painter can more lucely express it.

23. In one thing they bee too rigorous and vnentreatable, that they giue not leave to Priestes to marrie. But how great libertie there is among them to use whoredom vnpunished, is not needfull to be spoken: and bearing them bolde vpon their stinking vnmarried life, they have hardened themselves to all wicked doings: But this forbidding doeth plainly shewe, how pestilent all their traditions are, forasmuch as it hath not only spoileied the Church of good and faire Priesters, but also hath brought in a horrible sinate of miscarries, and thrown many soules into the gulf of desperation. Truely whereas marriage hath bee forbidden to Priestes, that same hath bee done by wicked tyrannie, not onely against the worde of God, but also against all equitie. First to forbidde that which the Lord had left at libertie, was by no meanes lawfull for men. Again, that God hath expressly provided by his worde that this libertie should not be broken, is to evident that it needeth no long demonstration. I speake not how Paul in many places willeth a Bishoppe to bee the husband of one wife. But what could bee more vehemently spoken, than where hee prounginceth by the holy Ghost, that there shalbe in the last times wicked men that shall forbidde marriage: and bee calleth them not onely deceivers, but duelers? This therefore is a Prophecy: this is a holye Oracle of the holye Ghost, wherewith hee willed to armte the Church aforesayde against daungers, that the forbidding of marriage is the doctrine of duels. But they thinke that they have gayly escaped when they wret this sentence to Montanus, the Tattars, Encratites, and other olde heretikes. They only (say they) condemned marriage: but wee doe not condemne it, but debarre the cleargie from it, for whom we thinke it not to bee conuenient. As though albeit this prophesie was first fulfilled in those aforefaide men, it might not also bee applied to these: or as though this childish fondle suttetlie were worthe the hearing, that they say that they forbidde it not, because they forbid it not to all. For it is all one as if a truante woulde affirme that it is not an vnjust lawe, with vnjustice whereof one parte alone of the Citie is oppreseed.

24. They object, that the Priest doth by some marke differ from the people. As though the Lorde did not also foresee this, with what ornamentes Priestes ought to excell. So they accuse the Apostle of troubling the order and confounding the comelinesse of the Church, which when he portrayed the absolute forme of a good Bishop durst set marriage among the other gifts which he required in him. I know how they expound this, namely that none is to be chosen that hath had a second wife. And I grant that this is not a new exposition: but that it is a false exposition, appareth by the text itself, because he by & by after feteth out of what qualities the viues of Bishops & Deacons ought to be. Paul reckeneth marriage amonge other vertues of a Bishop, the men teach that it is an intolllerable fault: in the order of the cleargie. And, on Gods name, not contented with this general dispraise they call call it in their canons uncleannesse and defiling of the flesh. Let every man think with himselfe out of what workshop these things be come: Christ vouchsauneth so to honour marriage that he wil let it bee an image of his holy conioying with the Church. What could be spoken more honourably to set out the dignitie of Marriage? With what face therefore shall that bee called vnclene or defiled wherein thineth a likenesse of the spiritual grace of Christ?

25. But nowe when their forbidding so evidently sighteth with the word of God, yet they finde in the Scriptures wherewith to defende it. The Leuitical Priests were bound to lie a sunder from their wifes, so oft as it came to their turns to minifie, that they might handle the holy things pure & undefiled. Therefore it were very vncomely, that our holy things, both they be both much more noble and daily, should be handled of married men. As though there were alone person of the minister of the Gospel, as was of the Leuitical Priesthood. For they, as figures, represented Christ, which being the mediator of God & men should with most absolute purenesse reconcile the Father vnto vs. But when sinners could not in every behalf express the figure of this holiness, yet that they might with certain grosse draughts yeld a shadowe of him, they were commanded to purifie themselves beyonde the manner of men, when they came to the Sanctuarie: namely because they then properly figured Christ, for that as pacifiers to reconcile the people to God they appeared at the tabernacle the image of the heavenly judgment seate. Forasmuch as the Pastors of the church doe not bear this person at this day, therefore they are vainly compared with them. Wherefore the Apostle doth without exception boldly pronounce, that marriage is honorable among all men, but that for whomersongers and adulterers abideth the judgement of God. And the Apostles themselves did with their owne example approve that marriage is not vnmeete for the holiness of any office be it never so excellent. For Paul witnesseth that they did not onely keepe wifes, but also carried them about with them.

26. Again it was a marvellous shamelesness that they durst set out this comelines of chastitie for a necessary thing, to the great reproch of the old Church: which when it is abounded with singular learning of God, yet excelled more in holiness. For if they passe not upon the Apostles, ( as they are wont sometime stoutly to despise them ) what I beseech you will they doe to all the olde fathers, whose it is certaine to have not onely suffered but also allowed marriage in the order of Bishops? They forsooth did nourish a filthyprophaning of holy things, forasmuch as so the mysteries of the Lorde were not rightly reverenced among them. It was moved in deed in the Nysene Synode to have vnmarried life commanded: as there always want not some superstitious men, which doe ever invent some newe thing, to bring themselves in admiration. But what was decreed? The sentence of Paphnutius was assented to, which pronounced that a mans lying with his owne wive is chastitie. Therefore marriage remained holy among them: neither did it turne them to any shame nor was thought to spot the miniterie.

27. Then followed times, in which too superstitious observation of sin-single life grew in force. Hereupon came those often and unmeasurable advanced praises of virginitie, so yarely scarcely any other verue was thought among the people to be compared with it. And although marriage was not condemned for unclean, yet the dignity thereof was so diminished, and the holiness of it obscured, that hee seemed not to aspire with a courage strong enoough to perfection, that did not reframe himselfe from it. Hereupon came those cannons whereby it was first forbidden that they which were come to the degree of Priests should not contract marriage: then, that none should be taken into that order but unmarried men, or such as did for-sake marriage together with their wives. These things, because they seemed to procure reverence to Priesthood, were (I grant) even from antiquitie receiv'd with great well liking. But if the adversaries object antiquitie against me, first I answer that this libertie remained both under the Apostles and in certaine ages after them, that Bishops might be married: that the Apostles themselves and other Pastors of great authoritie which succeeded in their places, lived the same without sticking at it. The example of that ancienner Church ought worthily to be of greater weight with vs, than that we should thinke that to be either unlawfull orDicciously for vs which was then with praife receiv'd and vs'd. Secondly I fay that that age which for immeasurable affectio to virginity began to be partial against marriage, did not so lay upon Priests the lawe of unmarried life, as though it were a thing necessary of itself, but because they preferred unmarried men above the married. Finally I answer that they did not so require it they did with force and necessity constrain them to continence which were not fit to keepe it. For when they punished whoredomes with most seuerelawes, of them that contracted marriage they decr'd no more but that they should give over the execution of their office.

28 Therefore whensoever the defenders of this new tyranie shall seeke the pretence of antiquitie to defend their unmarried life: so oft we shall answer them with requiring the, that they restore the old chastneffe in their Priests: that they remove adulterers and whoremongers: that they suffer not those in whom they suffer not honest & chaste life of marriage bed, to run unpunished into all kinde of lust: that they call againe the discontinued discipline, whereby all wantonneffes may be restrained: that they deliuer the Church from this so wicked filthineffe, where with it hath beene long deformed. When they have granted this, then they must againe be put in mind that they boast not that thing for necessarie, which being of it selfe at libertie hangeth upon the profit of the Church. Yet I say not this for that I think that in any condition place is to be given to those canons which lay bond of unmarried life upon the order of Priests: but that the wiser sort may understand what face our enemies doe flaunder holy marriage in Priests by oblicing the name of antiquitie. As touching the fathers, whose writings remaine, even they when they speake of their owne judgement, except Hierome, did not with so great spightfulness deface the honestie of marriage. We shalbe content with one commendation of Chrys. some: because he, thith was a principall estemer of virginitie, cannot be thought have beene more laudABLE than other in commendation of marriage. Thus he faith: H. H. H.

The first degree of chastitie is pure virginitie: the seconde is faithfull marriage. Therefore the seconde kinde of virginitie is the chast love of matrimonic.

The xiii. Chapter.

Of vowes, by rash promising vobereof, eech man hath miserably entangled hymselfe.

It is verily a thing to be lamented, that the Churche, for whom libertie was purchased with the inestimable price of the bloud of Christ, hath been so oppressed with cruel tyrannie, and almost overwhelmed with a huge heape of traditions: but in the mean time every mans private madnesse sheweth, that not without most just cause there hath bene so much permitted of God to Satan and his miniflers. For they thought it not enough, neglecting the commandement of Christ, to beare any burdens whatsoeuer were laide vpon them by false teachers, vnaile they did also eche man procure to himselfe severall burdens of his owne, and so with digging pittes for themselves should drowne themselves deeper. This was done while they strined in deuing of vowes, by which there might be added to the commo bondes a greater and straighter binding. Sith therefore wee haue taught, that by their boldnes which have born rule vnder the tite of Pastors in the Church, the worshipping of God hath bene corrupted, when they shared filly confiences with their vnlawfull laws: here it shall not be out of season to adioyne another euill which is neere vnto it, that it may appeare that the worlde according to the peruerseuenesse of his owne disposition, hath alwaies, with such stoppes as it could, put away the helpe whereby it should have bene brought to God. Nowe, that it may the better appeare that very grieuous hurt hath bene brought in by vowes, let the readers kepe in mind the principles above set. For first we haue taught, that whatsoeuer may be required to the framing of life godly and holliy, is comprehended in the lawe. Again, we haue taught that the Lorde, that he might thereby the better call vs away from deuing of newe works, hath enclousd the whole praife of righteousuenesse in the simple obedience of his will. If these things be true, it is easie to judge that all fained worshippinges, which wee intende to our felues to defere the fauour of God, are not acceptable to him howe much soever they please vs. And truely the Lorde himselfe in many places doth not onely openly refuse them, but also grieuously abhorrre them. Hereuppon arieth a doubt of those vowes which are made beside the expresse worde of God, what account is to be made of them, whether they may rightly bee vowed of Christian men, and howe farre they binde them. For the same which among men is called a promise, in respect of God is called a vowe. But to men we promise those things either which we thinke wil bee pleasant vnto them, or which we owe of duteie. Therefore there ought to bee a much greater heedful observaution in vowes which are directed to God himselfe, with whom we ought to deale most earnestly. In this point superstition hath in all ages maruellously ranged, so that men without judgement, with without choice, did by & by vow vnto God whatsoever came in their mind, or into their mouth. Hereupon came those follies, yea, monstrous absurdities of vowes among the heathen, whereby they did too insolently mocke with their Gods. And I would to God that Christians also had not followed this their boldness. It ought not in deede to have beene so; but wee see that in certaine ages past nothing hath beene more vstill than this wickednesse, that the people eich where despising the lawe of God did wholly burne with mad greedinessse to vowe whatsoever had pleased them in their dreame. I will not haeccefully enforce, nor particularly rehearse how hainousely and how many waies herein men have offended: But I thought good to say this by the way, that it may the better appeare, that we doe not move question of a needelesse matter, when we intent of vowes.

2. Nowe if wee will not erre in judging which vowes be lawfull, & which be wrongfull, it behooueth to weigh three things: that is to say, who it is to whom the vowe is made: who wee bee that make the vowe: last of all, with what mind wee vowe. The first point hath respect to this, that wee should thinke that wee haue to doe with God, whom our obedience so much delieth, that he pronounceth all wilworships to be accursed, how gay and glorious soever they bee in the eyes of men, If al voluntarie worships, which wee ourselves devise without commandement, be abominable to God, it followeth that no worship can be acceptable to him but that which is allowed by his word. Therefore let vs not take so great libertie to our felues that wee dare vowe to God that which hath no testimonie how it is esteemed of him. For whereas that which Paul teacheth, that it is sinne whatsoever is done without Faith, extendeth to all doinges, then verily it chiefly hath place, when thou directest thy thought the stright waie to God. But if we fall and erre euin in the smallest things, (as Paul there dispuzeth the difference of meats) where certaintie of faith thineth not before vs: howe muche more modestie is to be vded, when wee attempt a thing of greatest weight? For nothing ought to be more earnest vnto vs than the duties of religion. Let this therefore be the first consideration in vowes, that wee neuer come to the vowing of any thing, but that conscience haue first certainely determined it, attempteth nothing rashly, But it shall then be free from danger of rashnesse, when it shall haue God going before it, and as it were enforming it by his word what is good or vnprobable to be done.

3. In the other thing which we haue faide to be here to bee considered, this is conceived, that wee measure our owne strengthes, that we haue an eie to our vocation, that we neglect not the benefite of libertie which God hath giuen vs. For hee that voweth that which either is not in his power, or disagreeth with his vocation, is rash: and he that despiseth the bouldnesse of God, whereby hee is appointed Lord of all things, is vnthankfull. When I say thes, I doe not meane that any thing is so set in our owne hand, that standing upon confidence of our owne strength wee may premise the same to GOD. For it was most truely decreed in the Council at Arau-

by his equity denied vs; let every man (as Paul commaundeth) have respect to the measure of grace giuen vnto him. Therefore I doe here mane nothing else, but that voyes must bee tempered to that measure which the Lorde prescribeth there in his giuing; least if thou attempt further than he permitteth, thou throwe thy selbe downe headlong with taking too much vpon thee. As for example. When those murthers, of whome mention is made in Luke, vowed that they woulde raffe of no meate tilll Paul were slaine: although the deuife had not bee wicked, yet the raffiness of selue was not to bee suffered, that they made the life and death of a man subject to their power. So Jepthethe suffered punishment for his folly, when with headlong heathe conceived an unaduised voye. In which kinde vnmarried life hath the cheese, place of madde boldnesse. For sacrificing Priestes, Monkes, and Nonnes, forgetting their owne weaknesse, thinkthemselves able to kepe vnmarried life. But by what Oracle are they taught that they shal haue chastitie throughout all their life, to the very ende whereof they vowe it? They heare the worde of GOD concerning the universall state of men, It is not good for man to bee alone. They understand, and woulde to God that they did not seele, that sinne remaining in vs is not without most sharpe pricke. With what confidence dare they shake off that general calling for all their life long: whereas the gifts of continencie is ofter grunted for a certaine time as opportunitie requisite? In such stubbornnesse let them not looke for God to bee their helper: but let them rather remember that which is saide. Thou shalt not tempt the Lorde thy God. And this is to tempte God, to endeauour against the nature put in vs by him, and to despise his present gifts as though they nothing belonged vnto vs. Which they not onely doe: but also marriage it selue, which God thought it not against his majestie to infringe, which hee hath pronounced honourable in all men, which Christ our Lorde hath sanctified with his presence, which hee vouchsaft to honour with his first miracle, they dare call desling, onely to aduaunce with marvellous commendations a certaine vnmarried life of what fort soever it bee. As though they themselves did not shew a cleare example in their life, that vnmarried state is one thing, and virginitie another: which their life yet they most shamelesly call Angellike, doing herein verily too great inuiron to the Angels of GOD, to whom they compare whoremongers, adulterers, and some what else much worse and filthier. And truely here need no arguments when they are openly confuted by the thing it selue. For wee plainly see, with how horrible paines the Lorde doeth commonly take vengeaunce of such arrogancie, and contempt of his gifts by too much trust in themselves. I spare for shame to speake of the more secrete faultes, of which even this that is already perceived is too much. It is our of controversie that we ought to vowe nothing, that may hinder vs from seruing of our vocation. As if a householder shouelde vowe, that hee will leave his wife and his children and take other charges in hande: or if hee that is fit to beare office, when hee is chosen doe vowe that he will be a private man. But what is meant by this, that our libertie should not bee despised, hath some difficulties if it bee not declared. Therefore thus in fewe wordes I expounde it. Sith God hath made vs Lords of all things, & hath so made them subject into vs that we should use them all for our commodities: there is no cause why we should hope that it shall be an acceptable work to God if we yeade our selves into bondage to the outward things which ought to be a help unto vs. I say this for this purpose, because many do hereby seeke praise of humility, if they see themselves with many obseruations, from which God not without cause willed vs to be free & discharged. Therefore if we will escape this danger, let us always remember that we ought not to depart from that order which the Lorde hath ordained in the Christian Church.

4 Now I come to that which I did set in the third place: that it is much material with what minde thou makest a vowe, if thou wilt have it allowed of God. For sith the Lorde regardeth the heart, not the outward shewe, it commeth to passe that the selfe same thing, by changing the purpose of the mind, doth sometime please him, and is acceptable unto him, and sometime highly displeaseth him. If thou so vowe the abstaining from wine, as though there were any holinesse in it, thou art superstitious: if thou have respect to any other ende which is not eill, no man can disallow it. But in my judgement there be foure ends, to which our vowes shalbe rightly directed: of which for teachings sake I referre two to the time past, and the other two to the time to come. To the time past belong those vowes, wherby we do either testify our thankfulness to God for benefites receiued; or to crave the turning away of his wrath, we our selves doe punish our selves for the offences that we have committed. Let vs call the first sort, if you will, the exercises of thanksgiving, the other of repentance. Of the first kinde we have an example in the tithes which Jacob vowed, if the Lorde did bring him home safe out of banishment into his countrey. Againe, in the olde Sacrifices of the peace offerings, which godlie kinges and captains, when they tooke in hande righteous warre, did vowes that they would pay if they had obtained the victorie, or at least when they were oppressd with any great distresse, if the Lorde had delivered them. So are all those places in the Psalmes to bee understood which speake of vowes. Such vowes maie at this day alsoe be vsed among vs, so oft as the Lord hath deliuered vs either out of any calamity, or from a hard sickness, or from any other danger. For it is then not against the dutie of a godlie man, to consecrate to God his vowed oblation, as a solemnne token of his reknowledging, lest he should seeme vnthankful towards his goodnesse. Of what sort the seconde kinde is, it shall suffice to shewe with one onlye familiar example. If anie by the vice of glutonie be fallen into anie offence, nothing withstandeth but that to chastise his intempersance he maie for a time forsake all deitie meates, and may doe the same with a vowe adioyned, that hee may binde him selfe with the straiter bonde. Yet I doe not so make a perpetuall lawe to them that have like wisde offended: but I shewe what is lawfull for them to doe, which shall thinke suche a vowe profitable for themselves. I doe therefore so make suche a vowe lawfull, that in the meanete time I leaueth it at libertie.

5 The vowes that are applied to the time to come, partly (as we have already said) doe tend to this end that we may be made the water and partly that that as it were by certaine spurre was we may be pricked forward to our dutie. Some man seeth himselfe to be so inclined to some certaine vice, that in a thing which otherwise is not evil he cannot temper himselfe from falling forth with into an evil; he shall doe nothing inconveniently if he doe for a time by vowe cut off from himselfe the vse of that thing. As if a man knewe that this or that apperell of body is perillous vnto him, and yet entrised with desire he earnestly seuer it, what can he do better, than if in putting a bridile vpon himselfe, that is in charging himselfe with necessitie of abstaining from it, he deliver himselfe from all doubting? Likewise is a man bee forgetfull or slowe to necessarie duties of godliness, why may he nor by taking a vowe vpon him both awake his memorie and shake off his slouthfulnes? In both I graunt that there is a forme of childifh schooling; but euen in this that they are helpe of weekenesse, they are not without profit vset of the rawe & vn-perfect. Therefore we shall say that those vowes are lawfull which have respect to one of these ends, specially in outward things, if they both be vn- held with the allowance of God, and do agree with our vocation, & be measured by the power of grace giuen vs of God.

6 Now also it is not hard to gather what is generally to be thought of all vowes. There is one common vowe of all the faithfull, which being made in baptisme we doe confirme and as it were establish by Catechisme and receiving of the Supper. For the Sacramentes are as charters, by which the Lord deliuereth to vs his mercie and thereby everlasting life, and we againe on our behalves doe promisse him obedience. But this is the forme or verily the summe of the vowe, that forsaking Sathan we yeeld our soules into service to God, to obey his holy commandements, and not to follow the perverse defires of our flesh. It ought nor to be doubted but that this vowe, with testimonie of the Scripture, yea and is required of all the children of God, is both holy and profitable to saluation. And it maketh not to the contrary, that no man in this life performeth the perfect obedience of the law which God requireth of vs. For by this forme of covenanting is comprised within the covenant of grace, vnder which is contained both forgivenes of sins and the Spirit of sanctification: the promise which we there make is joined both with beseeching of pardon and with craving of helpe. In judging of particular vowes, it is necessarie to keepe in minde the three former rules, whereby we may safely weigh of what sort cevere vowe is. Neither yet thinke that I so commend the verie same vowe which I affirme to be holy, that I woulde have them to be daylie. For though I dare teach no certaine rule of the number or time; yet if any man obey my counsell, he shall take vpon him none but sober and for a time. For if thou ofteentimes breake foore into making of manie vowes, all religiousnes will with verie continuance growe out of estimation with thee, and thou shalt come to a bending readinesse to fall into superstitio, if thou bindest thy selfe with a perpetuall vowe, either for great paines and tediousnesse thou shalt vnde it, or being wearied with long continuance thou shalt at one time or other be bolde to breake it.

7 Nowe aliso it is plaine with how great superstitio in this behalfe the world hath in certaine ages past bin possesed. One man vowed ye he would abstaine abstain from wine: as though abstaining from wine were of itself a worship acceptable to God. An other bound himself to fasting, an other to abstaining from flesh for certaine daies, in which he had with vaine opinion fained to be a singular holines above the rest. And some things also were vowed much more childish, although not of children. For this was holden for a great wisdome, to take upon them vowed pilgrimages to holier places, and sometime either to go at their journey on foot, or with their body halfe naked, by their werines the more merite might be gotten. These & such other, with incredible zeale whereof the world hath a while swelled, if they be examined by thofe rules, which we haue above fet, halfe be found not only vaine & trifling, but ful of manifest vngodlines. For howsoever the flesh judge, God abhorreth nothing more than fained worshippings. There are beside this foule pernicious & damned opinions, hypocrisies when they have such trifles thinke they have gotten no small righteousnes; they repose the sum of godlinesse in outwarde obseruations, they despife all other that are leffe careful of such things.

§ To reckon vp all the particular formes, is nothing to purpose. But forasmuch as the monkish vows are had in greater reverence, because they seeme allowed by the common judgement of the Church, of those it is good to speake briefly. First lef any should by prescription of long time defend monkerie, such as it is at this day, it is to be noted that in old time there was in monaftries a far other order of living. Such as were disposed to exercize themelues to greatest leueritie and patience, went thither. For what manner of discipline they say that the Lacedemonians had under the lawes of Lycurgus, such was at that time among the monks, yea and much more rigorous. They slept vpon the ground: their drinke was water: their meate was bread, herbes, and rotes: their chiefes dainties were in oyle and eches. They abstained from all delicate diet and trimming of body. These things might seeme above trueth, if they were not written by wittenes that saw & proued them, as Gregorie Nazianzen, Basile, and Chrysostome. But with such introductions they prepared themselves to great offices. For, that the colleges of monkes were then as it were the seede plots of the order of minifteres of the Church, both these whom we haue now named are a proofe plaine enough (for they were all brought vp in monaftries and from thence called to the office of bishops) and also many other singular and excellent men in their time. And

Augustine sheweth that this was also vfed in his time, that monaftries yeelded clerkes to the Church. For he speaketh thus to the monkes of the Ifle of Caprarea: But you brethren we exhort in the Lord, that ye kepe your purpose & continue to the end: and if at any time our mother the Church shall require your travaile, do ye neither with gredy pride take it vp of you, nor with flattering slothfullnesse refuse it, but with a meek heart obey to God. Neither pretend ye your own quiet leasure, aboute the necessitie of the church, to whom if no good men would have ministered in her travaile, you should not have founde howe you should have beene borne. He spake of the minifterie, by which the faithfull are spiritually borne againe. Also to Aurelius. There is both occasion of falling given to themseles, and most haynous wrong done to the order of the Clergy, if forlakers of monaftries be.
be chosen to the soldiership of the Clergy: when euery of those remaine in the monasterie, wee vse to take into the Clergy none but the most approoved & best. Unlesse perhaps as the common people say, hee is an euill piper but a good faide: So it shall also be esteingly said of vs, he is an euill monke, but a good Clerke. It is too much to be lamented, if we lift vp monkes into such a ruinous pride, & thinke Clerkes worthy of so great reproach, whereas sometime eué a good monke maketh not a good clerke, if he have sufficient eontinece and yet want necessarie learning. By these places it appeareth, y godly men were wont with the discipline of monkes to prepare the sences to the government of the Church, that they might the fitter and better instructed take so great an office upon them. Not that they all attainted to this end, or yet telled toward it, when for the most part they were unlearned men: but such were chosen out as were meete for it.

9 But chiefly in two places he painteth out unto vs the forme of the old monkerie. In the booke of the maner of the Catholicke Church, where he setteth the holinesse of that profession against the sclaunders of the Manichees, and in an other booke which he entitelled of the work of monkes, where he inuetyeth against ceretaine degendred monkes, which beganne to corrupt that order. I will here so gather a summ of those things which hee saith, that so neere as I may I will wise his owne words.

Desipising (faith he) the enheatments of this world, gathered into one most chaste and holye life, they spende their time together, liuing in prayers, readings, and disputations. not swelling with pride, not trouble some me with stubborneffe, not wanne with enuiouffe. None possesteth anie thing of his owne, none is burdenous to any man. They get by working with their handes those things wherewith both their body may be fedde, and their minde may not be hindered from God. Their worke they deliver to them whom they call Deanes. Those Deanes despising all things with great carefulness make account thereof to one whom they call Father. Those fathers not onely most holy in maner, but also most excellent in godlye doctrine, high in other things, do with no pride provide for them whom they call children, with great authoritie of them in commanding, and great willingnes of the other in obeying: They come together at the very last time of the day, euerie one from his dwelling, while they be yet fasting, to heare that Father, and there meeete together to euery one of these fathers at the least three thousand men, (he speakeyth chiefly of Egypt, and of the East) then they refresh their body, so much as sufficient for life and healthfulnesse, every man restraining his desire, nor to take largely euery of those things that they have present very spare & vile. So they do not euery abstaine from flesh & wine, so much y they may be able to tame their lustes, but from such things which doe so much more greedily provoke appetite of the belly and throat, how much they seeme to other, to be as it were cleaner, by colour whereof of the filtie desire of exquisite meares, which is not in flesh, is woot to be fondly and foolishly defended. Whatsoever remaineth as aforesayd, every monke (as there remaineth oftentimes much of the workes of their handes and pinching of their face) is with greater care distributed to the poore, than it was gotten by them that distribute it. For they doe in no wise travaile that they may have abundance of these things, but they by all by all means endeavour that that which they have abounding may not remain with them. Afterward when he hath rehearsed the hardnes, whereof he himselfe had seen examples both at Millaine and else where: among these things (saieth hee) no man is enforced to hard things which hee cannot bare: no man is charged with that which he refuseth: neither is hee therefore condemned of the rest, because he confesseth himselfe to want strength in following of them: for they remember how much charitie is commended: they remember that all things are cleane to the cleane. Therefore all their diligence watcheth, not to the refuting of kindes of meate as vn cleane, but to tame lust, and to retaine the love of brethren. They remember, meate for the bellie; and the bellie for meates, &c. Yet many strong do abstaine for the weakes sake. Many of them have no neede to do thus: but because it pleaseth them to sustaine themselves with bater diet and nothing sumptuous. Therefore they themselves, which being in health do forbear, is consideration of their health compuls, when they are sicke do take without any fare. Many drinke no wine, & yet they thinke not themselves defiled with it: for they most gently cause it to be gluen to the sainter, and to them that cannot get the health of their bodie without it: and some which foolishly refuse it, they doe brotherly admonish that they be not with vaine superstition sooner made weaker than holier. So they diligently exercise godliness but they knowe that the exercising of the body pertaineth but to a short time. Charitie is chiefly kept: to charitie the diet, to charitie the speech, to charitie the apparel, to charitie the countenance is fitted. They meet and conspire into one charitie. To offend it, is accounted as haynous as to offende God. If any refiit charitie, he is cast out and shunned. If any offende charitie, he is not suffered to abide one day. For as much as in these worde, as in a painted table, that holy man seemeth to haue set out what maner of life monkerie, was in olde time, although they were somewhat long, yet I was content to enterlase them here: because I saw that I should haue bene somewhat longer if I had gathered the same things out of diuerfe, how much so ever I studied for briefenesse.

But my purpose here is not to go through this whole matter, but only by the way to point out, not only what maner of monkes the old Church had, but what maner of thing the profession of monkes was at that time: so as the sound witted readers may judge by the comparison, what face they haue which all age antiquitie to maintaine the present monkerie. Augustine when he depainteth vnto vs a holy & true monkerie, would haue to be absent all rigorous exacting of those things which by the word of the Lord are left vs at libertie. But there is nothing, y is at this day more severely required. For they count it a milchhete that can never be purged, if any do never so little swarte from the prescribed rule, in colour or fashion of garment, in kind of meate, or in other trifling & cold ceremonies. Augustine stoutly maintaineth: y it is not lawfull for monkes to live idle vs other mens. He denieth y there was ever in his time any such example of a well ordered monafterie. Our men vs the chiefes part of their holiness in idlenesse. For if you take idlenes from them, where salve y contemplative life whereby they boast y they excel at other men, & approach nere vnto Angels. Finally, Augustine rec-quiere such a monkerie, as should be nothing but an exercise & help to the duties of godlines which are commended to all Christians. What when he maketh charitie the chiefe, ye & almost only rule thereof, doe we thinke he praiseth a conspiring, whereby a fewe men being bound together, are seuered from whole body of the church: But rather willeth them with their example to give light to other to keep the vnite of church. In both these points there is so much difference of the monkyery at this present, that a man can scarcely find anything more vnike, I will not say contrarie, For our monks not contented with that godlines, to the studie of which alone Christ com-mandeth them; are his continually to apply, doe I imagine I wote not what new godlines, by meditation whereby they may be perfecter than other.

II. If they deie this, I would know of them why they vouchsafe to give to their owne order alone the title of perfection, & take away the same from all the callings of God. Neither am I ignorant of that sophistical solution, it is not therefore so called because it doth containe perfection in it, but because it is the best of all other to attaine perfection. When they are disposed to boast themselves before the people, when to shewe vnskillful and vnware yong men, when to maintain their priviliges, when to aduance their owne dignitie to the reproch of other, then they boast they are in the state of perfection. When they are so nigh druen that they cannot defend this vaue arrogancie, then they flie to this starting hole, that they have not yet attained perfection, but that they are in the same state wherein they aspire vnto it about other. In the meanes time that admiration among people remaineth, as though the only monks life were angelike, perfect, and cleared from all fault. By this pretence they make most vainfull markers, but that fame moderation lieth buried in a fewe bookees, Who doth not see this is an intollerable moekerie? But let vs so reason with them, as though they gave no more to their profession that to call it a state of attaining perfection. Verily in giving it this name, they do as by a speciall mark make it differing from other kinds of life. And who can abide this, that so great honor should be givun away to an ordinance that is nowhere by any one syllable allowed: and that by the same all other callings of God, which are by his owne holy mouth not only commauded, but also commended with notable titles of praise, are by the same accounted vnworthie? And how great wrong (I beceth you) is done to God, when I wote not what new found thing is preferred above all the kindes of life ordained by himselfe, and praised by his owne testimonie?

II. But go to, let them say that it is a launter which I haue before saide, that they are not contented with the rule prescribed of God. Yet though I holde my peace, they themselfes do more than enough accuse themselfes. For they openly teach, that they take upon them more burden than Christ laid vpon him; because forsooth they promeile to kepe the counsels of gospel concerning louing their enemies, not courting of reuenge, not swearing, &c. To which things Christians are not generally bound. Herein what antiquitie will they therefore against vs? This never came in any of the olde fathers mindes. They all criue with one voice that there was no one little worde at al vttured of Christ, which ought not necessarily to be obeyed. And with-

Matt. 19, 21

13 But they bring another profe of their perfection, which they thinke to be most strong for them. For the Lorde saide to the young man that asked him of the perfection of righteousness, If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast and give it to the poore. Whether they do so or no, I do not yet dispute: but graunt them that for this present. Therfore they boist that they be made perfect by forsaking al theirs. If the summe of perfection stande in this, what meaneth Paul when he teacheth, that he which hath distributed all his goods to the poore, ynellie he haue charitie, is nothing? What manner of perfection is this, which if charitie be absent, is brought with man to nothing? Here they must needes answere, that this is the chiefest in deed, but not the only worke of perfection. But here also Paul crieth against them, which sticke not to make charitie the bonde of perfection, without any such forsaking. If it be certaine that betweene the maister and the disciple is no disagreemt, and the one of them clearely denieth the perfection of man to consist in this that he should forfaie all his goods, and againe affirmeth, that perfection is without it: we must see bowe that saying of Christ is to be taken, If thou wilt be perfect, sell all that thou hast. Nowe, it shall be no darke sense, if we weigh (which we ought alway to marke in all the preachinges of Christ) to whom these wordes be directed. A young man asketh, by what worke he shall enter into everlasting life. Christ, because he was asked of worke, sendeth him to the lawe, and rightfully: for it is the way of eternall life, if it be considered in it selfe, and is no otherwised able to bring salvation vnto vs but by our owne peruersitie. By this answer Christ declared, that he teacheth no other rule to frame life by, than the same that had in old time been taught in the lawe of the Lorde. So did he both give witness to the lawe of God, that it was the doctrine of perfect righteousness: and therewithall did meete with scalders, that he should not seeme by any newe rule of life to stirre the people to forsaking of the lawe. The young man being in deed, not of an euell minde, but swelling with vaine confidence, answered that he had from his childhoode kept all the commandements of the law. It is most certaine that he was an infinite space distant from that to which he boaste, that he had attained. And if his boasting had beene true, he had wanted nothing to the highest perfection. For we haue before shewed, that the lawe containeth in it selfe perfect righteousness: and the same appeareth hereby, that the keeping of it is called the way of eternall salvation. That he might be taught to knowe how little he had profited in that righteousness, which he had too boldly answered, that he had fulfilled, it was profitable to shewe out a familiar fault of his. When he aboundeth in rickeffe, he had his heart fastened vpon them. Therefore, because he felt not this secret wound, Christ daunced him. Go (faith he) fell all that thou hast. If he had beene so good a keeper of the lawe as he thought he was, he would not have gone away sorrowful when he heard this worde. For who so loneth God with all his heart, whatsoever disagreeth with the loue of him, he not only taketh it for doing, but abhorreth as bringing destruction. Therefore whereas Christ commandeth the couteous riche man to leave all that he hath, it is all one, as if bee should commaunde the ambitious man to for sake all honours, the voluptuous man all delights, and the vychait man all the instrumentes of lust. So conferences that are touched with no feeling of generaall admonition, must bee called backe to the particular feeling of their owne eull. Therefore they do in vaine drawe this speciall case to generall exposition, as though Christ did set the perfection of a man in forsaking of goods; whereas he meant nothing else by this saying, than to drive the young man that stood to much in his owne conceite, to seeke his owne fore, that he might understand that he was yet a great way distant from perfect obedience of the lawe, which otherwise he did falsely take vpon him. I grant that this place hath beene euil understood of some of the fathers, and that thereupon grew this courting, of wilfull pouertie, whereby they only were thought to be blessed, which forsaking all earthly things, did dedicate themselves vnto Christ. But I trust that all the good & not contentious men wil be satisfied with this my exposition, so that they shall no more doubt of the meaning of Christ.

14 Howbeit the fathers thought nothing leste, that to stablish such perfection, as hath since beene framed by the cowled sopathers, thereby to raise vp a double christianity. For ya doctrine ful of sacrilege was not yet borne, which copareth the profession of monkery to baptism, yea & openly affirmeth, it is a forme of second baptism. Who can doubt that the fathers with all their heart abhorred this blasphemy? Now as touching that last thing, which Augustine faict hath bee among the olde monks, that is, ythey applied theselues wholly to Charitie: what neede I to shewe in wordes that it is most far from this new profession? The thing it selfe speakest, that all they that goe into Monasteries depart from the Church. For why? Do not they seuer themselves from the lawfull fellowship of the faithful, in taking to themselves a peculiar ministrie and privy ministrie of Sacramentes? What is it to dissole the communion of the Church, if this be not it? And (that I may follow the comparision which I beganne to make, and may once conclude it) what have they in this behalfe like to the olde monks? They althoughe they dwelt seuerally from other men, yet hadde not a seuerall Church; they did partake of the Sacramentes together with other; they appeared at solemn assemblies; there they were a part of the people. These men, in erecting to themselves a prattice altar, what have they ells done but broken the bond of vnitie? For they have both excommunicate themselves from the whole body of the Church, and have deisfigh the ordinarie ministrie, whereby the Lord willed to have peace & charity kept among his. Therefore how many ministries there be at this day, I say ther be so many assemblies of schismatikes, which troubling the order of the church, are cut off from the lawfull fellowship of the faithful. And this departing should not bee secret, they haue giuen given to themselves divers names of sects. Neither were they ashamed to boast of that, which Paul doth so detest that he can not sufficiently amplify the hainousnes of it. Unless perhaps we thinke that Christ was divided of the Corinthians, when one gloried of one teacher, & an other of an other; & that now it is done without any injury to Christ, in stead of Christians we heare some called Benedictines some Franciscanes, some Dominicans; and that they are so called, that they themselves when they court to be severally known from the common sort of Christians, do with great pride take these titles to them for the profession of their religion.

15 These differences which I have hitherto rehearsed betwene the old monkes and the monkes of our age, are not differences in maners, but in the profession itself. Therefore let the readers remember that I have rather spoken of monkery then of monkes, & have touched those faultes, not which stick in the life of a few of them, but which can not be feuered from their very order of living it selfe. But what difference is in their maners, what neede I particularly to declare? This is certaine, there is no degree of men more defiled with all filthynesse of vices; no where more are factions, hatreds, affections of parties, ambitions whettet than among them. In deed in a few monasteries they live chastly, if it be to be called chastly where lust is so farre kept downe that it be not openly stilled spoken of yet a man shall scarcely find every tenth monastry which is not rather a stoves than a holy house of chastity. But what honest sparing is in their diet? Swine be none otherwise fatted in fisces. But least they should complain that I handle them too vncertely, I go no further. Howbeit in those fewe things which I have touched, whosoever knoweth the thing it selfe will confess that there is nothing spoken accuerlike. Augustine, when according to his testimonie monkes excelled in so great chastity, yet complaineth that there were many vagabonds, which with cuill traites & deceits wiped simple men from their money, which with carrying about the reliques of martyrs did vs filthy merchandising, yea & in stead of the reliques of martyrs did vs thus for the bones of any other dead men, & which with many such wicked doings slandered the order. As hee reporteth that hee saw no better men then them which haue profited in monasteries, so he lamenteth that hee hath seene no worse men than those that did profited in monasteries. What would he say if at this day hee sawe all monasteries to swell, and in a manner to burst with so many and so dispaired vices? I speake nothing but that which is well known to all men. Yet doeth not this dispaire pertaine to all without any exception at all. For as there was never rule & discipline of living so holily established in monasteries, but that there remained some drones much vnlike the rest: so I doe not so that monkes are at this day so run out of kinde from that holy antiquity, but that they have yet some good men in their flocke. But they lye hidden a fewe & scattered in that huge multitude of naughty & wicked men: & they are not only despised, but also lewdly railed at, & sometime cruelly handled of other, which (as the Milesians prove) be it thinketh that there ought to be no place for any honest man among them.

16 By this comparison of the olde and present monkerie, I trust I have brought to passe that which I purposed, that it may appeare that our cowled men men do falsely pretende the example of the first Church for defence of their profession: for as much as they no less differ from them then ayes from men. In the mean time I sticke not to declare, that even in that olde forme which Augustinian comendeth, there is somwhat which little pleaseth me. I grant that they were not superstitious in exacting the outward exercises of rougher discipline, but I say that there wanted not to much affectation & wrongful zeal. It was a godly thing, for theking their goods, to be without all earthly carefulnesse; but God more esteemeth care to rule a houfeholde godly, when a holy houfholder being loose and free from all courtsiousnes, ambition, & other desires of the flesh, trauailith to this purpose to serve God in a certain vocation. It is a godly thing to play the Philosopher in wildernesse far from the company of men: but it agreeeth not with Christian gentlenesse as it were for hatred of mankind to fly into desert and solitarynesse, & therewithall to forsake those duties which the Lorde hath chiefly commanded. Although wee graunt that there was no other euill in that profession, yet this verily was no small euill, that it brought an unprofitable and perillous example into the Church.

17 Nowe therefore let vs see what manner of vowes they be, wherewith monkes at this day are professed into this godly order. First, because their minde is to institute a newe and sided worshipping to deserve Gods favour: I concluded by the things aforesaid spoken that whatsoever they vowe is abominable before GOD. Secondly without any regard of Gods calling, without any his allowance, they inuent for them such a kinde of lyuing as pleaseth themselues. If yee that it is a rafhe and therefore an unlawfull enterprise: because their conscience hath nothing whereupon it may vpholde it selfe before GOD, and whatsoever is not of faith, is sinne. Moreouer when they binde themselues to many perusercise and wicked worshippinges, which the monkery at this day containeth in it, I affirm that they be not consecrate to God, but to the Deuill. For why was it lawfull for the Prophete to say, that the Israelites offered their children to Deuils and not to God: only for this that they had corrupted the true worshipping of God with prophanee Ceremonies; and shal it not bee lawfull for vs to say the same of monkes, which with their cowle do put vp themselfes a share of a thousande wicked superstitions? Nowe what sorte of vowes are there? They promise to GOD perpetuall virginitie, as though they hadde bargayned with God before, that he should deliuer them from neede of mariage. There is no cause why they should allege, that they do not make this vowe but trustyng vpon the grace of GOD. For sith hee pronounceth that he giueth it not to all men, it is not in vs to conceiue a confidence of a speciall gift, Let them that haue it, see it. If at any time they feel themselves to be troubled of their flesh, let them flee to this helpe by whose only power they may resift. If they preuaile not, let them not despise the remedy that is offered them. For they by the certaine word of God are called to mariage, to whom power of continence is denied. Continence I call, not whereby the body is onely kept cleane from whoredome, but whereby the minde keepeth chastitie unspotted. For Paul commandeth not onely outwarde wantonnesse, but also the burning of the minde, to be auyded. This (say they) they) hath from further time of memorie beene observed, that they which would dedicate themselves wholly to the Lord, should binde themselves to the vowe of continence. I grant in deede that this manner hath also bin of auncient time receiued: but I do not grant that that age was free from all fault, that whatsoever was then done must be taken for a rule. And by little & little this vnappeasable seueritie crept in, that after a vowe made there was no roome for repentance. Which is euident by Cyprian.

If virgins faue of faith dedicate themselves to God, let them continue shamefully, and chastly without any faining. So being strong and fedfast, let them looke for the reward of virginitie. But if they will not or cannot continue, it is better that they shoulde marrie than with their delightes fall into the fire. What reproches would they now spare to teare him withall, that woulde with such equitie temper the vow of continence? Therefore they are departed farre from that auncient manner, which will not onely admit no moderation or pardon if any be founde vnable to performe his vow: but they do without all shame pronounce that he sinneth more greeuously if he remedie the in-temperance of the flesh with taking a wife, than if he defile both his body & soule with whoredome.

18 But they still enforce the matter, and goe about to shew that such a vowe was vfed in the Apostles time: because Paul faith that the widowes which having beene once receiued into the Publike ministerie did marrie, denied their firft faith. But I do not deny to them, that the widowes, which bounde themselves and their services to the Church, did therewithall take vpon them the bond of continual vnmarried life: not because they repofed any religion therein, as it afterwards began to be vfed: but because they could not beare that office but being at their owne libertie and loose from yoke of marriage. But if, when they had once gien their faith, they looked backe to newe marriages, what was this else but to shake off the calling of God? Therefore it is no marvel that with such desires he faith that they waxe wanton against Christ. Afterwards to amplifie the matter he saith, that they do so not perfore that which they have promiseth promiseth to the Church, that they do so breake and make void their firft Faith giuen in Baptisme: in which this is comprehended, that every man should answer his calling. Unless perhaps you had rather understande it thus, that having as it were lost all shame, they did from thence foorth cast away all care of honestie, did giue foorth themselves to all wantonesse and vnchastitie, and did in licentious and dissolute life reenble nothing leffe than Christian women: which sence I like verie well. Therefore we aunswere, that these widdowes which were then receiued to publike ministerie, did lay vpon themselves a bond to continue vnmarried: if they afterwards married, wee easilly perceiue that that happened to them which Paul speaketh of, that casting away shame they became more wanton than becometh Christian women. That so they not only finned, in breaking their faith giuen to the Church, but swarreied from the common law of godly women. But first I denye that they did professe vnmarried life for any other reason, but because marriage agreed not with their ministerie which they tooke in hand: and I denye that they did bind themselves at all to single life, but so far as the necessitie of their vocation did heare. Againe I doe not graunt that they were so bounde, but that it was also better for them to marrie, than either to be troubled with the prickings of the flesh, or to fall into any vncautious. Thirdly I say that that age is appointed of Paul, which is commonly out of danger: specially sixt he commandeth them only to be chosen, which contented with one marriage have alreadie shewed a token of their continencie. And we do for no other reason disallow the vow of vnmarrie life, but because it is both wrongfully taken for a seruice of God, and it is rashly vowed of them to whom power of continencie is not gien.

19. But how was it lawfull to drawe this place of Paul to Nunnnes? For there were created deaconisles, not to delight God with singing & with musing not understood, but by rest of their time idle; but that they should execute publike ministration toward the poor, that they should with all studie, earnestnes & diligence, endeavour themselves with the dutie of charitie. They did not vow vnmarrie life, to yeld thereby any worship to God because they abstained from marriage: but onely because they were thereby the more vncombed to execute their office. Finally they did not vow it, either in the beginning of their youth, or yet in the middest of their flowing age, that they might afterward learn too late by experience into how great a headlong downfall they had thrown themselves: but when they seemed to have pased all danger, then they vowed a no lese safe than holy vowe. But (not to enforce their first two points) I say it was not lawfull to have women received to vowe continencie before the age of three score yeares: forasmuch as the Apostile admeteth onely women of fixtie yeares old, & commandeth the yonger to marrie & bring forth children, Therefore, neither that release made of 12. yeares, and then 20. and afterward of thirtie yeares can be any way excused: and much lese is it tolerable, that sillie maides, before that they can by age knowe themselves, or have any experience of themselves, are not onely trained by fraude, but constrained by force and threatenings to put on those cursed snares. I will not rarifie vpon confuting the other two vowes. Onely this I say: besides this that they bee intangled with not a fewe superstitions, (as the matter is nowadayes): they seeme to bee made to this purpose, that they which vow them should mock both God and men. But least we should seeme too maliciously to shake vp every small parcel, wee will be content with that general confusion which is aboue.

20. What manner of vowes be lawfull and acceptable to God, I thinke is sufficiently declared. Yet because sometime vnskillfull and fearfull controversies, even when they mislike or disallowe any vowe, do nevertheless doubt of the binding, & are gravely troubled, when they both dread to break their faith given to God, & on the other side they feare lest they should more sin in keeping that they are to be succoured, that they may wind theselues out of this distress: But to take away all doubt at once: I say that all vowes being not lawfull, nor rightly made, as they are nothing worth before God, so ought to be void to vs. For if in contrastes of men those promises only do bind, in which he with whom we cștract, would haue vs bound; it is an absurdistie, that we should be drue to the keeping of those things which god doth not require of vs specially with our works are no otherwise right, but when they please God, & when consciences have this testimonie that they please him. For this remaineth certaine, whatsoever is not of faith, is sinne. Whereby Paul meaneth, that the works which is taken in hande with doubting, is therefore faultie, because faith is the roote of all good works, by which we are assured that they be acceptable to God. Therefore if it bee lawful for a Christian man to goe about nothing without this assurednesse: if by fault of ignorance they have taken any thing in hande, why should they not afterward give it over when they be delivered from errors? Sith wooves vnaduisedly made are such, they do not onlie nothing bind, but are necessarily to be undone. Yea, what if they are not onelie nothing esteemed, but also are abominable in the sight of God, as is above shewed? It is needlesse to discourse anie longer of a matter not needfull. This one argument seemeth to mee to be enough to pacifie godlie consciences and deliver them from all doubt: y whatsoever works do not flow out of the pure fountaine and be not directed to the lawfull end, are refused of God: and for refused that he no lesse forbidseth vs to goe forward in them, than to beginne them. For hereupon followeth, that those wooves which proceed of error and superstition, are both of no value before God, and to be forsaken of vs.

21 Moreover he that shall know this solution, shall haue wherewith he maye defende against the saunders of the wicked, them that depart from moncerie to some honest kind of life. They are grievously accused of breach of Faith & perjurie, because they haue broken (as it is commonly thought) the insoluble bonde wherwith they were bound to God and to the Church. But I say, there was no bond where God doth abrogate, which man confirmeth. Moreover, admitting that they were bound, when they were holden intangled with not knowing of God, and with errore nowe since they are lightened with the knowledge of the truth, I say that they are therewithall free by the grace of Christ. For if the cross of Christ haue so great effectuallnesse, that it loseth vs from the curse of the law of God, wherewith we were holden bound, how much more shall it deliver vs from foreigne bonds, which are nothing but the snaring nets of Satan? To whomsoever therefore Christ shineth with the light of his Gospell, it is no doubt but he loseth them from all snares which they had put upon themsellues by superstition. Howbeit they want not yet another defence, if they were not fit to live vnmaried. For if an impossible vow be a sure destruction of the soule, whom the Lord would have saued and not destroied: it followeth that we ought not to continue therein. But how impossible is the vowe of continence to them that are not indued with a singular gift, wee haue alreadie taught, and experience speaketh it though I holde my peace. For neither is it vnownen with how great filthiness, almost all monasteries doe swarme. And if anie of them seeme honest, and more shamefull then the rest, yet they are not therefore chaft because they supprasse and keepe in the fault of vnchastitie. So verily God doth with horrible examples take vengeance on the boldnes of men, which forgetting their owne weakness, do against nature couet that which is denied them, and despising the remedies which the Lorde had given them at hand, do trust that they can with stubbornesse and obstinacie overcome the disease of incontinence: For what else shall we call it but stubbornesse, when one being warned that he needeth marriage, and that the same is giuen him of the Lord for a remedy, doth not onely despise it, but also bindeth himself with an oth to the despising of it?

The xiii. Chapter.

Of Sacramentes.

B e side the preaching of the Gospell, an other helpe of like sort is in the Sacramentes: of which to have some certaine doctrine taught, is much behouesfull for vs, whereby we may learne both to what end they were ordained, and what is nowe the use of them. First it is meete to consider what is a Sacrament. It seemeth to mee that this shall bee a plaine and proper definition, if we say that it is an outwarde signe, wherewith the Lorde sealeth to our consciences the promises of his good will toward vs, to sustain the weakenesse of our faith: and we againe on our behalfe doe testify our godliness toward him as well before him and the Angels as before men.
We may also with more briefenesse define it otherwise, as to call it a testimonie of Gods favoure toward vs confirmed by an outward signe, with a mutual testifying of our godliness toward him. Whetheroeuer you choose of these definitions, it differeth nothing in sense from that definition of Auggulfine, which teacheth that a Sacrament is a visible signe of a holy thing, or a visible forme of imvisible grace: but it doeth better and more certainly express the thing it selfe. For whereas in that briefenesse there is some darknes, wherein many of the vnskillfull sort are deceived. I thought good in moe words to give a fuller sentence, that there should remaine no doubt.

2. For what reaon the old writers vsed this worde in that sense, it is not hard to see. For so oft as the old translator would rede in Latine this Greek worde Mysterion mysterie, specially when divine matters were intreated of, hee translated it Sacrament. So to the Ephesians, That hee might make knowen unto vs the Sacrament of his will. Againe, if yet yee haue hearde the distribution of the grace of God, which is giuen to mee in you, because according to revelation the sacrament was made knowne to me. To the Colossians, The mysterie which hath bin hidden from ages & generations, but now is manifested to his Saints, to whom the Lorde would make known the riches of this Sacrament, &c. Againe, to Timothy, A great Sacrament of godliness: God is openly shewed in the flesh. He would not say a secrete, lest he shoulde seeme to say somewhat vnder the greatnesse of the things. Therefore hee hath put Sacrament in stead of Secret, but of a holy thing. In that signification it is sometime found among the ecclesiastic-call writers, And it is well enough knowne, that those which in Latine are called Sacraments, in Grecke areMysteries; which expressing of one thing in two seuerall words endeth all the contention. And hereby it came to passe that it was drawne to those signes which had a renewinge representation of high and spiritual things. Which Augulfine also noteth in one place.
It were long (faith he) to dispute of the diversitie of signes, which when they pertaines to divine things, are called Sacraments.

3 Now of this definition which we have set, we understand that a Sacrament is never without a promise going before it, but rather is adjoyney as a certaine addition hanging to it, to this ende that it should confirm & seal the promise it self, & make it more approved vnto vs, yea after a certain manner ratified. Which meanes the Lord foreseeeth to be needfull first for our ignorance and dulness, and then for our weaknesses: & yet (to speake properly) not so much to confirm his holy worde, as to establish vs in the Faith thereof. For the true肉 of God is by it selfe found & certaine enough, and cannot from any other where receive better confirmation than from it selfe. But our Faith, as it is small and weake, vnlesse it be stayd on every side, and by all meanes vpholden, is by and by shaken, staggereth, yea, and fainteth. And herein verily the mercifull Lord, according to his great tender kindeenesse temporeth himselfe to our capacitie: that, whereas we be naturally men, which alwaye creeping vpon the ground and stickeing fast in the flesh, doe not thinke nor so much as conceiue any spirittuall thing, he vouchfauceth euén by these earthly elements to guide vs vnto himselfe, and in the flesh it selfe to set forth a mirrow of spirittuall good things. For if wee were vnbodyl (as Chrysestone saith) hee woulde haue giuen vs the verrie same things naked and vnbodyl. Nowe because wee haue soules put within bodies, he giueth spirittuall things vnder visible things. Not because there are such gifts planted in the natures of the things which are set foorth to vs in the Sacramentes: but because they were signed by God to this signification.

4 And this is it which they commonly say, that a Sacrament consisteth of the worde and the outward signe. For wee must understande the worde to bee, not that which being whispered without meaning and faith, with one ly noise as it were with a magickal enchantment hath power to consecrate the element: but which being preached made th vs to understand what the visible signe meaneth. Therefore that which was usuallly done vnder the tyrannie of the Pope, was nor without a great profaning of the mysteries. For they thought it enough, if the Priest, while the people stood amazedly gazinge at it without understanding, did mumble vp the forme of consecration. Yea, they soe purpose provided this, that no whit of doctrine should thereof come to the people: for they spoke all things in Latine before unlearned men. Afterward superstition brake out so farre, that they beleued that the consecration was not formally made, vnlesse it were with a hoarse whispering sounde which fewe might heare. But Augustine teacheth farre otherwise of the Sacramentall worde. Let the worde (faith hee) bee added to the element, and there shall bee made a Sacrament. For whence commeth this so great strength to the water, to touch the bodie and wash the soule, but by the worde making it? not because it is spoken, but because it is beleued. For in the verrie worde it selfe the sounde which passeth is one thing, and the power which abideth is an other. This is the worde of Faith which wee preach, saith the Apostle. Whereupon in the Acts of the Apostles it is saide, by faith cleansing their hearts. And Peter the Apostle saith, So baptisme also saueth vs not the putting away of the filthines of the flesh, flesh, but the examination of a good conscience. This is the word of faith which we preach by which without doubt, that it may bee able to cleanse. Baptisme also is halowed. You see how it requireth preaching, whereupon faith may grow. And we neede not to trauell much in proofe hereof, forasmuch as it is clear what Christ did, what he commanded vs to doe, what the Apostles followed, what the purer Church observed. Yea euen from the beginning of the world it is known, that so oft as God offered any signe to the holy fathers, there was added an inseparable knot of doctrine, without which our senses should be made amazed with bare beholding. Therefore when we heare mention made of the Sacramentall word, let vs understand the promise, which being with a loude voice preached of the minister, may leade the people thither as it were, by the hande, whither the signe tendeth and directeth vs.

5 Neither are some to be heard which trauel to fight against this, with a double horned argument rather suttle than sound. Either (say they) we knowe, or we know not, that the wordes of God which goeth before the sacrament, is the true will of God. If wee knowe it, then wee learne no newe thing of the sacrament which followeth after. If wee knowe it not, then neither will the sacrament teach it: whose whole force standeth in the worde. Wherunto let this briefely be for an answer: that the seales which are hanged at patentes and other publicke instruments, taken by themselfes are nothing, for as much as they should be hanged in vaine if the parchement had nothing written in it: yet they do not therefore not confirme and seal that which is written, when they are added to writings. Neither can they say that this similitude is lately fainde by vs, which Paul himselfe vsed, calling Circumcision a seale, where he purposilly traueleth to prooue, that Circumcision was not righteousnesse to Abraham, but a sealing of that couenant, by faith whereof he had alreadye bene iustified before. And what, I beseech you is there that may much offend any man, if we teach that the promise is sealed with sacraments, when of the promises themselves it is evident that one is confirmed with another? For as every one is manifest, so is it more fit to uphold faith. But the Sacraments do both bring most cleare promises, and have this pecurial more than the word, that they lively represent them to vs as it were painted out in a table. Neither ought that distinction any thing to moue vs, which is went to be objected, betwenee Sacraments and seales of patents: that whereas both consist of carnall elements of this worlde, those cannot suffice or be meece to seale the promises of God, which are spiritual and everlasting, as these are wont to be hanged to, for sealing of the grants of Princes concerning fading and fraile things. For a faithful man, when the sacramentes are present before his eyes, sticketh not in that fleshly sight, but by those degrees of proportion, which I have spoken of, hee rigeth vp with godly consideration to the high mysteries which lie hidden in the Sacraments.

6 And with the Lorde calleth his promises, couenantes: and his Sacramentes, seales of couenantes: a similitude may well bee brought from the couenantes of men. What can a low killed worke, if wordes were not vsed, yea vnlesse they went before? For lowes are many times killed without any more int-inward or higher mysterie. What can the giving of a man's right hand do, ifth ofentimes handes are matched with enmitie? But when wordes have gone before, by such signes the lawes of leages are stablished, although they were first conceiued, made, and decreed in wordes. Therefore Sacramentes are exercises which make the credit of the worde of God certainer vnto vs: and because we are carnall, they are delivered vnder carnall things, that so they should instruct vs according to the capacitie of our dullnesse, and guide vs by the hande as schoolemaisters guide children. For this reason Augustine calleth a Sacrament, a visible word: because it representeth the promises of God as it were painted in a table, & setteth them before our sight cunningly expressed & as in an image. Other similitudes also may be brought, whereby Sacraments may be more plainly set out, as if we call them pillers of our Faith. For as a building standeth & resteth vpon the foundation: yet by setting vnder of pillers, it is more surely stablished: so, Faith resteth vpon the worde of God, as vpon a foundation: but when Sacramentes are added, it standeth yet more soundly vpon them as vpon pillers. Or if wee call them looking glasse, in which we maie behold the riches of the grace of God, which he giueth vs. For (as we haue alreadie said) he doeth in them manifestly shewe himselfe to vs, so much as is giuen to our dulnesse to know, and doeth more expressely testifie his good will and loue towardes vs than by his worde.

7 Neither doe they reason fisly enough to the purpose, when they labour to prove hereby that they are not testimonies of the grace of God, because they are alfo giuen to the wicked, which yet do thereby feele God nothing more fauourable to them, but rather procure to thefelues more grievous damnation. For by the same argument neither should the Gospell, which is heard and despised of manie, be the testimony of the grace of God: nor yet Christ himself, which was seene and known of manie, of whom verie fewe receiued him. The like wee maie also see in patentes. For a great parte of the multitude laugheth at and scorneth that authentike sealke, howsoever they know that it is proceeded from the Prince to sealke his will withall: some regard it not as a thing not pertaining to them: some also abhorr eit: so that considering this so egall relation of both, that same similitude which I haue above vfed, ought more and more to be liked. Therefore it is certain that the Lorde doeth offer vnto vs mercie and a pledge of his grace both in his holi worde and in the Sacramentes: but the same is not receiued but of them which receive the word and Sacraments with sure faith: like as Christ is offered of the father vnto salvation, to all, yet he is not acknowledged and receiued of all. Augustine in one place minding to declare the same, saide that the euelnesse of the worde is shewed forth in the Sacrament: not because it is spoken, but because it is beleued. Therefore Paul, when hee speakeoth to the faithfull, so entreateth of Sacraments that he includeth the communion of Christ in them, as when he faith: alle ye that are baptised, haue put on Christ. Again, we are all one bodie and one spirite, which are baptised in Christ. But when hee speakeoth of the wrongfull vs of Sacramentes, he giueth no more to it than to colde and voide figures. Whereby hee signifieth, that howsouer the wicked and hypocrites with their peruerse fauolf do either oppress or darken or hinder the effect of the grace of God in the Sacraments, yet that withstandeth not but that where and so oft as it pleaseth God, both they may bring a true testimonie of the communicating of Christ, and the Spirit of God himselfe may deliver & perform that which they promise. We determine therefore that Sacramentes are truly called testimonies of the grace of God, and as it were certaine syllables of the good will which he beareth toward us: which by sealing it unto vs, doe by this means sustaine, nourish, conforme, and encrease our faith. As for the reasons which some are wont to object against this sentence; they are too trifling and weak. They say, that if our Faith be good, it cannot be made better; for they say that it is no faith, but which without shaking, steadfastly, and without withdrawing, resteth upon the mercie of God. It had beene better for such to pray with the Apostles that the Lorde would encrease their Faith, than carelessly to pretend such a perfection of faith, which never any of the sons of men hath obtained, nor any shall obtaine in this life. Let them answer, what manner of faith they think that he had which saide: I beliere Lorde, helpe my vnbelieuynesse. For even that faith, howsoever it was but a begun faith, was a good faith, and might bee made better when vnbelieuynesse were taken away. But they are confuted by no certainer argument than by their owne conscience. For if they confesse the selues sinners; (which whether they will or no they cannot deny) they must needs impute the same to the imperfection of their faith.

8 But (saie they) Philip aunswered the Eunuch, that he might be baptized, if he beleued with all his heart. What place here hath the confirmation of Baptisme, where faith filleth the whole heart? Again I ask them whether they do not feel a good part of their heart void of faith: whether they doe not daily acknowledge newe encrases, The heathen man gloried that he waxed old with learning, Therefore we Christians be thrise miserable, if we waxe olde with profiting nothing, whose faith ought to go forward by all degrees of ages, till it growe into a perfect man. Therefore in this place to beleue with all the heart, is not perfectly to beleue Christ, but onely from the heart and with a sincere minde to embrace him: not to be full with him, but with fervent affection to hunger, and thirst, and fight toward him. This is the manet of the Scripture, to say that that is done with the whole heart, which it meaneth to be done sincerely and heartily. Of this sort are these sayinges: I have in all my heart sought thee: I will confesse the thee in all my heart, and such other. As on the other side, where he rebuketh guilefull and deceitfull men, he saith to reproch them with heart and heart. Then they say further, that if faith be encreased by Sacramentes, the holy Ghost is given in vaine, whose strength and worke it is to begin, maintaine, and make perfect faith. To whom indeede I graunte, that faith is the proper & whole worke of the holy Ghost, by whom being enlightened wee knowe God and the treasure of his goodness, and without whose light our mind is so blind, that it can see nothing, so senselesse, that it can smell nothing of spiritual things. But for one benefit of God which they fet forth, we consider three. For first the Lord teacheth & instructeth vs with his worde; then he strengtheneth vs with Sacramentes:last of all he shineth into our mindes with the light light of his holy spirit, and openeth an entry for the word and sacraments into our hearts, which otherwise should but strike our eares, & be profit before our eyes, and nothing move the inward parts.

9 Wherefore as touching the confirmation and increase of faith, I would have the reader warned (which I think I have already in plain words expressed) that I do so assigne that ministerie to the sacraments, not as though I thought that there is perpetually in them I wrote not what secret forces, by which they may of themselves be able to further or confirm faith: but because they are ordained of the Lord to this end, that they should serve to the establishing and increasing of faith. But then only they do truly performe their office, when that inward schoolemaster the spirit is come to them, with whose only power both the hearts are pierced, & affections are moved, and the entry let open for the sacraments into our soules. If hee be absent, sacraments can do no more to our minds, than if either the brightness of the Sunne should shine vpon blind eyes, or a voyce founde to deafe eares. Therefore let make diuision betwene the spirit and sacraments, that the power of working remaine with the spirit, and to the sacraments bee left only the ministration, yea and the same void and trifling without the working of the spirit: but of much effectualnesse, when he inwardly worketh and putteth forth his force. Nowe it is plaine in what sort according to this sentence, a godly minde is confirmed in the faith by sacraments: that is to say, euen as the eyes see by the brightness of the Sunne, and the eares hear by the sounde of a voyce: of which neither the eies shoulde anie whit perceiue any light, vnielss they had a sight in themselues that might naturally be enlightened, and the eares should in vaine be knocked at with anie crying whatlocuer it were, vnielss they were naturally made and fitte to heare. But if it be true, which ought at once to be determined among vs, that what the sight worketh in our eies to seeing of the light, what the hearing worketh in our eares to the perceiuing of a voyce, the same is the worke of the holy Ghost in our hearts, both to the conceiuing, and susteyning, and cherishing and stablisshing of faith: then both these things doe likewise follow: that the sacramentes do nothing at al profit without the power of the holy Ghost: & that nothing withstandeth but that in hearts already taught of that schoolemaster, they may make faith both stronger and more encresed. Onely this difference there is, that the power of hearing and seing is naturally set in our eares and eies: but Christ beside the measure of nature doth by special grace worke the same in our minde.

10 Whereby those objections also, which comber some men, are dissolued: That if we ascribe to creatures either the increase or confirmation of faith, there is wrong done to the Spirit of God, whom we ought to acknowledge the onely authour thereof. For neither doe we in the mean time take from him either the praise of confirming or increasing it: but rather we affirm, that even this that he increaseth and confirmeth faith, is nothing else but that his inward enlightening to prepare our minde to receive that confirming which is set forth by the sacraments. But if it be, it is too darkely spoken, it shall be made very clear by a similitude which I will bring. If thou purpose with words to perswade a man to doe anie thing, thou wilt search out all the reasons, whereby he may be drawn to thy opinion, and may be in a manner subdued to obey thy counsel. But thou hast hither-to nothing prevailed, vnlesse he likewise have a percing & sharpe judgemet, whereby he may weigh what pith is in thy reasons, vnlesse also he have a tractable wit & readie to harken to teaching: finally vnlesse he have conceived such an opinion of thy faithfulness and wisdom, as may be to him like a certaine forejudgement to cause him to subscribe. For both there are manie stubborne heads, which a man can never bowe with any reasons: and also where credite is suspected, where authoritie is despised, little good is done even with the willing to learne. On the other side let all those things be present, they will truely bring to passe the hearer, to whom thou giuest counsel, will obey the selfe same counsels which otherwise he would have laughed to scorne. The same worke allo the spirite worketh in vs. For least the worde should beare our cares in vaine, least the Sacramentes should strike our eies in vaine, he sheweth vs that it is God which speaketh therein, hee softneth the stubbournes of our heart, & frameith it to the obedience which is due to the worde of the Lorde. Finally he conuicieth those outward words and sacraments from the carenes into the soule. Therefore both the word and the Sacraments do confirm our faith, when they set before our eies a good will of the heauenly father toward vs, by knowledge of whom both the whole stedfa Cette of our faith standeth fast, & the strength of it encreaseth: the spirit confirmeth it, when in engraving the same confirmation in our minds he maketh it effectuall. In the meane time the father of lights can not bee forbidden, but as he enlighteneth the bodily eies with the beames of the sunne, so he may enlighten our mindes with sacramentes, as with a brightnesse set meane betwene.

11 Which propertie the Lord taught that there was in his outward word, when in the parable he called it feede. For as feede, if it fall vpon a deseerte and untilled peece of ground, wil do nothing but die: but if it be thrown vpon arable lande well manured and tilled, it will bring forth her fruit with very good encrease: so the word of GOD, if it light vpon a stiffe necke, it will grow barren as that which is fowen vpon sand: but if it light vpon a soule manured with the bande of the heauenly spirite, it will be most fruitfull. But if there be like reason of feede and of the worde: as we say that our feede corne both springeth and encreaseth, and groweth vppe to ripeness: why may wee not saye that faith taketh out of the worde of GOD, both beginning, encrease, and perfection? Paul verie wel expresseth both these things in sundry places. For when he goeth about to put the Corinthians in remembrance how effectuall God vfed his travaile, he glorisheth that he hath the ministerie of the Spirite, as though the power of the holy Ghost were with an vnseparable knot joyned with his preaching, to enlighten and thoroughly moue the minde. But in an other place when he mindeth to admonish them, of what force the worde of God is of it selfe being preached by man, hee compar eth the ministers them selues to husbandmen, which when they haue bestowed their labour and travaile in tilling the earth haue no more to do. But what shoulde tilling, and sowing, & watering profit vnlesse that which is fowen should receive liuelinesse by heauenly benefite? Therefore?
Therefore he concludes, that both he that planteth and he that watereth are nothing: but that all things are to be ascribed to God, which alone giveth the increase. Therefore the Apostles do in their preaching ytter the power of the spirit, so far as God voucheth the instrumentes ordered by himselfe to the setting forth of his spiritual grace. Yet we must kepe still, that distinction, that we remember, what man is able to do by himselfe, and what is proper to God.

12 Sacraments are so confirmations of our faith, that many times when the Lord meaneth to take away the confidence of the very things that are by him promised in the Sacraments, he taketh away the sacramentes themselves. When he spoyleth and thrusteth away Adam from the gift of immortalitie, he fayeth: Let him not eate of the fruit of life, lest he live for ever. What faith he? Could that frute restore to Adam his corruption, from which he was now fallen? No. But this is all one as if he had saide: Lest he should enjoy a vaine confidence if he keepe the signe of my promise, let that be taken away from him which might bring him some hope of immortality. After this manner when the Apostle exhorteth the Ephesians to remember that they were fore in gifts of the testaments, strangers from the fellowship of Israel, without god, without Christ, he fayeth, that they were not partakers of Circumcision. Whereby he doth (by figure of tranfomation) signifie that they were excluded from the promise itselfe, which had not received the signe of the promise. To their other objection, that the glorie of God is conveyed to creatures, to whom so much power is ascribed, and that whereby it is so farre diminished, we have in readiness to answer that we see no power in creatures. Oney this we say, that God voucheth means and instruments, which he himselfe seeketh to be expeditious: that all things may seare his glorie, forasmuch as he is Lorde and Judge of all. Therefore as by bread and other nourishments he feedeth our body: as by the sunne he enlighteneth the world: as by fire he warmeth; yet neither bread, nor the sunne, nor fire, are any thing but so farre as by those instrumentes he doeth distribute his blessings vnto vs: so spiritually he nouriseth faith by the Sacramentes, whose onely office is to set his promises before our eyes, to be looked upon, yea to be pledges vnto vs of them. And as it is our duty to fasten none of our affiance in other creatures, which by the liberalite and bountiousnesse of God are ordained to vs, and by the ministerie whereof he giueth vs his giiftes, nor to have them in admiration, & prayse them as causes of our good: so neither ought our confidence to sticke fast in the Sacramentes, nor the glorie of God to be removed vnto them: but leaving all things, both our faith and confession ought to rise vp to him the author both of the sacraments and of all things.

13 Whereas some bring an argument out of the verie name of a Sacrament, it is nothing strong. A Sacrament (say they) whereas it hath among allowed authors many significations, yet it hath but one which agreeth with the signes: that is, whereby it signifieth that solemne oath which the soule maketh to his capitaine when he entereth into profession of a soldier. For as by that othe of warfare new soldiery do bind their faith to the capitaine, & profess to be his soldiers; so by our signes we profess Christ our capitaine, and
Of the outwarde meanes, and do testifye \\ we serue vnder his banner. They adde similitudes to make thereby the matter more plaine. As a gowne made the Romanes feuerally knowen from the Greeks which did weare cloakes: as the verie degrees of men at Rome were discerned by their feuerall signes: the degree of Senators from the degree of knightes, by purple coate & piked shoees: againe a knight from a commoner, by a ring: so we beare our signes that may make vs feuerally knowne from profane men. But by the things aforesaid is it euident enough that the olde writers, which gauue to the signes the name of Sacraments, had no regard of how this worde was vied among Latine writers, but for their owne purpose gaved this new signification, whereby they signified onely holy signes. But if wee wil searche the matter more deeply, it may seeme that they have with the same relation applied this worde to such a signification, wherewith they have removed the name of faith to that fene wherein it is nowe vied. For whereas faith is a trueth in perfouming promisses: yet they have called faith an ascribed, or sure persuaion which is had of the trueth itselfe. Likewise whereas a sacrament is the fouldiers part whereby he voweth himselfe to his captain: they haue made it the captains parte, whereby he receiue the fouldiers into roomes of service. For by the sacrament the Lord doth promise that hee shall be our God, and that we shall be his people. But we passe ouer such subtleties: for asmuch as I thinke I haue proued with arguments plaine enough, that they had respect to nothing else but to signifie that these are signes of holy and spiritual things. We receiue in deed the similitudes which they bring of outwarde tokens: but wee doe not that which is the last point in the sacramentes, is by them set for the chief, yea, and onely thing. But this is the first point, that they should serue our faith before God: the later point that they should testifie our confession before men. According to this later consideration these similitudes haue place. But in the meane time let that first point remaine: because otherwise (as we haue alreadie proued) the mysteries should be but colde, vnlesse they were helps to our faith, and additions to doctrine ordained to the same vse and ende.

Againe we must be warned, that as these men doe weaken the force, and utterly overthrowe the vse of sacraments: so on the contrarie side there be some, which faile to sacraments I wot not what secrete virtues, which are no where read to be put in them by God. By which error the simple and vn-skillfull are dangerously deceived, while they are both taught to secke the gifts of God where they cannot be found, and are by little and little drawn away from God, to embrace mere vanitie in stead of his vertue. For Sophistical schooles haue taught with great content, that the Sacramentes of the newe lawe, that is to saye those which are nowe in vse in the Christian Church, do justifie and give grace, so that we doe nor lay a stoppe of deadly sinne. It cannot be expressed how pernicious and pestilent this opinion is, and so much the more, because in many ages heretofore, to the great losse of the Church it hath prevailed in a great part of the world. Truely it is vertely diuellish. For when it promiseth righteousness without faith, it driueth soules headlong into destruction: then because it fetcheth the caufe of righteousness from the sacraments, it bindeth the miserable minde of men alreadie readie of their owne accord to muche bending to the earth, with this supersfition that they rather rest in the sight of a bodily thing than of God himself. Which two things I would to God we had not so prooved in experience, so little neede they any longe proove. But what is such a sacrament taken without faith, but the most certaine destruction of the Church: For whereas nothing is to be looked for thereof without the promis, & the promis doeth no like threaten wrath to the vnlawfull, than it offereth grace to the faithful: he is deceived that thinketh that there is any more given to him by the sacraments, than that which being offered by the worde of God, he receiued by faith.
Whereupon another thing also is gathered, by the affiance of salvation hangeth not upon the partaking of the sacrament, as though justification consisted therein: which wee know to be receiued in Christ onely, and to be comminicated vnto vs no lesse by the preaching of the Gospel, than by the seal-ling of the sacrament: and that without that it cannot wholly stand. So true is that which Augustine also writeth, that invisible sanctification may be without a visible signe, and agayne that a visible signe may be without true sanctification. For (as he also writeth in another place,) men do put on Christ sometime vntill the receiuing of a sacrament, sometime even vntill the sanctification of life. And that that point may be common both to good and to cuill:
but this other is proper to the good and godly.

Hereupon cometh that distinction if it bee well understood, which the same Augustine hath often noted, betweene a sacrament, and the thing of the sacrament. For it not only signifieth, that the figure and truth are there contained, but that they do not so hang together, but that they may be feuered: and that euin in the verie conioyning the thing must alwaye be discerned from the signe, that wee giue not to the one that which belongeth to the other. He speaketh of the separation, when he writeth that by sacraments do worke in the onely elect that which they figure. Againe, when he writeth thus of the Iewes: When the sacraments were common to all, the grace was not common, which is the power of the sacraments. So nowe also the washing of regeneration is common to all: but the grace it selfe, whereby the members of Christ are regenerate with their head, is not common to all.
Againe, in another place of the Supper of the Lord, We also at this day receive visible meate: But the sacrament is one thing, and the power of the sacrament another thing. What is this, that many receiue of the altar and dy, and in receiuing do dy? For the Lordes morsefull was poyson to Judas: not because he receiued an euill thing, but because he being euill receiued a good thing euillie. A little after: The sacrament of this thing, that is of the vnity of the bodie and bloud of Christ, is somewhere prepared on the Lordes table dayly, somewhere by cerneine distances of daies: and thereof is receiued vnto life to some, and vnto destruction to some. But the thing it selfe whereof it is a sacrament, is receiued vnto life to all men, but vnto destruction to no man, who souer is partaker of it. And a little before hee had saide, Hee shall not dy which eateth: but hee which partaketh to the power of the sacrament, not to the visible sacrament: which eateth within, not without: which eateth with heart, not hee which pressteth with tooth. Thus you heare euery where, that a sacrament is so seuered from his owne true by the vnworthinesse of the receiver, there remaineth nothing but a vaine & vnprofitable figure. But thou maist haue not a signe void of truth, but the thing with the signe, thou must conceiue by faith, which is there enclosed. So how much thou shalt by the sacraments profite in communicating of Christ, so much profit shall thou take of them.

16 If this be somewhat darke because of the shortenesse, I will set it out in mo wordes. I say that Christ is the matter, or (if thou wilt) the substance of all sacraments: for as much as in him they have all their perfectnesse, and do promise nothing without him. So much lesse tolerable is the error of Peter Lombard, which doth expressly make them causes of rightousnesse and salvation, whereof they are partes. Therefore bidding all causes farewell which mens vnto fasting and inimical, wee ought to stay in this one cause. Therefore how much we be by their ministerie holpen to the nourishing, confirming, and encreasing of the true knowledge of Christ in vs, and to the possessing of him more fully, and to the enjoying of his riches, so much effectuallenesse they haue with vs. But that is done when we doe with true faith receive that which is there offered. Do the wicked the (wilt thou say) bring to passe by their vnthankfulnesses, that the ordinances of God be voide and turne to nothing? I answere that that which I haue saide, is not so to bee taken, as though the force and truth of the sacrament did hang vp the state or will of him that receiued it. For that which God hath ordained remaineth steadfast and keepe still his nature, howsoever men doe variue. But if it is one thing to offer, another to receive: nothing withstandeth but that the signe hauelo by the word of God may be in deed that which it is called, and keepe his owne force: and yet that there come thereby no profite to an euill doer and wicked man. But Augustine doeth in few words well affoile this question. If (faith he) thou receiuest carnally, it ceaseth not to be spiritual: but it is not to thee. But as Augustine hath in the aforesaid places shewed that a sacrament is a thing nothing worth, if it be seuered from the truth thereof: so in another place he giueneth warning that euin in the vtrie conjoining needeth a distinction, lest we sticke too much in the outward signes. As (faith he) to follow the letter, & to take the signes in stead of the things, is a point of seurele weaknesse: so to expounde the signes vnprouitably is a point of euill wandring error. Hee nameth two faultes which are here to bee avoided: The one when we do take the signes as though they were giuen in vaine, and when with abacing or diminishing their secrete significations by our enviousnesse, wee bring to passe that they bring vs no profite at all. The other, when in not raising our minds beyond the visible signe, wee giue away to the Sacrament the praysie of all those good things which are not giuen vs but of Christ onely, and that by the holy Ghost, which makest vs parte-kets of Christ himselue: and in deed by the helpe of the outward signes: which if they allure vs to Christ, when they bee wrested an other way, the whole profite of them is vnworthilye ouer-thrown.

17 Wherefore let this remaine certaine, that there is no other office of the sacraments than of the worde of God which is to offer and sette forth Christ vnto vs, and in him the treasures of heauenly grace: but they auail or profit nothing, but being receiv'd by faith: even as wine, or oyle, or any other liquor, though you pour it on largely, yet it will run beside and perish, vnless e the vessels mouth be open to receive it, and the vessel though it bee wette rounde abont on the outside, shall nevertheless remaine emptie and voyde within. Beside this we must beware, leaft those things which haue bin written by the olde writers somewhat too gloriously to amplifie the dignitie of sacraments, should lead vs away into an error neere to this: namely that we should thinkke that there is some secret power knit & fastened to the sacraments, y they may of themselves give vs the graces of the holy Ghost, like as wine is gien in a cup: whereas only this office is appointed to them by God, to testifye and establish to vs the good will of GOD towards vs, and do profite no further vnlesse the Holy Ghoste ioyneth himselfe to them, which may open our minde and heartes, and make vs partakers of this testimonie, when in also do clearely appeare divers and seuerall graces of God. For the sacraments, as we haue above toucht, are that thing to vs of God, which to men are messengers of joyfull things, or earnestes in stablising of bargains: which doe not of themselves give any grace, but doe tell and shew vs, and (as they be earnestes & tokens,) do ratifie vnto vs those things that are given vs by the liberalitie of God. The Holy Ghoste (whome the sacraments do not in common without difference bring to al men, but whom the Lorde peculiarly giueth to them that be his) is he that bringeth the graces of GOD with him, which giueth to the sacramentes place in vs, which maketh them to bring forth fruite. But although we doe not deny that God himselfe with the most present power of his Spirit is present with his own institution, least the ministration which he hath ordeyned of the sacramentes should be fruitlesse and vain; yet we affirme that the inward grace of the Spirit, as it is seuered from the outward ministerie, so ought to be seuerally weighed and considered. God therefore truly perfourmeth in deed whatsoever he promiseth and figureth in signes: neither do the signes want their effect, that the author of them may be prooved true and faithfull. The question here is onely whether GOD worketh by his owne and by inward power (as they call it) or do resigne his office to outward signes. But wee affirme, that whatsoever instruments he use, his originally working is nothing hindered thereby. When this is taught concerning the sacramentes, both their dignitie is honorably set out, and their vse is plainly shewed, and their profitableuaie is abundantly reported, and the best meane in all these things is retaine, that neither any thing be giuen to them which ought not, nor againe any thing be taken from them which is not convenient to be taken from them. In the meane time that gained deuise is taken away, whereby the cause of justification and power of the holy Ghost is inclosed in elementes as in vessels or waggons, and that principal force which hath bee omitted of other is expressly set out. Here also it is to be noted, that God inwardly worketh y which the minister figureth and testifieth by outward doing: leaft that be drawn to a mortal man, which God claimeth to himselfe alone. The same thing also doth Augustine wisely touch, Howe (faith he) doth both Moses sanctifie, and God? Not Moses for GOD: but Moses with visible sacramentes by his ministerie, but GOD with inuincible grace.

Grace by his holy Spirit: where also is the whole fruite of visible sacraments. For without this sanctification of invisible grace, what doe those visible sacraments profit?

18 The name of sacraments, as we have hitherto entreated of the nature of it, doth generally containe all the signes that ever God gav in to me, to certify and assure them of the truth of his promises. Those he sometime willcd to remaine in natural thinges, sometime he delivered them in miracles. Of the first kinde these bee examples, as when he gav to Adam and Eue, the tree of life for an earnest of immortalitie, that they might assure themselves of it, so long as they did eate of the fruite thereof. And when he did set the heavenly bowe for a monument to Noe and his posteritie, that hee would no more from thence forth destroy the earth with overflowing of water. These Adam & Noe had for sacramentes. Not that the tree did give them immortalitie, which it could not give to it self: nor that the Bowe (which is but a striking backe of a sunne-aine upon the clouds against it) was of force to hold in the waters, but because they had a marke grauen in them by the worde of God, that they should bee examples and seals of his testamentes. And the tree was a tree before, and the bowe a bowe. When they were written vpon with the worde of God, then a newe forme was put into them, that they should beginne to be that which they were not before. That no man should thinke these things spoken without cause, the bowe it selfe is at this day also a witness of that covenant, which God made with Noe: which bowe so oft as we behold, we reade this promise of God written in it, that the earth shall never be destroyed with overflowing of waters. Therfore if any fond Philosopher, to scorn the simplicitie of our faith, doe affirm that such varietye of colours doeth naturally arise of refelcted beamses and a cloude sette against them: lette vs graunnt it in deed, but let vs laugh to scorn his senselesse folie, which doth not acknowledge God the Lorde and governour of nature: which at his owne wil vs feth all the elementes to the service of his owne glorie. If he had emprinted such tokens in the sunne, the starrs, the earth, stones, and such like, they should all have beene sacramentes to vs. Why are not vncoyned & coyned silver both of one value, if they are both one metal? even because the one hath nothing but nature: when it is stricken with a common marke, it is made money, and receiueth a newe vallatie. And shoall not God be able to mark his creatures with his word, that they may bee made sacramentes, which before were naked elements? Of the second kinde these were examples, when hee shewed to Abraham a light in a smoking ouen: when hee watered the flesse with dewe, the earth remaining drye: againe hee watered the earth, the flesse beeing untouched, to promise victorie to Gideon: when he drewe the shadowe of the dial ix. liues backward, to promise safetie to Ezechias. These things, when they were done to relieue and stablish the weakenesse of their faith, were then also sacramentes.

19 But our present purpose is, to discourse peculiarly of those sacramentes, which the Lorde willed to bee ordinarie in his Church, to nourish his worshippers and seruantes into one faith and the confession of one faith. For (to vs the wordes of Augustine) men can bee congealed together into into no name of religion either true or false, unless ye be bound together with some fellowship of visible signes and sacraments. Sith therefore the most good father foresawe this necessitie, hee did from the beginning ordaine certaine exercises of godlineesse for his seruauntes, which afterwaerde Satan by turning them to wicked and superstitious worshippinges, hath many waies depraued and corrupted. Hereupon came those solemn professions of the gentiles into their holy orders, and other bastarde vlages: which although they were full of error and superstition, yet they also were therewith a proofe that men could not in profession of religion bee without such outward signes. But because they neither were grounded vpon the worde of God, nor were referred to that true faith whereunto all signes ought to bee directed, they are vnworthie to bee rehearsed where mention is made of the holy signes which are ordained of God & have not swarued from their foundation, that is, that they should be hel pes of true godlineesse. They consist not of bare signes, as were the boawe and the tree, but vpon Ceremonies: or rather the signes that bee here giuen are Ceremonies. But as it is aboue saide, that they be on the Lordes behalfe testimonies of grace & salvation: so they be againe on our behalfe marks of profession, by which wee openly sweare to the name of God, for our partes binding our faith vnto him. Therefore Chrysostome in one place fity calleth them couenantings whereby God bindeth himselfe in league with vs, and wee bee bounde to purerennesse and holinesse of life, because here is made a mutuall forme of couenanting betwenee God and vs. For as the Lorde therein promiseth that hee will cancel and blot out whatsoever guiltinesse and penaltie we haue gathered by offending, and doth reconcile vs to himselfe in his only begotten sonne: so wee againe on our behalfe do by this profession bind our selues vnto him to the following of godlineesse and innocencie: so that a man may rightly say, that such sacraments are ceremonies, by which God will exercise his people first to the nourishing, stirring vp, and strengtheninge of faith inwardly, then to the testifying of religion before men.

20 And even these sacraments also were diuerse, after the diuerse order of time, according to the distribution whereby it pleaseth the Lorde to shewe himselfe after this or that manner to men. For to Abraham and his posteritie Circumcision was commaunded whereunto afterward purifyings and Sacrifices, and other Ceremonies were added out of the lawe of Moses. These were the Sacramentes of the Iewes vntill the comming of Christ: at which comming those being abrogate, two sacramentes were ordaine d, which nowe the Christian Church vth Baptsisme, and the Supper of the Lord. I speake of those that were ordaine d for the vs of the whole Church. For as for the laying on of hands, whereby the ministers of the Church are entered into their office, as I doe not unwillingly suffer it to bee called a Sacrament, so I doe not reken it among the ordinarie Sacramentes. As for the rest which are commonly called Sacramentes, what they are to bee accounted, wee shall see by and by. Howebeit the olde Sacramentes also had respect to the same markes, whereunto ours doe tende, that is, to direct, and in a manner lead by the hand to Christ: or rather as images to represent him, and shewe him foorth to be known. For whereas wee have already die die taught, that they are certaine scales wherewith the promises of God are sealed: and where it is most certain, that there was never offered any promise of God to men but in Christ: that they may teach vs of some promise of God, they must needs shewe Christ. Whereunto pertaineth that heavenly patern of the tabernacle and of the worshipping in the lawe, which was given to Moses in the mount. One onely difference there is, that those did shadowe out Christ being promised, when he was yet looked for: these doe testify him already given and delivered.

21 When these things shal be particularly and eache one severally declare, they shall bee made much plainer. Circumcision was to the lawe a signe, whereby they were put in minde, that whatsoever commeth of the seede of man, that is to say the whole nature of man is corrupt, and hath neede of proyning. Moreover it was a teaching, and token of remembrance whereby they should confirme themselves in the promise given to Abraham, concerning that blessed seede in whom all the nations of the earth were to bee blessed, from whom they had their owne blessing to bee looked for. Nowe that healthfull seede (as we are taught of Paul) was Christ, in whom alone they hoped that they should recover that which they had lost in Adam. Wherefore Circumcision was to them the same thing which Paul saith that it was to Abraham, namely the seal of the righteousnesse of faith: that is to saye, the seede whereby they should be more certainly asur'd, that their faith, wherewith they looked for that seede, should bee accounted to them of God for righteousness. But we shall yet on a better occasion in an other place goe through with the comparison of Circumcision & Baptisme. Baptisme and purifying did set before their eyes their owne uncleanness, filthnese and pollution, whereby they were desiled in their own nature: but they promised another washing, wherein they should be washed and washed away. And this washing was Christ, with whose blood we being washed doe bring his cleannesse into the sight of God, that it may hide all our desillnes. Their Sacrifices did accuse them of their owne wickednesse, and therewithall did teach, that it was necessarie that there should bee some satisfaction, which should bee paid to the judgement of God. That therefore there should bee some one cheefe Eithoppe, a mediator betweene God and men, which should satisfie God by shedding of bloude, and by offering of a Sacrifice which should suffice for the forgiveness of sinnes. This cheefe Priest was Christ: hee himself shed his owne bloude: hee himselfe was the Sacrifice: for hee offered himselfe obedient to his father vnto death: by which obedience hee tooke away the disobedience of man, which had provoked the displeasure of God.

22 As for our sacramentes, they doe so much more clearely presenge Christ vnto vs, as hee was more neerely shewed to men, since he hath been truly delivered of his father such as he had beene promised. For baptisme doth testify vnto vs that we are cleansed & washed, the Supper of thanksgiving testifieth that wee bee redeemed, In water, is figured washing: in bloude, satisfaction. These two things are founde in Christ, which (as faith) came in water and bloude, that is to say that hee might cleane and redeeme. Of which thing the spirit of God alfo is a witness. Yea there are three witnesses in one, Water, Blood, and Spirit: In water and blood we have a testimony of cleansing and redeeming: but the Spirit, the principal witness, bringeth unto us assured credite of such witnessing. This high mystical hath notably well shewed us in the cross of Christ, when water and blood flowed out of his holy side: which side for that cause Augustine rightfully called the fountain of our Sacraments: of which yet we must entreat somewhat more at large. There is no doubt but that more plenteous grace also of the Spirit doth here shew us forth it selfe if you compare time with time. For that pertaineth to the glory of the kingdome of Christ, as we gather out of many places, but specially out of the 7. Chapter of John, in which sense we must take that saying of Paul, that under the law were shadowes, but in Christ is the body. Neither is it his meaning to spoile of their effect the testimonies of grace, in which Gods will was in the old time to prooue himselfe to the Fathers a true speaker, even as at this day he doeth to us in Baptisme and in the holy Supper. But onely his purpose was by waie of comparison to magnifie that which was given vs, least any should thinke it marvellous, that the Ceremonies of the lawe were abolished by the coming of Christ.

The sacraments of the newe testament baptisme & the supper of the Lord, wherein Christ sheweth more clearely than in the sacraments of the old.

1. John. 5. 6.

23 But that same Schoole doctrine (as I may also briefly touch this by the way) is utterly to be hilles out, whereby there is noted so great a difference between the Sacramentes of the old and new law, as though those did nothing but shadow out the grace of God, and these doe presently give it. For the Apostle speakereth no less honourably of those than of these, when he teacheth that the Father did cause the same spiritual meat, which we eate, and expoundeth that same meat to be Christ. Who dare make that an empirie signe, which delivered to the Iews a true communion of Christ? And the gronde of the cause which the Apostle there handeleth, doeth plainly fight on our side. For, that no man trusting upon a colde knowledge of Christ, and empty title of Christianitie, and outward tokens, should presume to despise the judgement of God: he sheweth forth examples of Gods feuertie to be seen in the Iews: that we should knowe that the same paines which they haue suffered, hang over vs, if wee followe the same faults. Now that the comparison might be fitte, it behoved that he should shew that there is no vnequalnesse betweene vs & the in those good things whereof hee did forbid vs to boast falsely. Therefore first hee makest vs equal in the Sacramentes, and leaueth vs not so much as any smal piece of prerogatire, that might encourage vs to hope of escaping unpunished. Neither verily is it lawfull to give any more to our Baptisme, than hee in another place giueth to circumcision, when he calleth it the scale of the righteousnesse of Faith. Whatsoever therefore is at this day giuen vs in our Sacramentes, the same thing the Iews in olde time receiued in theirs, that is to say, Christ with his spiritual riches. What power our Sacramentes haue, the same they also felt in theirs: that is to say, that they were to them scales of Gods good will towardes them, into the hope of eternall salvation. If they had beene apt expostors of the Epistle to the Hebrues, they would not have so beene blinded. But when they reade there, that sinnes were not cleansed by the Ceremonies of the lawe, ye the old shadowes had no auai.
Cap. 14. Of the outwarde meanes

ling force to righteousness: they neglecting the comparison which is there handled, while they tooke holde of this one thing, that the law of itself nothing profited the followers of it, thought simply that the figures were voide of truth; but the Apostles meaning is to bring the ceremonial lawe to nothing, vntill it come to Christ, vpon whom alone hangeth all the effectuallnesse of it.

What is spoke in scripture to diminish the estimation of circumcision, the same in like occasion and sense might as well be faide of baptism.

1. Cor. 10. 5
Col. 2. 11.

But they wil object those things which are read in Paul concerning the circumcision of the letter, that it is in no estimation with God, that it giveth nothing, that it is vaine. For such sayings seeme to preffe it downe farre beneath Baptisme. Not so. For the verie same might rightfully bee faide of baptism. Yea and alio the same is faide, first of Paul himselfe, where he sheweth that God regarde not the outwarde washing whereby wee enter into profession of religion, vntill the minde within be both cleansed and continue in cleannesse to the ende: againe of Peter, when he testifieth that the truth of baptism standeth not in the outwarde washing, but in a good witnessing of conscience. But he seemeth also in another place vterly to despire the circumcision made with hande, when he compareth it with the circumcision of Christ. I answer that even in this place nothing is abated of the dignitie of it. Paul there disputeth against them, which required it as necessarie when it was now abrogate. Therefore he warneth the faithfull, that leaving the olde shadowes they should stonde fast in the truth. These maisters (faith he) instantly call vpon you, that your bodies may be circumciued. But yee are spiritually circumciued according to the soule and bodie. Ye haue therfore the deliverance of the thing in deed, which is much better than the shadowe. A man might take exception to the contrary and say that the figure is not therefore to be despyed because they had the thing in deed: for so much as the putting off of the olde man, of which he there spake, was also among the Fathers, to whom ye outward circumcision had not bin superfuous: He preuenteth this objection, when he by and by addeth, that the Colossians were buried with Christ by Baptisme. Whereby he signifieth that at this day Baptisme is the same to Christians, which circumcision was to the old people: and therefore that circumcision cannot bee enioyned to Christians without wrong done to Christ.

But that which followeth and which I euen nowe alleaged, is harder to assoyle, that all the Jewish ceremonies were shadowes of things to come, and that in Christ is the body: but most hard of all is that which is intreated in many Chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrues, that the blood of beasts, attained not to coéciences; that the law had a shadow of good things to come, not an image of things: that the followers of it obtained no perfection of the Ceremonies of Moses & such other. I goe back to which I haue already toucht, that Paul doth not therefore make the ceremonies shadowish, because they had no foud thing in them; but because the fulfilling of them was after a certaine manner hanged in suspence vntil the deliuering of Christ. Againe I saie that this is to be vnderstanded not of the effectuallnesse, but rather of the manner of signifying. For till Christ was manifestly shewed in the flesh, all the signes did shadowe him out as absent, howsoever hee did inwardly vter to the faithful the presence of his power and of himselfe.
To Salvation.

Lib. 4: 435

But this we ought chiefly to marke, that in all those places Paul doth not speak simply, but by way of contention. Because he striu'd with the false Apostles, which would have godliness to consist in the Ceremonies only without any respect of Christ: to confute them, it sufficeth only to intreate, of what value Ceremonies are by themselves. This marke also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrewes followed. Let vs therefore remembe, that here is disput'd of Ceremonies, not as they be taken in their owne and natural signification; but as they be wrested to a false and wrongfull exposition: not of the lawfull use of them, but of the abuse of superstition. What meaneth it therefore if ceremonies being sever'd from Christ, are unclothed of all force? For all signes whatsoever they be, are brought to nought, when the thing signified is taken away. So when Christ had to doe with them which thought that Manna was nothing else but meat for the bellie, hee applieth his speech to their grosse opinion, and faith that he ministreth better meat, which may feede foules to hope of immortalitie. But if you require a plainer solution, the summe of all tendeth to this: First, that all that furniture of ceremonies, which was in the lawe of Moses, is a vanishing thing and of no value, vrs'de to be directed to Christ. Secondly, that they so had respect to Christ, \\nand yet when they at length were manifestly shew'd in the flesh, they had their fulfilling. Finally that it behooved that they should be taken away by his comming, as a shadowe vanisheing away in the cleare light of the sunne. But because I do yet differ from longer discourse of that matter unto that place where I have purposed to compare baptism with circumcision, therefore I do now more sparingly touch it.

26 Perhaps also those immeasurable praises of Sacraments, which are read in old writers concerning our signes, deceived those miserable Sophisters. As this of Augustine. That the Sacramentes of the olde lawe did one ly promise the Saviour, but ours do giue salvation. When they marked not that these and such other formes of speakeing were spoken: they also published their excessive doctrines, but in a cleane contrarie sense from the writing of the olde fathers. For Augustine meant no other thing in that place than as the same Augustine wrote in another place, That the Sacramentes of the law of Moses did fo err of Christ, but ours do tel of him present. And against Paulinus. That those were promises of things to be fulfilled, these were tokens of things fulfilled: as if he should say, that those figured him when he was looked for, but ours do it as were him present which hath beene already deliver'd. Moreover he speaketh of the manner of signifying, as also he sheweth in another place. The lawe (faith hee) and the Prophets had Sacramentes, foretelling of a thing to come: but the Sacraments of our time do testify that that is already come, which those did declare to be to come. But what he thought of the thing and effectuallnesse, hee expandeth in many places: as when he faith, that the Sacraments of the Lawes were in signes, diverse: but in the thing signified, equall with ours: diverse in visible forme, but equal in spiritual power. Again: in diverse signes is all one faith: so in diverse signes, as in diverse wordes: because wordes change their foundes by times: and truely wordes are nothing but signes. The Fathers did drinke the same spirituall drinke, for they dronke not the same bodily drinke.
Cap. 15. Of the outwarde meanes

See ye therefore, Faith remaining one, the signes varied. To them the rock was Christ: to vs that is Christ which is set upon the altar. And they dronke for a great Sacrament, the water flowing out of the rocke: what we drinke, the faithfull knowe. If thou consider the visible forme they dronke an other thing: if an understandable signification they dronke the same spiritual drinke. In another place, in the mysterie the same is their meate and drink which is ours: but the same in signification, not in forme: because the selfe same Christ was figured to them in the rocke, and shewed to vs in the flesh. Howbeit in this behalfe also we graunt that there is some difference. For both sacramentes doe teftifie that the fatherly good wil of God and the graces of the holy Ghost are offered vs in Christ: but our Sacraments teftifie it more clearely and brightly. In both is a delivering of Christ: but in these more plenteous and fuller, namely as that difference of the olde and newe Testament beareth, of which we have intreated before. And this is it that the same Augustine meant (whom we more often alledge as the best and faithfull est witness of all the olde writers) where he teacheth that when Christ was reveale, sacraments were ordained both in number fewer, in signification higher, in force more excellent. Of this thing also it is expedient that the readers briefly be warned, that whatsoever the scribes have trisingly taught concerning the worke wrought, is not onely falle, but disagree with the nature of the sacraments, which God hath ordained, y the faithfull being voide and needie of all good things should bring nothing thither but beggerie. Whereupon followeth that in receiving them, these men do nothing whereby they may deserve praise: or that in doing (which in this their respect is mereely passiu)e no worke can be acribed vnto them.

The xv. Chapter.

Of Baptisme.

Baptisme is a signe of the entring wherewith we are received into fellow- ship of the Church, that being graffed into Christ, we may bee reckned among the children of God. Now it was giuen vs of God to this end, (which I haue taught to be common to all the mysteries) first, that it should serve to our faith with him, and to our confession before men. Wee will orderly declare the manner of both purposes. Baptisme bringeth three things to our Faith, which also must bee severally intreated of. This is the first which the Lorde setteth out vnto vs, that it should be a token and proofe of our cleansing: or (to expresse my minde better) it is like to a certaine sealed charter, whereby he confirmeth vnto vs, that all our sinnes are so defaced, cancelled, and blotted out, that they may never come in his sight, not be rehearsed, not be imputed. For he willeth that all they that beleue, should bee baptised into forgiveness of sinnes. Therefore they which thought that baptism is nothing else but a marke and token whereby we profess our religion before men, as sooldiers bare the consuance of their captain for a mark of their profession, weigh not that which was the cheefe thing in Baptisme. That is this, that we should receive it with this promise, that whosoever bebeleeue & are baptised, shall be saued.

2. In this sense is that to be understood which Paul writeth, that the Church is sanctified of Christ her spouse, and cleansed with washing of water in the word of life. And in another place, that we are saued according to his merrie by the washing of regeneration and of the renewing of the holy Ghost. And that which Peter writeth, that baptism is saueh v$. For Pauls will was not to signifie, that our washing and saluation is perfectly made by water, or that water containeth in it selfe the power to cleane, regenerate, and renew. Neither did Peter meane the caufe of saluation, but onely the knowledge and certainie of such gifts to be received in this Sacrament; which is euidently enough expressed in the wordes themselves. For Paul kniwweth together the words of life, and baptism of water: as if he had said, that by the Gospel the message of washing & sanctifying is brought vs, that by baptism such message is sealed. And Peter immediately adioyneth, that that baptism is not the putting away of the filthines of the flesh, but a good conscience before God, which is of Faith. Yet baptism promiseth vs no other cleansing, but by the sprinkling of the bloud of Christ: which is figured by water, for the likeness of cleansing and washing. Who therefore can faie, that we be cleansed by this water, which certainly testifieth that the bloud of Christ is our true and onely washing? So that from nowe where else can be fetched a surer reason to confute their blinde errour which referre all things to the power of the water, than from the signification of Baptisme itselfe: which doeth withdrawe vs as wel from that visible element which is set before our eyes, as from all other meanes, that it may bind our minde to Christ alone.

3. Neither is it to be thought that Baptisme is applied onely to the time past, that for newe fallings, into which we fall backe after Baptisme, we must seeke newe remedies of cleansing in Ioure not what other Sacramentes, as though the force of Baptisme were wore out of vs. By this errour it came to passe in olde time, that some would not be baptised but in the uttermost peril of life, and at their last gaspings, that so they might obtaine pardon of their whole life. Against which waywarde subtle pouision the olde Bishops so oft inveigh in their wrightinges. But thus we ought to thinke, that at what time soever we be Baptised, we are at once washed and cleansed for all our life. Therefore so oft as we fall we must go backe to the remembrance of baptism, & therewith we must armie our mind, that it may be alway certaine & assured of the fouguenes of sinnes. For though when it is once minisftred, it seemeth to be past, yet by later sinnes it is not abolishe. For the cleannes of Christ is therein offered v$, that alway flourishe, is oppressed with no spots, but overwhelmeth & wipeth away all our filthines: yet ought we not to take thereof a libertie to sinne in time to come (as verily we be not hereby armed to such boldnes): but this doctrine is given onely to them, which when they have sinned, doe themselves oppressed & under their sins, that they may haue wherewith they may raise vp & comfort themselves, lest they should fall into confusion & desperation. So Paul faith, that Christ was made to vs a propitiator, v$ to the fouguenes of faults going before. Wherein he denieth not that therein is obtained perpetuall & continuall forguences of sinnes formation of the washing out of all sinne and not onely of sinnes past before we be baptised.

Cap. 15. Of the outwarde meanes euen vnto death; but he meaneth that it was given of the Father, onely to poor sinners, which wounded with the searing iron of conscience, doe sigh to the Phisition, To these the mercie of God is offered. They which by escaping of punishment do hunt for matter & libertie to sinne, doe nothing but prouoke to themselves the wrath and judgement of God.

4 I know in deede that it is commonly thought otherwise: that by the benefit of repentance & of the keies we do after Baptisme obtaine forgiveness of the power of the keies, whereof they speake, doth so hang upon baptisme that it ought in no wise to be seuered. The sinnes receive euery forgiveness by the minisiterie of the Church, namely not without the preaching of the Gospel. But what manner of preaching is that? That we bee cleansed from sinnes by the bloud of Christ. But what signe & testimonie is there of that washing, but Baptisme? We see therefore how that absolution is referred to Baptisme. And this error hath bred vs the fained Sacrament of penance, of which I haue touched somewhat before, & the residue I will make an end of in place fit for it. But it is no marueile if men, which according to the grossenesse of their wit were immeasurable faftied to outward things, haue in this behalf also bewrayed that fault, that not contented with the pure institution of God, they did thrift in newe helps faftied of themselues. As though baptisme itself were not a Sacrament of repentance. But if repentance be commended to vs for our whole life, the force also of baptisme ought to be extended to the same bounds. Wherefore it is also no doubt but that all the godly throughout all their life long, so oft as they be vexed with knowledge in conscience of their own sinnes, dare call back themselves to the remembrance of baptisme, that thereby they may confirme themselves in the affiance of that onely & continuall washing which we haue in the blood of Christ.

5 It bringeth also another fruitle, because it theeweth vs our mortification in Christ, & new life in him. For (as the Apostle faith) we are baptised into his death, being buried together with him into death, that we may walke in newnesse of life. By which words he doth not only exhort vs to the following of him (as though he did say, that we are by baptisme put in minde, that after a certaine example of the death of Christ, we should die to our lustes: and after the example of his resurrection, we should be raised vp to righteousness;) but he fetcheth the matter much deeper: that is to say, that by baptisme Christ hath made vs partakers of his death, that we may bee graffed into it. And as the graffe receiueth substance and nourishment of the roote into which it is graffed: so they that receive baptisme with such faith as they ought, do truly feel the effectuallnesse of the death of Christ in the mortifying of their flesh: and therewithall also they feel the effect of his resurrection in the quickening of the Spirite. Hereupon bee gathereth matter of exhortation: that if wee be Christians, wee ought to be dead to sinne, and to liue to righteousness. This selle same argument he vseth in another place that we bee circumcised, and have put off the old man, since that we be buried in Christ by Baptisme. And in this selle, in the same place which we haue before allsgaded, he called it the washing of regeneration and of re-

A second use of baptisme to shew us our mortification and newnesse of life.

Tit. 3:5.
nuing. Therefore first free forgiuenesse of sinnes and imputation of righteousnes is promised vs, and then the grace of the holy Ghost, which may reforme vs into newnesse of life.

6 Last of all our faith receiveueth also this profit of baptisme, that it certainly testifieth vnto vs, that we are not onely graffed into the death & life of Christ, but that we are fo united to Christ himselfe that wee are partakers of all his good things. For therefore he hath dedicated and hallowed Baptisme in his owne bodie, that he might have it common with vs, as a most strong bond of the vnite and fellowshipp which he vouchsafe to enter into with vs: so that Paul prouech thereby that we be the children of God, because we have put on Christ in baptisme. So we see that the fulfilling of baptism is in Christ, whom also for this reason we call the proper object of baptisme. Therefore it is no maruëe if it be reported that the Apostles baptised into his name, which yet were commannded to baptise into the name of the Father also and of the holy Ghost. For whatsoever gifts of God are set forth in baptisme, are found in Christ alone. And yet it cannot bee, but that hee which baptiseth into Christ, doth therefore call upon the name of the Father and of the holy Ghost. For we are therefore cleansed with his bloud, because the mercifull Father according to his incomparable kindnes, willing to receive vs into favour, hath set him a mediator in the midst to procure vs favour with him. But regeneration we so onely obtaine, by his death and resurrection, if being sanctified by the Spirit we be endued with a newe and spiritual nature. Wherefore both of our cleansing & regeneration we obtaine and after a certaine maner distinctlie perceive the cause in the Father, the matter in the Sonne, and the effect in the holy Ghost. So John first baptised, so afterward the Apostles, with the baptisme of repentance into the forgiuenesse of sinnes: meaning by this word repentance, such regeneration and by forgiuenesse of sinnes, washing.

7 Whereby also it is made most certaine, yt the ministerie of John was altogether the same which was afterward committed to the Apostles. For the diverse hands wherewith it is ministrif, make not the baptisme diuers: but the same doctrine sheweth it to be the same baptisme. John and the Apostles agreed into one doctrine: both baptised into repentance, both into the forgiuenesse of sinnes, both into the name of Christ, from whom was both repentance and forgiuenesse of sinnes. John said yt he was the Lambe of God, by whom the sinnes of the world should be taken away: where hee made him the sacrifice acceptable to the Father, the propitiator of righteousnes, the author of saluation. What could the Apostles adde to this confession? Wherefore let it trouble no man, that the old writers labor to feuer the one from the other, whose voice we ought not so much to esteeme that it maye shake the certificate of the scripture. For who will rather harken to Chrysostome denying that forgiuenesse of sinnes was comprehended in the baptisme of John, than to Luke contrariwise affirming yt John preached the baptisme of repentance into the forgiuenesse of sinnes? Neither is that suttletie of Augustine to be receuied, that in the baptisme of John sinnes were forgiuen in hope, but in the baptisme of Christ they are forgiuen in deed. For whereas the Evangelist plainly testifieth, that John in his baptisme promised the

the foruinenes of finnes: what need we to abate this títle of commendatiō, when no necessitie compelleth vs vnto it? But if any man seekē for a differ-rence out of the worde of God, he shall finde none other but this, that John baptised into him that was to come, the Apostles into him that had already presented himselfe.

8 As for this that more abundant graces of the Spirit were poures out since the resurrection of Christ, it maketh nothing to stablishe a diversitie of baptismes. For the baptism which the Apostles ministred while he was yet conceaued in earth, was called his: yet it had no larger plentifulness of the spirit, than the baptism of John. Yea, even after his ascension, the Spirit was not giuen to the Samaritans aboue the common measure of the faithful before the ascension, although they were baptised into the name of Jesus, till Peter and John were sent vnto them to lay their handes vpon them.
This onely thing, as I thinke, deceived the olde writers, that they sayde that the baptism of John was but a preparation to the baptism of Christ, because they reade, that they were baptised againe of Paul, which had once received the baptism of John. But how much they were therein deceiver, thal els where be plainly declared in place fit for it. What is it therefore that John said, that he baptised in deede with water, but that Christ shoulde come which should baptize with the holy Ghost, and with fire? This may in fewe wordes be asfoyled. For he meant not to put difference betweene the one baptisme and the other, but he compared his owne person with the person of Christ, saying that himselfe was a minister of water, but Christ was the giver of the holy Ghost, and should declare his power by visible miracle. The same day that he should sende the holy Ghost to the Apostles under syrie tongues. What could the Apostles boast of more than this? What more could they also that baptised at this day? For they be onely ministers of the outward signe, and Christ is the author of the inward grace: as the same olde writers themselves do euerwhere teach, & specially Augustine, whose principlall stay against the Donatistes is this, that what a one founuer he be that baptisteth, yet onely Christ is ruler of it.

9 These things which we have spoken both of mortification & of wasshe, are shadowed out in the people of Israel, whome for the same cause the Apostle faith to have beene baptised in the cloud and in the sea. Mortification was figured, when the Lord deliuering them out of the hande of Pharao and from cruell bondage, made for them a way through the red sea, and drowned Phraao himselfe, and the Aegyptians their enemies, that followed them harde at their backes, and were euene in their necks to overtake them.
For after the same maner also he promiseth to vs in baptism, and by a signe giuen heleweth vs, that we are by his power brough forth and deliuered out of the thralldome of Aegypt, that is to say out of the bondage of sinne: that our Phraao is drowned, that is to say the diuel, although euene to alfo hee easeth not to exercisē & weares vs. But as that Aegyptian was not throwē downe into the bottome of the sea, but being ouerthrown on the shore, did yet with terrible fight make the Israelites afraid, but could not hurt them: so this our enemie yet in deede threatneth, theelweth his weapons, is felt, but cannot overcome. In the cloud was a signe of cleansing, for the the Lord covered
covered them with a cloude cast over them, and gave them refreshing cold, least they should faint and pine away with too cruel burning of the sunne: so in baptism we acknowledge our selves covered and defended with the blood of Christ, least the seueritie of God, which is in deede an intollerable flame, should lie vpon vs. But although this mysterie was then darke & knowen to fewe; yet because there is none other way to obtaine salvation, but in those two graces, God would not take away the signe of them both from the old fathers, whome he had adopted to be heiris.

10 Nowe it is cleere, how fals that is which some haue lately taung, & wherein some yet continue, that by baptism we bee loosed and deliuered from original sinne, and from the corruption which was from Adam spread abroad into his whole posteritie, and that we bee restored into the same righteousnes and purenes of nature, which Adam should have obtained, if he had stood fast in the same vrittynesse where in he was first created. For such kinde of teachers never understood what was original sinne, nor what was original righteousnesse, nor what was the grace of baptism. But wee haue alreadie proved, that original sinne is the peruersenesse and corruption of our nature, which first maketh vs gilrie of the wrath of God, and then also bringeth forth workes in vs, which the Scripture calleth the workes of the flesh. Therefore these two points are severally to be marked, namely that we being in all partes of our nature defiled and corrupted are alreadie for such corruption only, holden worthily condemned & conscienciously before God, to whom nothing is acceptable but righteousnes, innocencie and cleannesse. Yea, & verie infants themselves bring their owne damnation with them for their mothers wombe. Who although they haue not yet brought forth the fruite of their iniquitie, yet haue the seede thereof inclosed within them. Yea, their whole nature is certaine seede of sinne, therefore it cannot but be hateful and abominable to God. The faithfull are certified by baptism that this damnation is taken away, and drownen from them: forasmuch (as we haue alreadie saide) the Lord doth by this signe promise vs that full and perfect forgiveness is granted both of the fault which should have been imputed to vs, & of the paine which we should have suffered for the fault: they take hold also of righteousnesse, but such as the people of God may obtaine in this life, that is to say by imputation only: because the Lord of his owne mercie taketh them for righteous and innocent.

11 The other point is, that this peruersenesse never ceaseth in vs, but continually bringeth forth new fruite, namely those workes of the flesh which we haue before described: none otherwise than a burning fornace continually bloweth out flame & sparcles, or as a spring infinitely casteth out water. For lust neuer vterly dieth & is quenched in men, vntill being by death delivered out of the bodie of death, they haue vterly put off themselues. Baptisme in deede promiseth you our Pharaois drowned, & the mortification of sin: yet not so yt it is no more, or may no more trouble vs, but only that it may not overcome vs. For so long as we live enclosed within this prifon of our body, the remnants of sinne shall dwell in vs: but if we holde fast by faith the promise giuen vs of God in baptism, they shall not beare rule nor regnie. But let no man deceiue himselfe: Let no man flatter himselfe in his owne

owne evil, when he heareth that sinne alway dwelleth in vs. These things are not spoken to this end, that they should carelessly sleepe upon their sins; which are otherwise too much inclined to sinne: but onely, that they should not faint & be discouraged, which are tickled and pricked of their flesh. Let them rather think that they are yet in the way, and let them beleue ye they have much profited, when they see that there is daily somewhat minified of their lust, & they have attained thisther whither they travaile, namely to ye last death of their fleshe, which shall be ended in the dying of this mortal life. In the mean time let them not cease both to strive valiantly, and to encourage them to go forward, and to stirre them vp to full victory. For this also ought more to whet on their endeavours, that they fee ye after that they have long travailed, they have yet no small businesse remaining. This we ought to hold: we are baptised into the mortifying of our flesh, which is begun by baptism into vs, which we daily follow: but it shalbe made perfect when wee shall remove out of this life to the Lord.

12. Here we say no other thing, than the Apostle Paul in the seuenth Chapter to the Romans most clearly setteth out. For after that he had disputed of free righteousness, because some wicked men did thereof gather, that we might live after our owne lust; because we should not be acceptable to God by the deservers of works: he addeth, that al they that are clothed with the righteousness of Christ, are therewith regenerate in Spirit, & that of this regeneration wee have an earnest in baptism. Hereupon he exhorteth the faithful, that they suffer not sinne to haue dominion in their members. Now because he knewe that there is alway some weakenesse in the faithfull: that they should not therefore be discouraged, he adioyneth a comfort, that they are not vnder the lawe. Because againe it might seeme, that Christians might grow infidel, because they are not vnder the yoke of the lawe, he entreath what manner of abrogating that is, and therewithall what is the vs of the lawe: which question he had nowe the second time differed. The summe is, that we be delivered from the rigor of the lawe, that wee should cleaue to Christ: but that the office of the lawe is, that wee being conuinced of our peruersenes should confess our owne weakenesse and misterie. Nowe forasmuch as that peruersenesse of nature doeth not so easily appeare in a prophone man, which followeth his owne lustes without feare of God: he setteth an example in a man regenerate, namely in himselfe. Hee faith therefore that he hath a continuall wretshing with the remnants of his flesh, and that he is halden bounde with miserable bondage, that he cannot confecrate himselfe wholly to the obedience of the law of God. Therefore he is compelled with groaning to crie out. Unhappy am I. Who shall deliver me out of this body subiecte to death? If the children of God be helden captiue in prison so long as they live, they must needs be much carefully grieued with thinking vpon their owne peril, vnlesse this feare be met withal. Therefore he adioyneth to this vs a comfort, that there is no more damnation to them that are in Christ Iesus. Where he teacheth, that they whom the Lord hath once received into favour, engrafted into the communiof sinne, yea and carie sinne about within them, yet are acquitted from guiltines & condemnation. If this be the simple and natural exposition of Paul, there is no cause why we should seeme to teach any new vnwonted thing.

13 But Baptisme so beraeth our confession before men. For it is a marke, whereby we openly professe that we should be accounted among the people of God: whereby we testify that we agree with all christians into the worshipping of one God and into one religion: finally whereby we openly affirm our faith, that not only our hearts should breath out the praise of God, but also our tongue, and all the members of our body shou'de sounde it out with such vertue as they be able. For so as we ought, all our things are employed to the service of the glorie of God, whereof nothing ought to be void, and other may by our example be stirred vp to the same endeavours. Hereunto Paul had respect, when he asked the Corinthians whether they had not beene baptized into the name of Christ: meaning verily, that even in this that they were baptized into his name, they avowed themselves into him, swore to his name, and bound their faith to him before men, that they could no more professe any other, but Christ alone, y难得e they would forsake the profession which they had made in baptism.

14 Now with it is declared what our Lorde had regard vnto in the institution of baptism: it is plain to judge what is the way for vs to vfe and receiue it. For so farre as it is giuen to the raising, nourishing and confirming or our faith, it is to be taken as from the hande of the author him selfe: wee ought to hold it certaine and fully perswaded, that it is he which speaketh to vs by the signe, that it is he which cleanseth vs, washeth vs, & putteth away the remembrance of our sinnes, that it is he which maketh vs partakers of his death, which taketh away from Satan his kingdom, which extreeth the forces of our lust, yea which growth into one with vs, that being cloathed with him we may be reckoned the children of God: that these things, I say, he doth inwardly so truely and certainly performe to our soule, as wee naturally see our bodie outwardly to be washed, dipped, and clothed. For this either relation, or similitude, is the most sure rule of sacramentes: that in bodily things we should behold spiritual things, as if they were presently set before our eyes, forasmuch as it hath pleased the Lord to represent them by such figures: not for that such graces are bound and enclosed in the sacrament, that they should be giuen vs by the force thereof: but onely because the Lorde doth by this token testify his will vnto vs, that is, that he will giue vs all these things. Neither doth he onely seeke our eyes with a naked light, but he bringeth vs to the thing present, and together fulfilleth that which it figureth.

15 Hereof let Cornelius the captaine be an example, which was baptized, having before receiued forgiuenesse of sinnes and visible graces of the holy Ghoft: seeking not by baptism a larger forgiuenesse but a more certain exercising of faith, yea an encreas of confidence by a pledge. Peradventure some man will object: why therefore did Ananias say to Paul, that he should wash away his sinnes by baptism, if sinnes bee not washed away by the power of baptism it selfe? I answer: We are sayd to receive, to obtaine, to get that which doth as concerneth the feeling of our faith, is giuen vs then.

of the Lord, whether he doeth first to testify it, or being testified doth more and certainlie confirm it. This therefore only was the meaning of Ananias that thou maist be assured Paul, that thy sinnes are forgiven thee, be baptized. For the Lorde doth in baptism promise forgiveness of sins; receive this, and be out of care. Howbeit I meane not to diminish the force of baptism, but that the thing and the truth is present with the signe, so farre as God wrought by outwarde meanes. But of this Sacrament, as of all other, we obtaine nothing but so much as we receive by Fayth. If we want faith, it shal be for a witnessse of our unw thankfulnesse, whereby we may be declared guilty before God, because we have not beleued the promise there gien. But so far as it is a signe of our confesiion, we ought by it to testify that our aissance is in the mercy of God, and our cleanness is in the forgiveness of sinnes, which is gotten vs by Iesus Christ; and that by it we enter into the Church of Christ, that wee may with one consent of Fayth and charitie live of one minde with all the faythfull. This laste pointe did Paul meane, when he saith that we are all baptised in one Spirit, that wee may be one body.

16 Now if this be true which we determine, that a Sacrament is not to be waied according to his hande of whom it is ministred, but as of the very hand of God, from whom without doubt it proceeded: hereupon we may gather that nothing is added to it nor taken from it by the wrythynesse of him by whose hand it is delivered, and even as among men, if a letter bee sent, so that the hand & the seale bee well knowne, it maketh no matter who or what manner of man bee the carrier; so it ought to suffice to acknowledge the hande and seale of the Lorde in his Sacramentes, by what carrier soever they be brought. Hereby the errors of the Donatistes is very well confuted, which measured the force and value of the Sacrament by the worthines of the minifter. Such at this day are our Catabaptistes, which deny that we bee rightly baptised, because we were baptised by wicked men & idolaters in the popish kingdom; therefore they furiousely call upon vs to be baptised againe. Against whose follies we shalbe armed with a reason strong enough, if we think that we were professed by baptism not into the name of any man, but into the name of the Father, the Sonne, and the holye Ghost, and that therefore it is not the baptism of man, but of God, of whomsoever it be ministred. Although they were noo so much ignorant or despisers of God and all godlinessse, which baptised vs, yet they did not baptise vs into the fellowship of their owne ignorance or sacrilege, but into the fayth of Iesus Christ; because they called not upon their owne name, but the name of God, nor baptised vs into any other name. Now if it were the baptism of God, it hath verily enclosed in it a promisse of the forgiveness of sinnes, the mortifying of the flesh, the spiritual quickening, and the partaking of Christ. So it nothing hindered the Iewes, to have beeene circumcised of vs, that the signe thereof beoyde, that it needed to be done of newe: but it was sufficient to returne to the naturall beginning. Where they objected that baptism ought to bee celebrated in the assemblies of the godly, that prooveneth not, that that which is faulty in part, should destroy the whole force thereof. For when we teache what what ought to be done that baptism may be pure, and void of all defiling, we do not abolish the ordinance of God, although idolaters corrupt it. For when in old time Circumcision was corrupted with many superstitions yet it ceased not to be taken for a sign of grace; neither did Josias and Exehias, when they gathered out of all Israel them that had departed from God, call them to a second Circumcision.

Now whereas they ask us what faith of ours hath yet followed baptism in certain years past, that they might thereby prove that the baptism is void, when it is not sanctified unto vs, but by the words of promise received by faith: to this question we answer that we in deed being blinde and unbleeding, did in a long time not holde fast the promise given vs in baptism, yet the promise is felle, for as much as it was of God, continued alway stayed, fixed, fast, and true. Although all men believers and faith breakers, yet God ceaseth not to be true, although all men be left yet Christ remaineth salvation. We confesse therefore that Baptisme, for that time profited vs nothing at all, as much as in it promise offered vs, without which baptism is nothing, lay nothing regarded. Now we see by the grace of God, we have begun to waxe wiser; we accuse our owne blindness and hardness of heart, which have so long beene vnthankfull to his so great goodness. But we believe that the promise is felle, is not vanished away, but rather we consider God by baptism promised the forgiveness of sins, and faith hee hath promised it, will undoubtedly performe it to all that believe it. That promise was offered vs in baptism: by faith therefore let vs embrace it. It hath in deed long beene buried from vs because of inseldie: nowe therefore let vs receive it by faith. Wherefore where the Lord calleth the Jewish people to repentance, hee giveth them no commandement of a second Circumcision, which being (as we have said) circumsiced with a wicked and vngodly hande, liued a certaine time intangled with the same wickednesse. But he earnestly calleth upon the onely turning of the heart. Because, howe soever the covenant was broken of them, yet the signe of the covenant, by the ordinance of the Lord, remained alway fast and inviolable. Therefore with the onely condition of repentance they were restored into the covenant which the Lord had once made with them in circumcision: which yet being received by the hand of a league breaker priest, so much as in them lay, they had despised againe, and the effect whereof they had quenched.

But they thinke that they shake a sory dart at vs, when they alleadge that Paul rebaptised them which were once baptised with the baptisme of John. For if by our owne confession, the baptisme of John was altogether the same that ours is nowe: even as they having beeene before percuriously instructed, when they were taught the true faith, they were againe baptised into it, so that baptism, which was without true Doctrine, is to be taken for nothing, and we ought to be newly baptised againe into true religion, wherewith we are nowe first instructed. Some thinke, that there was some wrongfully affected man to John, which had entred them with their first baptism rather to a vaine superstittion, Of which thing they seeme to gather a conjecture hereupon, because they confesed themselves to bee vntely igno ignorant of the Holy Ghost: whereas John verily woulde never haue sent away from himself scholars so vaunted, but neither is it likely that the Iewes although they had not bene baptised at all, were destitute of all knowledge of the holy Ghost, which is famously spoken off by so many testimonies of the scripture. Whereafter therefore they answere that they knewe not whether there bee a hony Ghost, it is to bee understood as if they had said that they haue not yet heard, whether the graces of the Spirit, of which Paul alked them, were giuen to the Disciples of Chrift. But I graunt that that was the true baptisme of John, and all one and the selfe same with the baptisme of Chriſte: but I denye that they were baptised againe. What then meane these wordes, they were baptised in the name of Iesus? Some doe expounde it, that they were but instructed of Paul with true doctrine. But I had rather understande it more simply, to bee the baptisme of the holy Ghost, that is to say, that the visible graces of the Spirt were giuen them by the laying on of handes; which to bee expressed by the name of baptisme, is no newe thing. As on the day of Pentecost, it is saide, that the Apoftles remembred the worde of the Lorde, concerning the baptisme of fire and of the Spirt. And Peter faith that the same came to his remembrance, when hee lawe those graces powred vp vpon Cornelius, and his householde and kinred. Neither is that contrarie which is after adioyned, When he had laide his handes on them, the Holy Ghost came downe vpon them. For Luke doeth not tell of two diverse things: but followeth the manner of telling commonly vſed among the Hebrewes, which do first propound the summe of the matter, and then doe set it out more at large. Which every man may perceiue by the very framinge together of the wordes. For hee faith, When they had hearde these thinges, they were baptiz'd in the name of Iesus. And when Paul had laide his handes vpon them, the holy Ghost came downe vpon them. In this latter sentence is describ'd, what manner of baptisme that was: If ignorance doe so corrup a former Baptisme, that it must bee amended with a second baptisme: the Apoftles shoulde haue bene rebaptised first of all, which in whole three yeares after their baptisme, had scarcely taſted anie small parcel of purer doctrine. And now among vs what riuers might suffice to renewe so many washinges, as there be ignorances by the mercie of the Lord daily amended in vs?

19 The force, dignitie, profit, and end of the mysterie if I be not decepted, sought by this time to bee plaine enough. So much as concerneth the outwarde signe, I would to God the natural institution of Chrift had prevaile d so much as was meete, to restrain the boldnes of men. For, as though it were a contemptible thing to be baptised with water according to the precepte of Chrift, there is inuented blessing; or rather inchanting, to defile the true halowing of water. Afterward was added a tapers with chrisme: but the blowing semeth to open the gate to baptisme. But although I am not ignorant, howe auncient is the beginning of this added packe: yet it is lawfull both for me and all the godly to refuse whatsoever things men haue presumed to adde to the ordinance of Chrift. When Satan saw that by the foolish light credite of the worlde at the verie beginnings of the Gospel his deceits were easilie receiued, he brake forth into groffer mockeries. Hereupon spire,
To Salvation. Lib. 4.

This also pertaineth to the purpose, to knowe that it is done amisse if private men take upon them selves the administration of baptism, for as well the distribution of this as of the supper is a part of the ecclesiastical minis terie. For Christ did not commannde women, nor yet euery sort of men, that they should baptize: but whom he had ordained his Apostles, to them he gave this commandement. And when he commanded his discipyles to do that in the ministration of the Supper which they had seen him do, when he executed the office of a right distributer: he would without doubt, that they should therein follow his example. As for this that in many ages past, yea, and in a manner at the verie beginning of the Church, it hath beene receiued in vs, ye lay men might baptise in peril of death, if the minister were not present in time. I see not with howe strong a reason it may be defended. The very old fathers themselves, which either helde or suffered this maner, were not sure whether it were wel done. For Augustine seemeth to haue this doubt, when he saith: Although a lay man compelled by necessitie doe give baptism, I can not tell whether a man may godly saie that it ought to bee iterate. For if it be done when no necessitie compelleth, it is the vlurping of another mans office: but if necessitie enforceth, it is either none or a venial sinne. Moreover of women it was decreed without any exception in the Councell at Carthage, that they should not presume to baptize at all. But there is danger, least if she which is sicke should die without baptism, she should bee deprived of the grace of regeneration. Not so, God pronounceth that shee adopteth our infants to bee his owne, before they bee borne, when she promiseth that shee will be a God to vs and to our seed after vs. In this worde is containe their saluation. Neither shall anie man dare to bee so reprochfull against God, to deny that his promise is of it selfe sufficient to worke the effect thereof. Howe much harme that doctrine being
Cap. 15. Of the outwærde meanes being euil expounded, y baptism is of necessitie to salvation, hath brought in, fewe doe marke: and therefore they take lefse heed to themselves. For where this opinion is grown in force, that all are left to whom it hath not happened to be wathe with water, our state is worse that the state of y old people, as though the grace of God were now more narrowly strengthened than it was under the lawe. For Christ shall be thought to bee come, not to fulfill the promis, but to abolishe them: forasmuch as the promiss which then was of it selfe effectuall enough to give health before the eight daye, now should not be of force without helpe of the signe.

21 But howe the custome was before that Augusctine was borne, first is gathered of Tertullian, that it is not permitted to a woman to speake in the Church, nor to teach, nor to baptize, nor to offer, that she shoulde not claime to her selfe the executio of any mans office, much lesse of the priests. Of the same thing Epiphanius is a substantial witness, where he reprocheth Marcellus, that he gaue women libertie to baptize. Neither am I ignoraunt of their anfwere which thinke otherwise, that is, that commonlie much differeth from extraordinarie remedie, when extreme necessitie inforceth: but when he pronouncing that it is a mockerie to give women libertie to baptize, excepteth nothing, it sufficiently appeareth that he cœdemneth this corruption, so that it is by no color excusable. Also in the third booke, where teaching that it was not permitted euern to the holy mother of Christ, he adhereth no restraine.

22 The example of Sephora is unreasonable alledge, For whereas the Angell of God was appeased, after that she taking a stone, circumcised her sonne, thereupon it is wrongfully gathered that her doing was allowed of God. Otherwise it ought to bee faide, that the worshipping which the nations that were brought out of Affrria raiet vp, please God. But by other strong reasons it is provest, that that which a foolish woman did, is wrongfullie drawn to an example of imitation. If I should say that it is a certaine singular case, which ought not to be made an example, & specially y thinke it is no where red that in old time there was given to the priests a special commandement to circumcise, the order of circumcision and Baptisme is vnlike: this should bee strong enough to confute them. For the wordes of Christ are plaine: Go ye, teach all nations, and baptize. When he orndred the selfe same men publishers of the Gospel, and ministres of Baptisme: and none (as the Apostle witnesseth) doeth take honour vpon himselfe in the Church, but he that is called as Aarons: whoeuer without lawful calling baptizeth, he rufseth into another mans office. Even in the smallesst things, as in meate and drinke, whatsoever we enterprize with a doubtfull confience, Paul openly crieth out to bee sinne. Therefore in womens baptizing is much more grievous sinne, where it is evident that they brake the rule appointed by Christe, forasmuch as wee knowe that it is vnlawfull to plucke in vnder those things that God coniogneth. But al this I passe ouer. Onely I would have the readers to note, that Sephoraes purpose was nothing lefse, than to doe any seruice to God. Seing her sonne to bee in danger, she grudged, and murmured, and not without gracke threw the foreskinne vpon the ground, she taunted her husbande, & she was also angrie.
gry with God. Finally it is plain that all this came of a furiousnesse of mind; because the murmured against God and her husband, for that she was compelled to shed the blood of her sonne. Moreover if she had in all other things behaved herself well, yet herein is an unexcusable rash presumption, she circumcised her sonne, her husband being present, not any private man, but Moses, the principal prophet of God, than whom there never roke any greater in Israel; which was no more lawful for her to doe, than at this day it is for women in the sight of the bishoppe. But this controversy shall by and by be easely taken away by this principle, that infants are not debarred from the kingdom of heavens, who it happeneth to depart out of this present life before that it be granted them to be dipped in water. But it is already proved that no small wrong is done to the covenant of God, if we do not rest in it, as though it were weake of it selfe: where as the effect thereof hangeth neither vpon baptism, nor vpon any additions. There is afterward added to it a Sacrament like a seal, not that it bringeth effectualnes to the promise of God as to a thing weake of it selfe, but onely confirmeth it to vs. Whereupon foloweth, that the children of the faithfull are not therefore baptized, that they may then first be made the children of God, which before were strangers from the Church, but rather that they be therefore received by a solemn signe into the Church, because by the benefit of the promisse they did already belong to the body of Christ. Therefore if in omitting the signe there be neither louthfulness, nor contempt, nor negligence, we are free from all danger. It is therefore much more holi, to giue this reverence to the ordinance of God, that we feke sacramentes from no where else, than where the Lord hath left them. When we may not have them of the Church, the grace of God is not so bound to them, but that we may obtain them by faith out of the word of the Lord.

The xvi. Chapter.

That the Baptisme of infants dowe very well agree with the institution of Christ and the nature of the sign.

But as much as in this age, certaine phrentike Spirites have raised vp fore troubles in the Church for the Baptisme of infantes, and do not yet cease to turmoile: I cannot choose but I must in some here an addition to re-straine their furiousnesse. If prudence it shall seeme to some man to be very much too long, let him (I beseech him) weigh with himself, that we ought so much to esteeme the purenesse of doctrine in a most great matter, together with the peace of the Church, that nothing ought to be lothomely receiued, which may auaine to procure them both. Beside, that I so studie to frame this discourse, that it shalbe of no small importance to the clearer declaration of the mysterie of Baptisme. They affyle the baptism of infants with an argument indeede favourable in shew, saying that it is grounded vp on no institution of Christ, but that it was brought in only by the boldenes of men, and ofuerie curiousnesse, & then afterward with fond and rashly receiued in vs. For a Sacrament, vnslee it rests vpon a certaine foundation of the word of God, hangeth but by a shrede. But what if, when the matter is well considered, it shall appeare that the Lords holy ordinance is falsely and vniustly charged with such a slander: Let vs therefore search out the first beginning of it. And if it shall appeare, that it was devised by the onlie rafineffe of men, then bidding it farewell, let vs measure the true observation of baptism by the onely will of God. But if it shalbe proved that it is not destitute of his certaine authoritie, we must beware, least in pinchinge the holy ordinances of God, we be also slanderous against the author himself.

2. First it is a doctrine well enough known, and confessed among all the godly, that the right consideration of the signes, consisteth not onlie in the outward Ceremonies: but principally hangeth vpon the promise, and vpon the spirituall mysteries, for figuring whereof the Lord ordaineth the Ceremonies themselves. Therefore hee that will perfectly learne of what value baptism is, to what ende it tendeth, finally what it is: let him not stay his thought vpon the element and bodily sight, but rather let him raise it vp to the promises of God, which are therein offered vs, and to the inward secrets which are therein represented vnto vs. He that knoweth these things, hath attained the found trueth of baptism, and the whole substance thereof as I may so call it: and thereby also he shall be taught, what is the reason, & what is the use of the outward sprinkling. Againie hee that contemptuously passing over these, shall have his minde wholly fastened and bound to the visible Ceremonie, shall understand neither the force nor propriety of baptism: nor yet so much as this, what the water meaneth, or what vs it hath. Which sentence is proved with so many & so cleere testimonies of scripture, that we neede not at this present to tarteie long about it. Therefore it remaineth nowe, that we secke out of the promises given in baptism, what is the force and nature of it. The scripture sheweth, that the cleansing of sinnes which we obtaine of the bloud of Christ, is here first shewed: then the mortifying of the flesh, which standeth vpone the partaking of his death, by which the faithful are regenerate into a newnesse of life, yea and into the fellowship of Christ. To this summe may be referred whatsoever is taught in the Scriptures concerning baptism; sauing that beside this it is a signe to testify religion before men.

3. But forasmuch as before the institution of baptism, the people of God had circumcision in stead thereof, let vs see what these two signes differ the one from the other, and with what likeness they agree together. Whereupon may appeare what is the relation of the one to the other. Where the Lorde gave circumcision to Abraham to be kept, he calleth him before, that he would be God to him and to his seed, adding, that with him is the flowing store and sufficiance of all things, that Abraham shoulde account that his hand should be to him a spring of all good things, in which words the promise of eternal life is conteined, as Christ expoundeth it, bringing an argument from hence to prove the immortalitie of the faithful, and the resurrection. For God (faith he) is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Wherefore Paul shewing to the Ephefians from what destruction the Lorde had delivered them, gathereth by this that they had not beene admitted into the covenante of circumcision, that they were without Christ, To Salutation.

without God, without hope, strangers from the covenants of the promise: all which things the covenants itself contain. But the first access to God, the first entrée to immortal life, is the forgiveness of sins. Whereupon is gathered, that this forgiveness answereth to the promise of baptism concerning our cleansing. Afterward the Lord taketh covenant of Abraham that he should walk before him in pureness & innocency of heart which belongeth to mortifying or regeneration. And that no man should doubt, that circumcision is a signe of mortifying. Moses in another place both more plainly declare it, where he exhorteth the people of Israel, to circumcise the uncircumcised skin of the heart, because they were feuerally chosen to be the people of God out of all the nations of the earth. As God, where he adopteth the posterity of Abraham to his people, commanded them to be circumcised: so Moses pronounceth that the hearts ought to be circumcised, declaring verily what is the truth of this circumcision. Then that no man should endeavour toward it by his owne strength, he teacheth that they neede the grace of God. All these things are so often repeated of the prophets, that I neede not to heape into this place many testimonies which do each where offer themselves. We haue proued therefore, that in circumcision a spiritual promise was vstered to the fathers, such as in baptism is given for as much as it figured to them the forgiveness of sins, & the mortifying of the flesh. Moreover as we haue taught that Christ is the foundation of baptism, in whose both these things remaine: so it is evident that he is also of circumcision. For he is promised to Abraham, and in him the blessing of all nations. To the sealing of which grace, the signe of circumcision is added.

4. Now we may easily see what there is like in these two signes, or what there is differing. The promises, whereupon wee haue declared that the power of the signes consisteth, is alone in both, namely of the fatherly favor of God, of the forgiveness of sins, of life everlasting. Then, the thing figured also is all one and the same, namely regeneration. The foundation whereupon the fulfilling of these things standeth, is alone in both. Wherefore there is no difference in the inward mysterie, whereby the whole force and propriety of the Sacramentes is to be weighed. The unlikenes that remaineth, lieth in the outwarde Ceremonie, which is the smallest portion: whereas the chiefest part hangeth upon the promise and the thing signified. Therefore we may determine, that whatsoever agree with circumcision, doeth also belong to baptism, except the difference of the visible Ceremonie. To this relation and comparison, the Apostles rule leadeth vs by the hande, whereby we are commanded to examine all exposition of Scripture by the proportion of faith. And truly the truth doth in this halfe almost offer it selfe to be felt. For as circumcision, because it was a certaine token to the Jewes, whereby they were certified that they were chosen to bee the people and householde of God and they againe on their behalfe professed that they yielded themselves to God was their first entrie into the Church: so nowe also wee by baptism enter into profession of God, that wee maie bee reckoned among his people, and mutually sweare to his name. Whereby it appeareth out of controversie, that baptism is come into the place of circumcision, that it maye, have the same office with vs.

Nowe if we lift to search out, whether baptism be lawfully communicat to infantes: shall we not say that hee doth too much play the foole, yea dote, which will rest onely upon the element of water, and the outwarde obseruation, but cannot abide to bend his minde to the spirituall mysterye: Whereof if there be any consideration had, it shall without doubt certainly appeare that Baptisme is rightfulliy given to infantes, as the thing that is due vn to them. For the Lorde in olde time did not vouchsafe to adimit them to circumcision, but he made them parakers of all those things which were then signified by circumcision. Otherwize he should with meeete decettes have mocked his people, if he had fed them with deceitfull signes, which is horrible euuen to be heard of. For he pronounceth expresly, that the circumcision of a little infant should be instead of a seal to seal the promis of the covenante. But if the covenante remaine vnbroken and stedfast, it doit at this day no leffe belong to the children of Christians, than under the olde testament, it pertained to the infantes of the lewes. But if they bee parakers of the thing signified, why shal they be debarred from the signe? is it that they haue the truthe, why shal they be put backe from the figure? Althought the outwarde signe cleave fall together with the worde in the Sacrament, so that they can not be plucked in sundry: yet if they be severallly considered, whether of them, I pray you, shall we esteeme of more values? Truly if we see that the signe signifieth the worde, we must saie that it is vnder it, and must set it in the inferiour place. Sith therefore the worde of Baptisme is extended to infantes: why shal the signe, that is to say, the addition hanging to the worde, be debarred from them? This one reason, if there were no moe, were abundantly enough to confute all them that will speake to the contrary. That which is objected, that there was a day currencly set for circumcision, is altogether but a shift. We graunt that wee be not nowe bounde to ceraine dayes, like the lewes but when the Lorde howsoever hee certenly appointeth no day, yet declareth that hee is pleased that infantes should with a solemn forme vnderinge bee receivned into his covenante: whateuer we seek?
with an outward Sacrament: what cause will Christians alledge, why they should not at this date testify and scale the same in their children? Neither let any man object against me, that the Lord commanded his covenant to be confirmed with no other signe than of circumcision, which is long agoe taken away. For wee have in readinesse to answere, that for the time of the olde testament he ordeyned circumcision to confirm his covenant: but circumcision being taken away, yet alway remaineth the same manner of confirmyng which we have common with the Iewes. Wherefore wee must alway diligently consider what is common to both, & what they have severall from vs. The covenants is common, the cause of confirming it is common. Onely the manner of confirming is divers, because circumcision was that to them, in place whereof baptism hath succeeded among vs. Otherwise if the testimonie whereby the Iewes were assured of the salvation of their seed, be taken away from vs, it should be brought to passe by the coming of Christ, that the grace of God should be darker and lesse approyved by testimonies to vs, than it was before to the Iewes. If that cannot be faide without extreme slander of Christ, by whom the infinite goodness of the Father hath more clearely and liberally than euer heretofore beene pour'd forth vpon the earth, and declared to men: we must needs graunt, that it is at the leaft not more pinchingely to bee suppressed, nor to be set forth with lesse testimonie, than it was under the daie shadowes of the lawe.

7 Wherefore the Lord Jesus, minding to shewe a token whereby the world might understand that hee was come rather to enlarge than to limit the merie of God, gently embraced children offered vnto him, rebuking the disciples which went about to forbid them to come to him: forasmuch as they did leade those, to whom the kingdom of heaven belongeth, away from him by whom alone the gate of heaven. But (will some man say) what like thing hath baptism with this embracing of Christ? For neither is it reported that he baptised them, but that he receiued them, embraced them, and wished them well. Therefore if we list to follow his example, let vs help infants with prayer, but not baptise them. But let vs weigh the doings of Christ somewhat more heedfully, than such kind of men doe. For neither is this to be lightly passed over, that Christ commandeth infants to be brought vnto him, adding a reason why, because of such is the kingdom of heaven. And afterward he witnesseth his will with deede, when embracynge them he commendeth them to his Father with his prayer and blessing. If it be meete that infants be brought to Christ, why is it not also meete that they be received to baptism, the signe of our communion and fellowship with Christ? If the kingdom of heaven be theirs, why shall the signe be denied them, whereby there is not one entrie opened into the Church, that being admetted in it they may be adnumbered among the heires of the heavenly kingdom? How vnifiit shall we be, if we drive away them whom Christ calleth vnto him? If we spoyle them, whom hee garnisheth with his gifts? If we shut out them whom he willingly receiue? But if wee will examine how much that which Christ there did, differeth from baptism, yet of how much greater price shall we have baptism, whereby we testament that infants are contained in the covenant of God, than receiving, embracing, laying on of hands, and prayer, whereby Christ himself being present: declareth that they both are his, and are sanctified of him: By the other caulations, whereby they labour to mock out this place, they do nothing but betray their owne ignorance. For they gather an argument of this which Christ faith. Let little ones come to me, that they were in age good bigge ones which were already able to goe. But they are called of the Evangelists, brephe, and paidia, by which words the Greece doe signify babbies yet hanging on the breast. Therefore this word (to come) is simply for (to have access.) Lo! what shares they are compelled to make, which are grown hord against the truth. Now where they say, that the kingdom of heaven is not gien to them, but to such as bee like them, because it is said to be of such, not of them: that is no sounder than the rest. For if that be graunted, what manner of reason shall the reason of Christ be, whereby he meant he to them, that infants in age are not strangers from him? When he commanded that infants be suffered to have access unto him, nothing is plainer than that verie infantie indeede is there spoken of. And that this shoule not seeme an absurditie, he by and by addeth: of such is the kingdom of heaven. But if it must needs be that infants be comprehended herein, it must be plain that by this word (such) are meant verie infants themselves, and such as be like them.

8 Nowe there is no man that seeth not, that baptism of infants was not framed by man, which is upholden by so great approouing of Scripture. Neither doe they colourably enough play the fools, which object that it is no where founde, that any one infant was baptised by the hands of the Apostles. For although it bee not expressly by name rehearsed of the Evangelists: yet because againe they are not excluded, so oft as mention happeneth to be made of the baptizing of any householder: who, vnlesse hee be made, can reaon thereupon that they were not baptised? If such argumentes were of anie force, women should be forbidden to partake of the Lords supper, whom wee reade not to have beene receiued into it in the time of the Apostles. But heere we bee content with the rule of faith. For when weee consider, what the institution of the Supper requireth, thereby also wee maie easily judge to whom the vs thereof ought to bee communicated. Which we observe also in baptism. For when we marke, to what end it was ordained, we evidently doe, that it belongeth no lesse to infants than to elder folkes. Therefore they cannot be depruis of it, but that the will of the author must be manifestly defrauded. But whereas, they spred abroad among the simple people, that there passed a long row of yeares after the resurrection of Christ, in which the baptism of infants was vnknown: therin they most fouly doe lie. For there is no writer so old, that doth not certainly referre the beginning thereof to the time of the Apostles.

9 Nowe remaineth that we briefly shewe, what fruite commeth of this observation, both to the faithfull which present their children to the Church to be baptised, and also to the infants themselves that bee baptised with the holy water: that no man shoulde despise it as vnprofitable or idle. But if it come in any mans minde, vpon this pretence to mocke at the baptism.
baptism of infants, he scorneth the commandement of Circumcision given by the Lorde. For what will they bring forth to impugne the baptism of infants, which may not also be thrown backe against Circumcision? So the Lorde taketh vengeance of their arrogance, which doe by and by condemn that which they comprehend not with the sense of their owne flesh. But God furniseth vs with other armures, whereby their foolishnesse may be beaten flatte. For neither this his holy institution, by which wee seel our faith to be holpen with singular comforte, deferueth to be called superfluous. For Gods signe communicated to a childe doeth as it were by an emprinted feale confirm the promife given to the godly parente, and declareth that it is ratified that the Lord wil be GOD not onely to him but also to his seede, and will continually thewe his good will and grace, not to him only, but also to his posteritie euen to the thousandth generation. Where when the great kindnesse of GOD uttereth it selfe, first it yeeldeth most large matter to aduance his glorie, and overspreadeth godly heartes with singular gladnesse, because they are therewithall more earnestly moved to loue againe so godly a Father, whom they see to haue care of their posteritie for their sakes. Neither doe I regarde, if any man take exception, and saye that the promife ought to suffice to confirm the salvation of our children: forasmuch as it hath pleased God otherwise, who as hee knoweth our weakenesse, willed in this behalfe so much to beare tenderly with it. Therefore let them that embrace the promife of Gods mercy to be extended to their children, thinke that it is their dutie to offer them to the Church to be sign'd with the signe of mercie, and thereby to encourage themselves to a more assured confidence, because they do with present eye behold the covenant of the Lord grauen in the bodies of their children. Againe, the children receiue some commodity of their baptism, that being engraffed into the body of the Church, they be somewhat the more comended to the other members. Then when they are growen to riper age, they be thereby not slenderly stirr'd vp to earnest endeavour to worshippe God, of whom they have ben receiued into his children by a solemn signe of adoption, before that they could by age acknowledge him for their Father. Finally that same condemnation ought greatly to make vs afraid, that GOD will take vengeance of it, if any man despighte to marke his sonne with the signe of the covenant, because by such contempt the grace offred is refused and as it were foresworne.

10 Now let vs examine the argumentes, whereby certaine furious beasts do not ceaue to affaile this holy institution of God. First because they see that they be exceedinglie necesse driven and hard straine with the likenesse of baptism and Circumcision, they labour to plucke in fonder these two signes with great difference, that the one should not seeme to haue any thing common with the other. For they saye that both diuerse things are signified, and that the covenant is altogether diuerse, and that the naming of the children is not all one. But while they goe about to proue that firste point, they allege that Circumcision was a figure of mortification and not of baptism. Which verily we do most willingly grant them. For it maketh verie well for our side. Neither doe we see any other profe of our sentence, than that.
that baptism and circumcision are signs of mortification. Hereupon we determine that baptism is set in the place of circumcision, that it should represent the same thing which in old time it signified to the Jews, in affirming the difference of the covenant, with howe barbarous boldness doe they turbinate & corrupt the scripture: & that not in one place alone, but so as they leave nothing safe or whole? For they depute baptism vs the Jews so to be carnally they be like beasts than men with whom forsooth the covenant made proceeded not beyond the temporal life, to whom the promises giue do rest in present & bodily good things. If this doctrine take place, what remaineth but that the nation of the Jews were for a time filled with the benefits of GOD, none otherwise than as they fatter a heare of swine in a stable, that at length they should perish with eternal damnation. For so one as we allege Circumcision and the promises annexed unto it, they aunswere that circumcision was a literal signe, and the promises thereof were carnall.

Promises Spiritual and heavenly, not earthly and carnall only made to the fathers in the olde testament.

Colot 2.11

Truly if circumcision was a literal signe, there is no otherwise to bee thought of baptism. For the Apostle in the seconde Chapter to the Colossians maketh the one no more spiritual than the other. For he sayeth that we are circumcised in Christ, with a circumcision not made with hand, putting away the body of sinne that dwelld in our flesh: which he calleth the circumcision of Christ. Afterwarde for declaration of that saying, he adiuncteth that we be buried with Christ by baptism. What meaneth he by these words, but that the fulfilling and truth of baptism, is also the truth & fulfilling of circumcision, because they signifie both one thing. For he tranuadeth to new Baptisme is the same to Christians, which circumcision had beene before to the Jews. But forasmuch as we haue nowe evidently declared that the promises of both the signes, and the mysteries that are presented in them, doe agree together, we wil for this present tarrie no longer among them. Only I will put the faithful in minde, that though I holde my peace, they should weigh with themselves whether it bee taken for an earthly and literal signe, under which nothing is contained but spiritual and heavenly. But that they should not sell their souls to the simple, we wil by the way confute one objection wherwith they colour this most damnable lie. It is most certaine that the principal promises, wherein was contained the covenant which in the Olde testament GOD ratified with the Israelites, were spiritual, and tended to eternal life: and then againe, that they were received of the father, spiritually, as it was said, that they might thereof receive assurance of the life to come, whereas to they longed with the whole affection of their heart: But in the mean time wee done over, but that hee witnessed his good will towards them with carnall and carnall benefits: by which also wee say that the same promise of spiritual things was confirmed. As when he promised everlasting blessednesse to his eruenest Abraham, that he might se before his eyes a manifest token of his favrour, he addeth another promise concerning the possession of the lande of Chanaan. After this manner we ought to understand all the earthly promises that are given to the Jewish nation, that the spiritual promises, as the head, wherunto they are directed, should alway have the chiefe place.
place. But if I have more largely entreated of these things in the difference of the new and old testament, therefore now I doe the more slightly knit it vp.

12. In the naming of the children they finde this diercctie, that in the old testament they were called the children of Abraham, which signified his seed; but that now they are called by that name, which follow his faith; and that therefore that carnal infantie, which was by circumcision granted into the fellowship of the covenant, figured the infants of the New testament, which are regenerat by the word of God to immortal life, in which words we beholde in deed a small sparkle of truth, but herein in the light of the spiritSi grievously offend, that when they cast hold of that which faith deposeth to their hand, when they should go further and compare many things together, they stand still upon one word, whereby it cannot otherwise be but that they must sometime be deceived which rest upon the sound knowledge of nothing. We grant in deed that the carnall fedee of Abraham did for a time hold the place of the spiritual fedee which is by faith granted to him. For we be called his children howsoever there is no natural kinred betweene him and vs. But if they mean, as they plainly shewe that they do, there was never spiritual blessing promised to the carnall seed of Abraham, herein they are much deceived. Wherefore we must leue to a better mark, whereunto we are directed by the most certaine guidence of the Scripture. The Lord therefore promised to Abraham, that he should have a seed, where in all nations of the earth shall be blessed and therewithal was it bin, that he would be a God to him and his seed. Wherefore doth the author of the blessing, are heirs of this promise, and therefore are called the children of Abraham.

13. But although since the resurrection of Christ the bounds of the kingdom of God have begun to be far and wide enlaide into all nations without difference, that according to the saying of Christ, faithfull ones should be gathered from every part to sit downe in the heavenly glory, with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet had many ages before extended that same great mercy to the Lewes. And because passing over all other, he had chosen out that one nation, in which he would confine his grace for a time, called them his peculiar possession, and his purchased people. For testifying of such liberality, Circumcision was given by the signe whereof the Lewes might be taught God is to them the author of salvation, by which knowledge their minds were raised to a hope of eternal life. For what shall he want, whom God hath once received into his charge? Wherefore the Apostle meaning to prope that the Gentiles were the children of Abraham, as well as the Lewes, speaketh in this manner: Abraham (faith he) was justified by faith in uncircumcision. Afterward he receiveth the signe of Circumcision, the seal of righteousness of faith, that he should be the father of all the faithfull both of his circumcision and of circumcision, nor of them that were of only Circumcision, but of them that follow the faith which our father Abraham had in uncircumcision. Do not we see that both sorts are made equal in dignitas? For during the time appointed by the decree of god, he was the father of Circumcision. When the wall being pluckt downe (as the Apostle writeth in another place by which the Iewes were severed from the Gentiles, the entrie was made open to them also into the kingdom of God; he was made their father, and that without the signe of circumcision, because they haue baptism in stead of circumcision. But where hee expressly by name denieth, that Abraham is father to them which are of circumcision only, that same was spoken to abate the pride of certain, which omitting the care of godlinesse, did boost themselves of onely ceremonies. After which manner at this day also their vanitie may bee confus'd which seek in baptism nothing but water.

But another place of the Apostle out of the 9. Chapter of the Epistle to the Romanes shalbe alleged to the contrary, where he teacheth they which are of the flesh are not the children of Abraham: but they onely are counted his seede, which are the children of promise. For he seemeth to signifie, that the carnall kinred of Abraham is nothing, which yet we do set in some degree. But it is more diligently to be marked, what matter the Apostle there entreateth of. For, meaning to shewe to the Iewes how much the godnesse of God was not bound to the seede of Abraham, yea howe it nothing availeth of it selfe, he bringeth forth Ismael and Esau for example to produc it: whomc being refused as if they were strangers, although they were according to the flesh the natural offspring of Abraham, the blessing reffed in Isaac and Jacob. Whereupon is gathered that which he afterward affirmeth, that salvation hangeth of the mercie of God, which he extendeth to whomc it pleaseth him: and that there is no cause why the Iewes should stand in their own conceit, or boast upon the name of the couenant, unless they keepe the lawe of the couenant, that is to say, do obey the word. A-gaine when he hath thrown them downe from vaine confidence of their kinred, yet because on the other side he lawe, that the couenant which was once made of God with the posteritie of Abraham, could in no wise be made voide, in the 11. chapter, he argueth that the carnall kinred is not to be spoil'd of his due dignitie: by the beneficall meanes whereof hee teacheth that the Iewes are the first and natural heires of the Gospel, but in respect that by their vnthankfulness, they were forsaken as unworthy: yet so that the heavenly blessing is not utterly remov'd from their nation. For which reason, howe much sooner they were stubborn and couenant breakers, nevertheless hee calleth them holy (to much honor he giuent to the holy generation, with whom God had vouchedfaed to make his holy couenant) but calleth vs, if we be compared with them, as it were after born, yea or the vntimely borne children of Abraham, & that by adoption, not by nature: as if a twig broken off from his naturall tree, should be graffed into a strange stock. Therefore that they should not be defrau'd of their prerogative, it behoed that the Gospel should be first preached to them: for they be in his houfhold of God as it were the first begotten children. Wherefore this honour was to be giuen them, until they refused it being offered them, and by their owne vnthankfulness brought to passe that it was carried away to the Gentiles. Neither yet, with howe great obstinacie sooner they continue to make warre against the Gospel, ought they to be despis'd of vs: if wee consider that for the promises fake, the blessing of GOD doeth yet still remaine. remains among them: as verily the Apostle testifieth that it shall never utterly depart from them, because the gifts and calling of God are without repentance.

15 Behold, of what force is the promise given to the posterity of Abraham, and with what balance it is to be weighed. Wherefore although in discerning the heirs of the kingdom from bastards & strangers, we nothing doubt that the only election of God ruleth with free sight of government; yet we also therewithal perceive, that it pleased him peculiarly to embrace the seed of Abraham with his mercy, and that the same mercy might be the more surely witnessed, to seal it with circumcision. Nowe altogether like State is there of the Christian Church. For as Paul there reasoneth that the lewes are sanctified of their parents, &c. in another place he teacheth, that the children of christians receive the same sanctification of their parents. Whereupon is gathered, that they are worthyly feuered from the rest, which on the other side are condemned of uncleanness. Now who can doubt, but that it is most false which they do therupon conclude, i.e. say that the infants which in old time were circumcised, did onely figure spiritual infancy, which ariseth of the regeneration of the words of God. For Paul doth not so suddenly play the Philosopher, where he writeth, 'Christ is the minister of Circumcision, to fullfill the promises which had been made to the fathers, as if he said thus: Forasmuch as the covenant made with Abraham hath respect to his seed, Christ, to performe and discharge the promise once made by his Father, came to Saluation to the nation of the lewes. See you nowhow also after the resurrection of Christ, he judgeth that the promise of the covenant is to be fulfilled, not only by way of allegorie, but as the very words do sound to the carnal seed of Abraham. To the same entenenth thou that which PETER in the second Chapter of the Acts, declareth to the lewes, that the benefit of the Gospel is due to them and their seed, by right of the covenant and in the Chapter next following he calleth them the children of the Testament, that is to say heyres. From which also not much disaccordeth the other place of the Apostle above alleged, where he accounteth and setteth Circumcision emprinted in infants, for a testimonie of his communion which they have with Christ. But if we harken to their trifles, what shallbe wrought by that promisse, whereby the Lord in the second article of his law undertaketh to his seruantes, he will be favorable to their seed even to the thousandth generation? Shal we here flee to allegories? But ye were too trifling a shift. Or shall we say this is abolished? But so the lawe should be destroyed, which Christ came rather to establish, so far as it turneth vs to good into life. Let it therefore be out of controverie, ye God is so good & liberal to his. that for their sakes, he will have also their children, whom they shall beget, to be adorned among his people.

16 Moreover the differences which they go about to put between baptism & circumcision, are not only worthy to be laughed at, & void of all colour of reason, but also disagreeing with themselves. For wherein they have affirmed that baptism hath relation to the first day of the spiritual battell, but circumcision to the eight, when mortification is already ended, by and by forgetting the same, they turne their song, & call circumcision a figure of the flesh to be
to be mortified, but baptism must be before circumcision: by the other, it is thrust back into filthy place. Yet is it no new example, that the wise of men be so tossed up and downe, when in stead of the most certaine worde of God they worship whatsoever they have dreamed. We therefore say that that former difference is a mere dream. If they lifted to expound by way of allegorie vp the eight day, yet it agreed not in that maner, it were much fitter, according to the opinion of the old writers, to referre the number of eight to the resurrection which was done on the eight day, whereupon we knowe that the newnes of life hangeth to the whole course of this present life, wherein mortification ought alway to go forward, til when life is ended, mortification it selfe may also bee ended. Howbeit God may seeme to have minded to provide for the tender Ness of age, in deferring circumcision to the eight day, because the wounde should haue ben more dangerous to the children new borne & yetred from their mother. How much stronger is that, that we being dead before, are buried by baptism: when the Scripture expressly crieth to the contrarie that we are buried into death to this intent, that we should die, and from henceforth should endeavour to this mortification: Nowe, a likewise handling, it is, that they cauill that women ought not to be baptized, if baptism must bee framed like to circumcision. For if it be most certaine ye the sanctifying of the seed of Israel was testified by the signe of circumcision: therby also it is un doubted, that it was given to sanctifie both males and females. But the only bodies of male children were marked with it, which might by nature be marked; yet so that the women were by them after a certaine maner companions and partners of circumcision. Therefore sending far away such follies of theirs, let vs sticke fast in the likenes of baptisme and circumcision, which we most largely see to agree in the inward mysterie, in the promises, in vs, in effectuallneffe.

17 They thinke also that they bring forth a most strong reason, why children are to be debarred from baptism, when they allege that they are not yet for age able to understand the mysterie there signified. That is spiritual regeneration, which can not be in the first infancie. Therefore they gather, that they are to be taken for none other than the children of Adam, till they be grown to age meete for a second birth. But the truth of God cethere speaketh against all these things. For if they be to be left among children of Adam, then they are left in death: forasmuch as in Adam we can doe nothing but die. But contrariwise Christ commandeth them to be brought unto him. Why for because he is life: Therefore that he may give life to them, he maketh them partakers of himselfe: when in the meanet ime these fellows driving them far away doe adjudge them to death. For if they say for a shift that infants do not therefore perish if they be accounted the children of Adam, their error is abundantly confuted by wittnesse of the scripture. For whereas it pronounceth that all do die in Adam, it foloweth that there remaineth no hope of life but in Christ. Therefore that we may be made heirs of life, we must communicate with him. Againe when it is written in another place, place, that by nature we are subject to the wrath of God, and conceived in sin, whereunto damnation perpetually cleauneth: we must depart out of our own nature, before that the entry be open to us into the kingdom of God. And what can be more plainly spoken, than that flesh & blood can not pollute the kingdom of God? Therefore let all be done away whatsoever is ours (which shall not be done without regeneration) then we shall see this pollution of the kingdom. Finally if Christ say truly, when he reporteth that he is life, it is necessary that we be graffoned into him, that we may be delivered out of the bondage of death. But (say they) how are infants regenerate, which are not endowed with knowledge neither of good nor of evil? But we answeare, that the word of God is not yet no worse at all, although it be not subject to our capacitie. Moreover it is nothing doubtful, that the infants which are to be saved (as verily of that age some are saved) are before regeneration of the Lord. For if they bring with them from their mothers womb the corruption naturally planted in them; they must be purged thereof, before that they be admitted into the kingdom of God, wherein nothing entred that is defiled or spotted. If they be borne sinners, as both David and Paul affirm, either they remaine out of favour and hateful to God, or they must needs be justified. And what seeke we more, when the judge himselfe openly affirmeth that the entrie into heavie life is open to none but to them that are born again? And to put such carpers to silence, he shewed an example in John the baptist, whom he sanctified in his mothers womb, what he was able to doe in the rest. Neither doe they any thing preuaile by the shift wherewith they here mocke, that that was but once done: whereupon it doth not by and by followe that the Lord is wont commonly to doe so with infants. For neither do we reason after that manner: only our purpose is to shew, that the power of God is by them unprofitably and enviously limited within those narrow bounds within which it suffeth not itselfe to bee bounde. Their other by shift is euin of so great weight. They allege that by the usual manner of the Scripture, this word (from the wombe,) is as much in effect, as if it were said, from childhood. But we may clearly see, the Angel when he declared the same to Zachary, meant an other thing: that is, that it which was not yet borne, should be filled with the holy Ghost. Let vs not therefore attempt to appoint a lawe to GOD, but that he may sanctifie whom it pleased him, as he sanctified this child, forasmuch as his power is nothing minished.

18 And truly Christ was therefore sanctified from his first infancy, that he might sanctifie himselfe his elect out of every age without difference. For as to doe away the fault of disobedience which had bin committed in our flesh, he hath put on the same flesh upon himselfe, that he might in it for vs and in our stead performe perfect obedience: so he was conceived of the holy Ghost that having the holiness thereof fully poured into him in the flesh which he had taken upon him, he might powre forth the same into vs. If we haue in Christ a most perfect patterne of all the graces which God continually sheweth to his children, verily in this behalfe also he shalbe a profet unto vs, y the age of infancy is not to farre vnfit for sanctification. But howsoever it be, yet this we holde out of controversy, that none of the elect is called out of this present.
Cap. 16.

Of the outwarde meanes present lif: which is not first made holy & regenerate by the Spirit of God. Wheras they obiect to the contrary, that in the Scriptures Spirit acknowledgeth no other regeneration but of incorruptible seed, that is, of the word of God: they do wrongfullly expounde that saying of Peter, wherein he comprehendeth only the faithful which had been taught by preaching of the Gospel. To such in deed we grant that the word of the Lord is the only seed of spiritual regeneration: but we deny it as being thereupon to be gathered, that infantes cannot be regenerate by the power of God, which is to him as easie and ready as to vs it is incomprehensible and wonderful. Moreover it should not be safe enough for vs to take this away from the Lord, lest he may not be able to shewe himselfe to be knowne to them by whatsoever way he will.

19 But faith, say they, is by hearing, whereof they have not yet gotten the vse, neither can they be able to knowe God, whom Moses teacheth to be destitute of the knowledge both of good and evil. But they consider not that the Apostle, when he maketh hearing the beginning of faith, describeth only the ordinary distribution of the Lord & disposition which he vseth to keep in calling them that be his: but appointeth not to him a perpetuall rule, that he may not vse any other way. Which way verily he hath vset in the calling of many, to whom he hath given the true knowledge of him selfe by an inwarde maner, by the enlightening of the Spirit, without any preaching vset for meane thereof. But whereas they thinke it shalbe a great absurdity, if any knowledge of God be given to infantes, from whom Moses taketh away the understanding of good & evil. I beseech them to answere me what danger is there if they be faide to receive some part of that grace, whereof a little after they shall enjoye the full plentifulness. For if the fulnesse of life standeth in the perfect knowledge of God, when many of them, who in their very first infancy death by and by taketh away, do passe into eternal life, truly they are receiued to behold ye most present face of God. Whom therefore the Lord will enlighten with the ful brightness of his light, why may he not presentely also, if it be pleased him, send out to shine vp such small sparkes therof specially if he do not first vnclot them of ignorance, before that he take them out of the prison of the flesh? Not that I mean rashly to affirme that they be endued with the same Faith which we feel in ourselves, or that they haue altogether like knowledge of faith: (which I had rather leave in suspence) but somwhat to restrain their foolish arrogance, which according as their mouth is puffed vp with fulnes, do boldly deny or affirm they care not what.

20 But that they may yet stand more strongly in this point, they add, that baptism is a Sacrament of repentance and of faith, wherefore sith neither of these can befallin tender infancy, we ought to beware least if they be admitted to the communion of baptism, the signification of it be made void and vaine. But these dartes are thrown rather against God than against vs. For it is most evident by many testimonies of Scripture, that circumcision also was a signe of repentance. Moreover it is called of Paul the scale of the righteousnesse of faith. Let therefore a reason be required of God himselfe why hee commaundde it to be marked in the bodies of infantes.

For, as baptism and circumcision are both in one case, they can give nothing to the one but that they must also therewith all grant the same to the other. If they look back to their wonted starting hole, that then by the age of infancy, were figured spiritual infants, the way is already stopped vp against them. We say therefore, sith God hath communicated to infants circumcision a sacrament of repentance and faith, it seemeth no absurdity if they be made partakers of baptism: vnlesse they lift openly to rage against the ordinance of God. But both in all the doings of God, and in this selfe same doing also (hineneth wisdome and righteousness enough, to bear down the backe-bittings of the wicked. For though infants, at the same instant that they were circumcised, did not comprehend in understanding what that signe meant; yet they were truly circumcised into the mortification of their corrupt and defiled nature, in which mortification they should after-wardes exercise themselves when they were grown to riper age. Finally it is very caiie to affoile this objection, with saying that they be baptised into repentance and Faith to come; which although they be not formed in them, yet by secrete working of the Spirit the seede of both lyeth hidden in them. With this usuall at once is overthrown whatsoever they wrest against vs which they haue fetched out of the signification of baptism. Of which sort is that title wherewith it is commended of Paul, where he calleth it the washing of regeneration & of renewing, Whereupon they gather that it is to be given to none but to such a one as is able to conceive those things. But we on the contrary side may answere, that neither was circumcision which betokened regeneration, to be given to any other than to them that were regenerate. And so shall we condemn the ordinance of God. Wherefore (as we haue alreadie touched in divers places) whatsoever arguments do tend to the flaking of circumcision, they have no force in the affaying of baptism. Neither do they so escape away, if they say that we ought to take that for determined and certaine, which standeth upon the authoritie of God, although there appeare no reason of it: which reverence is not due to the baptism of infants, nor to such other things which be not commended vs by the expresse word of God: sith they are still fast holden with this double argument. For the commandement of God concerning infants to be circumcised, was either lawfull and subject to no caullations, or worthie to be found fault withal. If there were no inconuenience nor absurdity in the commandement of circumcision, neither can there any absurdity be noted in obtaining the baptism of infants.

27. As for the spot of absurdity which in this place they go about to lay upon it, we thus wipe it away. Whome the Lord hath vouchsaue to elect, if having receu'd the signe of regeneration, they depart out of this present life before that they be come to riper age, he reneweth them with the power of his spritie incomprehensible to vs, in such manner as hee alone foreseeeth to be expedient. If they chance to grow vp to age, whereby they may be taught the truth of baptism, they shall hereby bee the more inkindled to the endeavours of renewing, the token whereof they shall learne to have bene given them from their first infancie, that they shoulde exercise themselves in it throughout the whole course of their life. To the same end it ought that
Cap. 16. Of the outwaie means that to be applied which Paul teacheth in two places, that by baptism we are buried together with Christ: For he doth not mean thereby, that he which is to be baptised, must be alreadie first buried together with Christ: but simplicie declareth what doctrine is contained under baptism, yea & that to them that are alreadie baptised, so that verie mad men would not affirme by this place that it goeth before baptism. After this manner Moses and the prophets did put the people in mind what circumcision meant, where-with yet they had beene marked while they were infants. Of the same effect also is that which hee writeth to the Galatians, that they when they were baptised, did put on Christ. To what end wherefore that they should from thence forth live to Christ, because they had not lived before. And although in the older place the receiving of the signe ought to follow y understandinge of the mysterie: yet it shall be by and by declared that infants ought to be otherwise esteeemed and acounted of. And no otherwise ought we to judge of the place of Peter, in which they thinke that they have a strong hold: whereas he faith that it is not a washing to wipe away the sinnes of the body, but the witnessse of a good conscience before God, by the resurrection of Christ. They indeede do gather thereby, that nothing is left to the baptism of infants, but that it should be a vaine smoke, namely from which this truth is far distant. But they offend in this errour, that they will have the thing in order of time to goe alway before the signe. For the truth of circumcision also consisted of the same witnessse of good conscience. If it ought of necessitie to have gone before, infants should never have beene circumcised by the commandement of God. But he shewing that the witnessse of a good conscience was contained under the truth of circumcision, and yet therewithal also commanding infants to be circumcised, doth in y pointe sufficiently declare that circumcision is applied to the time to come. Wherefore there is no more present effectuallnes to be required in baptism of infants, than that it should conforme and establish the covenant made by the Lord with them. The rest of the signification of that Sacrament shall afterward follow at such time as God himselfe foreseeth.

22. Nowe I thinke there is no man, that doeth not clearely see that all such reasons of theirs are mere misconstruing of scripture. As for the rest that be of a neere kinde to these, we will lightly runne through them by the way. They obiect that baptism is giuen vnto the forgiveness of sinnes: which when it is graunted, will largely make for defence of our sentence. For sith we be borne sinners, we do even form our mothers wombe neede forgiveness and pardon. Now being the Lord doth not cut off, but rather assure to that age the hope of mercy: why should we take from them the signe which is much inferiour then the thing it selfe? Wherefore that which they goe about to throw against vs, we thus throw back against themselves: infants have remission of sinnes giuen them, therefore they ought not to have the signe taken from them. They alleadge also this out of the Epistle to the Ephesians: that the Church is cleansed of the Lorde, with the washing of water in the word of life. Than which there could be nothing be alleaged more fit to overthrow their errour: for thereupon groweth an easie prove of our side. If the Lord will have y washing wherewith he cleanseth his church
To Salutation. Lib. 4.

To be testified by baptism: it seemeth not rightfull that it should be want the testimonie of it in infants, which are rightfully accompted parte of the Church, forasmuch as they be called heires of the heavenly kingdom. For Paul speaketh of the whole Church, where he saith that it was cleansed with the baptism of water. Likewise of this that in an other place he saith that we be by baptism graied into the body of Christ, wee gather that infants, whom he reckoneth among his members, ought to be baptized, lest they be plucked away from his body. Beholde with what violence with so many engines they assault the fortresses of our faith.

23 Then they come downe to the practise and custome of the time of the Apostles, wherein none is found to have bene admitted to baptism, but he which hath before professed faith and repentance. For where Peter was asked of them, that were minded to repent, what was needful to be done he counsell'd them first to repent, and then to be baptized into the forgiveness of sinnes. Likewise Philip, when the Eunuch required to be baptized, answered that he might be baptized if he beleued with all his heart. Hereby they thinke that they may winne, that it is not lawfull that baptism be granted to any, but where faith and repentance goe before. Truely if we neede to to this reason, the first of these two places where is no mention made of faith, will proue that repentance alone sufficeth: & the other place, wherein repentance is not required, wil proue that faith onely is enough. I thinke they will answere that the one place is holpen with the other, and therefore must be joyned together. I say also likewise, that other places must bee laid together which make somewhat to the vndoing of this knot: forasmuch as there be many sentences in scripture, the understanding whereof hangeth upon the circumscription of the place. As this presently is an example, For they to whom Peter and Philip spake these things were of age sufficient to have practise of repentance and to conceive faith. We cannot deny that such ought to be baptized, vntill after perceiving of their conversion and faith, at least so farre as it may be searched out by the judgement of me. But, that infants ought to be accompted in an other number, it is more than evident enough. For in old time if any man did joyn himselfe into communition of religion with Israel, it behooved that hee should first bee taught the covenant of the Lord, & instructed in the law, before that hee were marked with circumcision, because in birth he was a stranger from the people of Israel, with whom the covenant had beene made with circumcision established.

24 As also the Lord, when he adopteth Abraham to himselfe, doth not begin at circumcision, hiding in the mean time what he meaneth by that signe: but first he declareth what covenant he intendeth to make with him, and then after faith given to the promise, hee maketh him partaker of the Sacrament. Why doth in Abraham the sacrament follow faith, & in Isaac his sonne it goeth before all understanding: Because it is meet that he, which being in full grown age is receiued into fellowship of the covenant, from which he had beene hitherto a stranger, should first learne the conditions thereof: but an infant begotten of him needed not so, which by right of inheritance according to the forme of the promise is even from his mothers wombe contained in the covenant. Or (that the matter may be more clearly and briefly briefly shewed) if the children of the faithfull, without the helpe of understandings, are partakers of the covenant, there is no cause why they should be debarred from the signe for this that they cannot sweare to the forme of the covenant. This verily is the reason why in some places God affirmeth that the infants which are issue of the Israelites, are begotten and borne to him. For without doubt he esteemeth as his children the children of the to whose seed he promiseth that he will be a Father. But he which is unfaithfull, issue of Ungodly parents, till hee bee by faith united to God, is judged a stranger from the communion of the covenant. Therefore it is no maruell if he be not partaker of the signe, the signification whereof should be deceitfull and yoyde in him. To this effect Paul alfo writeth, that the g-tilles so long as they were drowned in their idolatrie, were out of the Testament. With this short summe, (as I thinke) the whole matter may be clearly opened: that they which in grown age, embrace the faith of Christ, forasmuch as they were hitherto strangers from the covenant, are not to bee marked with baptism, but whereas faith and repentance come betwene, which onely can open them the entrie into fellowship of the covenant: but the infants that are issue of Christians, as they are receiued of God into the inheritance of the covenant, so soone as they be borne, so ought to be receiued to baptism. Hereunto must that bee applied which the Evangelist speaketh of, that they were baptiz'd which confessed their sinnes. Which example at this day also we thinke meete to be kep. For if a Turk offer himselfe to baptism, he should not be rashly baptiz'd of vs, namely not till after confession whereby he may satisfy the Church.

25 Moreover they bring forth the words of Christ, which are rehearsed in the third Chapter of John, whereby they thinke that a present regeneration is required in baptism. Unlesse a man be borne againe of water & the spirite, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. Lo! (say they) howe baptism is by the Lordes owne mouth called regeneration. Then therefor whom it is more than enough known to be able to receive regeneration by what colours we doe admit to baptism, which cannot be without regeneration? First they are deceived in this that they thinke that in this place mention is made of baptism, because they heare the name of water. For after y Christ had declazd to Nicodemus the corruption of nature, & taught him, ye men must be borne of newe, because Nicodemus dreamed of a bodily newe birth, he there shewed the manner how God doth regenerate vs, namely by water and the spirite; as though he should say by the spirite which in cleansing and watering faithfull soules, dooth the office of water. Therefore I take water and the spirite simiple for the spirite, which is water. Neither is this a newe forme of speche, for it altogether agreeith with the same which is in the thirde Chapter of Mathew: Hee that followeth me, it is he that baptizeth in the holy Ghost & fire. Therefore as to baptizhe in the holy Ghost and fire, is to give the Holy Ghost, which hath the office and nature of fire, so to be borne againe of water and the spirite, is nothing else but to receive that power of the holy spirite which doth the same thing in the soule that water doeth in the bodie. I knowe that other doe other waye expounde it: but I am out of doubt that this is the naturall meaning: because the purpose of Christ is none other, but to teach that all they must put off their own nature which aspire to the heavenly kingdom. Howbeit if we lift to causel volunta- rily as they do, it were easie for us (when we have granted as they would haue it) to infere upon them that baptism must be before faith and repentance: for as much as in the words of Christ it goeth before the spirit. It is certaine that this is understood of spiritual gistes: which if they come after bap-tisme, I haue obtained what I require. But leaving causilations, we must hold fast the plaine exposition, which I haue brought, that no man till he have beene renewed with living water, that is, with the spirit, can enter into the kingdom of God.

26 Now hereby also it is evident that their fained intension is to bee hissed out, which adjuage all the unbaptised to eternal death. Therefore let vs according to their request imagine baptism to bee ministred to none but to them that bee grown in age: What will they say, shall become of a Child, which is rightly and well instructed with the introductions of god-lines, if when the day of baptisme is at hande, he happen to bee taken away with sudden death beside men's hope? The Lorde saith, that who soever hath beleued in the sonne, shall not see death, nor shall come into judgement, but is alreadie passe from death into life: and it is no where found that he ever damned him that was not yet baptised. Which I would have not haue so taken of me as though I meant that baptisme might freely bee despised (by which despising I affirm that the Lorde's covenant is defiled; so much leffe can I abide to excuse it) onely it is enough for mee to proove, that it is not so necessarie, that he should be immediately thought to be lost, from whom power is taken away to obtaine it. But if wee agree to their fained deuise, we shall damne all them without exception, whom any chance with holde shew from baptisme, with how great faith soever (by which Christ himselfe is possedf) other wise they are endued. Moreover they make all infants guiltie of eternal death, to whom they deny baptisme, which by their owne confession is necessarie to salvation. Nowe let them looke howe trumly they agree with the words of Christ, by which the kingdom of hea-vnen is adjudged to that age. But, to grante them euery thing so muche as pertaineth to the understanding of this place, yet they shal gather nothing thereof, vnles they overthrow the former doctrine which we haue established concerning the regeneration of infants.

27 But they glorie that they haue the strongest hold of all in the verie institution of baptisme, which they fetch out of the lafte Chapter of Mathew when Christ sending forth his Apostles to all nations, giue them the first commaundement to teach them, and the second to baptise them. Then also out of the lafte of Mark they adjoine this, He that beleueth and is baptifed, shall be saued. What seeke we further (say they) when the Lorde's owne wordes doe openly shew, that we must first teach ere we baptise, and do assure to baptisme the seconde state after faith? Of which order the Lorde also shewed an example in himself, which would be baptised not till thirty yeres, But here, O good God, howe many waies doe they both entangle themselves, and bewray their owne ignorance? For herein they now more than childishly err, that they fetch the first institution of Baptisme from thence

Ihence, which Christ had given the beginning of his preaching given in charge to his Apostles to minister. Therefore there is no cause why they should affirm that the law and rule of Baptisme is to be fetched out of these places, as though they contained the first institution thereof. But to bear with the for this fault, yet how strong is this manner of reasoning? Truly if I lifted to thy ablution with them, there is not a little luoking hole, but a meaf wide field thereof it selfe open for vs to escape them. For when they flieke so fast to the order of words, that they gather that because it is saide, Go, preach and baptize, &c. therefore they must præche before that they baptize, &c. because before they require baptism: why may not wee againe aunfwere them with saying that we must baptize before that we must teach the keeping of those things that Christ hath commanded, namely Christ it is said, baptize ye, teaching them to keep whatsoever things I have commanded you? which same things we have noted in that saying of Christ which hath ben even now allcaded concerning the regeneration of water and the Spirit. For if it be so understood as they would have it, verily in that place baptism must be before spiritual regeneration, because it is named in the first place. For Christ doth teach that we must be regenerate, not of the spirit & water, but of water and the Spirit.

28 Nowe this insinuable reason whereupon they bare themselves so boldly, seemeth to be somewhat shaken: but because truth hath defence enoufh in simplicitie, I will not escape away with such light arguments. Therefore let them take with them a ful aunswere. Christ in this place giues the chief commandement concerning preaching of the Gospell, whereunto to be adioyned the miniterie of baptism as an addition hanging upon it. Againhe he speake nonr otherwise of baptism, but so far as the ministration of it is under the office of teaching. For Christ shendeth the Apostles to publish the Gospell to all the nations of the world, that they shoulde from ech other with the doctrine of salvation gather together into his kingdom men that before were lost. But whom, or what manner of men? It is certain then there is no mention but of the that are able to receive teaching. Afterword he addeth that such, when they are instructed, ought to be baptised, adiyning a promise, that they which beleue and are baptised shall be saued. Is there in all that saying so much as one syllable of infantes? What forme therefore of reasoning that this be wherewith they affialc vs: they which are of grown age, must first be instructed, that they may beleue, ere they be baptised: therefore it is unlawful to make baptisme common to infantes? Although they would butt themselves, they shall procure nothing else by this place but that the gospel must be preached to them that are of capaciteit able to heare it, before that they be baptized, forasmuch as he there speake of such only. Let them hercif, if they can make a steppe to debarre infantes from baptism.

29 But that even blinde men also may with groping finde out their deceites, I will point them out with a verie cleare similitude. If any man call that infantes ought to have meat taken from thence upon this presence that the Apostle suffereth none to eat but them that labor, shall he not bee woorthe that all men should spit at him? Why so? Because he with difference drawdraweth that to al men, which was spoken of one kinde & one certaine age of men. No whit handosomer is their handling in this present cause. For that which erie man seeth to belong to one age alone, they draw to infants, & this age also may be subject to the rule which was made for none but them that were more grown in yeares. As for the example of Christ, nothing upheldeth their side, He was not baptised before that he was thirtie yeares old. That is indeede true: but there is a reason thereof readie to be shewed: because he then purposed by his preaching to lay a sound foundation of baptism, & rather to stablish the foundation which had beene before laide of John. Therefore when he minded with his doctrine to institute baptism, to procure a greater authority to his institution, he sanctified it with his owne body, and that in such formes of time as was most convenient, namely whe he began his preaching. Finally, they shall gather nothing else hereof, but that baptism toke his original & beginning at the preaching of the Gospel. If they left to appoint the thirtie yeares, why do they not keepe it, but doe receive erie one to baptism as he hath in their judgement sufficiently professed? yea & Sermonus one of their masters, when he stiffeely required this time, yet began at the 21. yeare of his age to boast himselfe to bee a prophet. As though he were to be sufffied that taketh upon himselfe the place of a teacher in the church, before that he be a member of the church.

30 At the last they obiecte, that there is no greater cause why baptism should be given to infants, than the Lords supper, which yet is not granted them. As though the scripture did not euery way express a large difference. The same was in deede vsually done in the olde Church, as it appeareth by Cyprian and Augustine: but that manner is worthy grown out of vs. For if we consider the nature and propriety of baptism, it is truely an entrie into the Church, and as it were a forme of admission, whereby we are adumbrated into the people of God, a signe of our spiritual regeneration by which we are borne againe into the children of God: whereas on the other side the Supper is given to them that be more grown in age, which being past tender infanctie, are nowe able to beare strong meate. Which difference is verie evidently shewed in the scripture. For there the Lords so much as certaineth to baptism, makest no choice of ages. But hee dooth not likewise giue the supper to all to take part of it, but only to them which are fit to discern the body & blood of the Lords, to examine their owne conscience, to declare the Lords death, to weigh the power thereof. Woulde wee haue any thing plainer, than that which the Apostle teacheth where he exhorteth that erie man should proue & examine himselfe, and then eate of this bread & drinke of this cup? Therefore examination must goe before, which should in vaine be looked for of infants. Againe, hee that eatest unworthily, eatest & drinketh damnation to himselfe, not discerning the Lords body. If none can partake worthily but they that can well discern the holiness of the Lords bodie, why should we giue to our tender children, poysen in stead of lucely foode? What is that commandement of the Lords, yee shall doe it in remembrance of me? what is that other which the Apostle deriveth from the same, So oft as ye shall eate of this bread, yee shall declare the Lords death till he come? What remembrance (I beleeue you) shall wee require at our infants of the thing which they never attained with understanding, what preaching of the cross of Christ, the force and benefit whereof they do not yet comprehend in mind. None of these things is prescribed in baptism. Therefore between these two signs is great difference: which we note also in like signs in the old testament; Circumcision, which is known to answer to our baptism, was appointed for infants. But the passage into whose place the Supper hath now succeeded, did not receive all manner of gestic without difference, but was rightly eaten of them only that might by age enquire of the signification of it. If these men had remaining one crumme of sound braine, would they be blinde at a thing so cleare and offering it selfe to fight.

31 Although it grieueth me to lode the reader with a heape of trifles yet I shall be worth the traualie briefly to wipe away such gay reason for Sermestus not the leaft of the Anabaptistes, yea the great glorie of that company, thought himselfe to bring when he prepared himselfe to confest. Hee alledge that Christes signes as they be perfect, doe require them that be perfect or able to conceive perfection. But the solution is easie: that the perfection of baptism, which extends euene to death, is wrongfull restraine to one point of time. I say yet further, that perfection is foolishly required in man at the first day, whereas to baptism allureth vs all our life long by continual degrees. Hee obiecteth that Christes signes were ordained for remembrance, that euerie man should remember that he was buried together with Christ. I answere that that which hee hath gained of his owne head, needeth no confusion: yeay which he draweth to baptism, Pauls wordes shew to bee proper to the holy Supper, that euerie man should examine himselfe: but of baptism there is no where any such thing. Whereupon wee gather that they bee rightly baptised which for their smalnesse of age, are not yet able to receive examination. Whereas hee thirdly alledge, that al they abide in death which beleue not the sonne of God, and that the wrath of God abideth vpon them; and therefore that infants which cannot beleue lie in their damnation: I answere that Christ there speaketh not of the generall giltiness wherewith all the posteritie of Adam are enwrapped, but onely threateneth the despisers of the Gospel, which doe proudly and stubbornly refuse the grace offered them. But this nothing pertaineth to infants. Also I set a contrarie reason against them that whomsoever Christ blesseth, hee is discharged from the curse of Adam and the wrath of God: Sith therefore it is known that infants are blessed of him, it followeth that they are discharged from death. Then he falsely citeth that which is no where read, that who so ever is borne of the spirit, heareth the voice of the spirit. Which although we grant to be written, yet shall prove nothing else but that the faithfull are framed to obedience, according as the spirit worketh in them. But that which is spoken of a certaine number, it is faultrue to drawe indifferently to all. Fourthly, he obiecteth: because that goeth before which is naturally wee, must tarrye ripe time for baptism which is spiritual. But although I grant that al the posteritie of Adam begotten of the flesh doe from the verie wonbe bear their owne damnation, yet I denie that that withstandeth but that God may presently bring remedie.
To Salutation. Lib. 4. 453

For neither shall Christ call infants to the heavenly banquet. As Paul doth elsewhere, so here he brings forth the allegoric, that David going up into the temple of God, did lead neither blind men nor lame men with him but strong and able. But what if I set a parable against this? wherein God calleth to the heavenly banquet blind men and lame men: howe will Christ vvnwilde himself out of this knot? I ask also whether lame and maimed men had not first beene soyledours with David. But it is superfluos to tarry longer upon this reason, which the readers shall find by the holy historic to be made of meere falsehode. There followeth an other allegoric, that the Apostles were fathers of men, not of little children. But I ask, what that saying of Christ meaneth, that into the net of the Gospel are gathered all kinds of fishes. But because I like not to play with allegories, I answer, that when the office of teaching was enjoyned to the Apostles, yet they were not forbidden from baptizing of infants. Howbeit I would yet know, whether the Evangelist nameth the Apostles, men (in which words is comprehended all man kinde without exception) why they should deny infants to be men. Seuently he allegath, that fith spiritual things agree with spiritual, infantis which are not spiritual, are also not meete for baptism. But first it is plainly evident howe wrongfully they wreft the place of Paul. There is entreated of doctrine: when the Corinthians did so much stande in their owne conceit for vaine sharpnesse of witte, Paul rebuketh their fuggishnesse, for that they were yet to be instructed in the first introductions of heavenly wisdom. Who can thereof gather that baptism is to be denied to infants, whom being begotten of the flesh God doth by free adoption make holly to himselfe: Whereas he faith, that they must be fedde with spiritual meate, if they be newe men, the solution is easie, that by baptism they are admitted into the flocke of Christ, and that the signe of adoption sufficeth them, till being grown to age they be able to beare strong meate: that therefore the time of examination which God expressly required in the holy Supper, must be tarried for. Afterwarde he obiecteth that Christ calleth all his to the holy Supper. But it is certaine enough that he admetteth none, but them that bee already prepared to celebrate the remembrance of his death. Whereupon followeth that infants whom he vouchsaft to embrace, do stay in a seuerall and proper degree by themselves till they growe to age, and yet are not strangers. Whereas he faith, that it is monyrous that a man after that he is borne, should not eat: I answer, that soules are otherwise fed than by the outwarde eating of the Supper: and that therefore Christ is never the less meate to infants, although they abstaine from the signe. But of baptism the ease is otherwise, by which onely the gate into the Church is opened to them. Againe he obiecteth that a good steward distributeth meate to the houholde in due time. Which although I willingly graunt, yet by what right will he appoint vnto vs the certaine time of baptism, that he may proue that it is not given to infants out of time. Moreover he bringeth in that commandement of Christ to the Apostles, that they should make haste into the harvest.
Cap.16. Of the outwared meanes while the fieldes waxe white,Verily Christ meaneth this onely, that the Apostilles seeing the fruite of their labour presente, should the more cheerfully prepare themselves to teach. Who shal therefore gather that the only time of harvest is the ripe time of baptism: His eleventh reason is, that in the first Church Christians and disciples were all one: but we see nowe that hee fondely reasoneth from the part to the whole. Disciples are called men of ful age, which had beene alreadie throughly taught, & had professed Christ: as it behoved that the Iewes under the lawe should be the disciples of Moses: yet no man shall there of rightly gather, that infants were strangers, whom the Lorde hath testified to be of his household. Beside these he allengeth, that all Christians are brethren, in which number infants are not vnto vs, so long as we debarre them from the Supper. But I returne to that priciple, that none are heires of the kingdome of heauen, but they that are the members of Christ: then, that the embracing of Christ was a true token of the adoption, whereby infants are joyned in common with full grown men, and that the absteining for a time from the Supper withstandeth not but that they pertaine to the bodie of the Church. Neither did the thesee that was converted on the Cross, cease to be brother of the godly, although he never came to the Supper. Afterwarde he addeth, that none is made our brother but by the Spirite of adoption, which is givene only by the hearing of faith. I answer, that he still falleth backe into the same deceitfull argument, because he overthwartly draweth that to infants which was spoken onely of grown men. Paul teacheth there that this is Gods ordinaire manner of calling to bring his elect to the faith, when he saitheth vp to them faithfull teachers, by whose ministerie & travaile he reacheth his hand to them. Who dare thereby appoint a lawe to him, but that he may by some other secret way graffe infants into Christ? Where he objecteth that Cornelius was baptised after that he had received the holy Ghost: howe wrongfully he doeth out of one example gather a general rule, appeareth by the Eunuch and the Samaritaines, in whom the Lorde kept a contrarie order, that baptism went before the gifts of the holy Ghost. The fiftenth reason is more than foolish. He saitheth that we are by regeneration made gods: & that they be gods to whom the worde of God is spokene, which accordeth not to children that be infants. Whereas he saitheth a Godhead to the faithful, that is one of his dotages, which it pertaineth not to this present place to examine. But to wrest the place of the Psalme to so contrarie a seps, is a point of desperate shamelesse. Christ saitheth, that Kings and Magistrates are called of the prophet gods, because they beare an office appointed them of God. But, that which concerning the speciall commanment of gouvernance is directed to certaine men, this handesome expostor draweth to the doctrine of the Gospel, that he may banish infants out of the Church. Againe he objecteth, that infants can not be accounted newe men, because they are not begotten by the worde. But I doe nowe agayne repeate that which I haue often saide, that to regenerate vs doctrine is the uncorruptible seede, if wee be fitte to receive it: but when by reason of age there is not yet in vs aptnesse to learne, God keepeth his degrees of regenerating. Afterwarde he commeth backe to his allegories, that in the law a sheepe sheep and a goat were not offered in sacrifice so soon as they came out of the womb. If I lifted to drawe figures to this purpose, I could likewise readily object against him, that all first begotten things were consecrate to God so soon as they had opened the womb: then, that a lamb must be killed at a yeares age. Whereupon followeth that manlye strength is not to be ratified for, but rather that the newe and yet tender, sillies are chosen of God for sacrifices. Furthermore he affirmeth that none can come to Christ, but they that have beene prepared of John. As though Johnes office were not enduring but for a time. But, to omit this, truely that same preparation was not in the children whome Christ embraced & blessed. Wherefore let him go with his faile principle. At length he calleth for patrones Trismegistus and the Sibylles, to prove that holy washings pertaine not but to them that are of growen age. Lo how honorably he thinketh of the baptisme of Christ, which hee reduceth to the ceremonies of the Gentiles, that it may be no otherwise ministrd than pleaseth Trismegistus. But wee more esteeme the authoritie of God, whome it hath pleased to make infants holy to himselfe, and to admitte them with the holy signe, the force whereof they did not yet by age understand. Neither doe we count it lawfull to borrowe out of the cleansinges of the Gentiles anie thing that may change in our baptisme the everlafting and inuoable lawe of God, which he hath established concerning circumcision. Last of all, he maketh this argument: that if it be lawfull to baptise infants without understanding, then baptisme may enterlude-like and in sport be ministrd of boies when they play. But of this matter let him quarle with God by whose commandement circumcision was common to infants before that they had attained understanding. Was it therefore a playing matter, or subject to the follies of children, that they might overthrow the holy ordinance of God? But it is no maruile that these reprobate spirites, as though they were vexed with a phrensie, doe thrust in all the grossest absurdities for defence of their errours: because God doth with such giddinesse lustly take vengeance of their pride and stubbornesse. Verily I trueth I have made plaine with how feeble succors Sermesius hath holpe his silye brethren the Anabaptistes.

32 Nowe I thinke it wilbe doutfull to no sober man, howe rashly they trouble the Church of Christ, that moue bravelles & contentions for the baptisme of infants. But it is profitable to consider, what Satan goeth about with this so great tumulttie, even to take away from vs the singular fruit of assistance and spiritual joy which is to be gathered hereof, and to diminish the as muche also of the glory of the goodnesse of God. For howe sweete is it to godlye minds, to be certifie not onely by worde, but also by sight to be scene with victorie, that they obtaine so muche fauour with the heavenly father, that hee hath also care of their posteritie? For here it is to be scene, howe he taketh upon him the person of a most prouident father of household towarde vs, which even after our death doeth not lay away his carefullnesse of vs, but prouideth and foreseeh for our children. Ought we not here after the example of David with all our heart to leape vp into thankesgiving, that by suche shewe of his goodnesse, his name may be sanctified? This, verily Satan intenceth in assailing with so great armies the baptisme of infants, namely, that... this testifying of the grace of God being taken away, the promise which by it is present before our eyes, may at length by little & little vanish away. Whereupon should growe not only a wicked vnthankfulnesse toward the mercie of God, but also a certaine slothfulnesse in instructing our children to godliness. For by this spurre we are not a little pricked forwarde to bring them vp in the earnest feare of God and in the keeping of his lawe, when we consider that even immediately from their birth, he taketh and acknowledgeth them for his children. Wherefore vnleffe we lift enuiously to darken the bountifulnesse of God; let vs offer to him our children, to whom he giueth a place among them that be of his familie and housetholde, that is to saye, the members of the Church.

The xvii. Chapter.

Of the holy Supper of Christ, and wbat is anaileth vs.

After that God hath once receiued vs into his familie, and not onely to take vs as his feruants, but as his children: that he may fulfyl the office of a most good father, and careful for his issue, the taketh also vppon him to nourish vs throughout the whole course of our life. And not contented therewith, it pleased him by a pledge giuen to assure vs of this continuall liberality. To this ende therefore he hath giuen his Church another Sacrament by the hand of his onely begotten Sonne, namely a spirituall banker, where-in Christ testifieth himselfe to be the quickning bread, wherewith our soules are fed to true and blessed immortalitie. But forasmuch as the knowledge thereof is very necessarie, and according to the greatnesse thereof, requireth a diligent declaration; and Satan, that he might bereave the Church of this inestimable treasure, hath long ago spread mistes, and since that time darkenesse, to obscure the light of it, and then hath stirred strifes and battailes that might estrange the minde of the simple from tasting of this holic foode, and hath also in our time attempted the same craft: therefore when I shall have briefly knit vp the summe for the capacitie of the unlearned, I wil vnde those knottes, wherewith Satan hath endeavoured to snare the world. First, bread and wine are signes, which represent vnto vs the invisible foode, which we receive of the flesh and bloud of Christ. For as in baptisme God againe begetteth vs doth graffe vs into the fellowship of his Church, and by adoption doth makes vs his owne: so wee haue saide that he performeth the office of a prouident father of householde, in that he continually ministreth vs meate, that he sustaineeth and preserving vs in that life wherunto he hath by his word begotten vs. Nowe the onely meate of our soule is Christ, and therefore the heauenly Father calleth vs to him, that being refreshed with common partaking of him, wee may from time to time gather lively force, until we attaine to heauenly immortallitie. But forasmuch as this mysterie of the secrete vniteing of Christ with the godly is by nature impossible to be comprehended, hee giueth the figure and image thereof in visible signes most fitt for our small capacitie: yea, as it were by earnest and tokens giuen, he maketh it so assured vnto vs as if it were seene with our cies, because this so familiar a similitude entretwth enen even to the greatest minde, that soules are so fed with Christ, as bread and wine doe sustene the bodily life. Nowe therefore we have it declared, to what ende this mystickall blessing tendeth, namely to assure vs, that the bodie of the Lorde was so once offered for vs, that we nowe eate it, and in eating it doth ele in vs the effectual working of that onely sacrifice, that his bloude was so once shed for vs, that it is vs vs continual drinke. And so found the words of the promise there adioyned. Take, this is my body, which is deliered for you. The body therefore which was once offered vp for our saluation, we are commanded to take and eate: that when we see our felues to be made partakers of this, we may certainly determine that the power of his death which bringeth life shalbe effectual in vs. Whereupon also he calleth the cup, the covenant in his bloud. For after a certaine manner it reneweth, or rather continueth the covenant that he hath once stablished with his bloud, so much as pertaineth to the confirming of our faith, so oft as he re-cheth vs vs that holy bloud to be tasted of.

2 A great fruit verily of affiance and sweetnesse may godly soules ga-ter of this sacrament, because they have a witnesse, that we are growen together into one body with Christ, so that whatsoever is his we may call ours. Hereupon followeth, that we may boldly prome vs into our felues, that everlasting life is ours, whereof he is heire; and that the kingdom of heaven, wherein he is now entred, can no more fal away from vs than from him: againe that we cannot nowe be condemned by our sinnes, from the giltes whereof he hath acquired vs, when he willed them to be imputed to himself as if they were his owne. This is the maruellous exchange, which of his immeasurable bountifulnes he hath made with vs; that he being made with vs the sonne of man, hath made vs with him the sonnes of God: that by his com-ming downe into earth, he hath made vs a way to goe vp into heaven:
that putting vp on him our mortalitie, he hath giuen vs his immortalitie; y taking on him our weakenes, he hath strengthened vs with his power: that taking our vnaughtie to himselfe, he hath conveyed his riches to vs: that taking to him the weight of our vnaутьfullnes, when we were oppressed, he hath clothed vs with his rightousnesse.

3 Of all these things we have so full a witnessing in this sacrament, that we must certainly determine, that Christ is truly giuen vs, as if Christ himself were set present before our eies, and handled with our hands. For this word can neither lie to vs, nor moeke vs: Take, eate, drinke: this is my bodie which is delievered for you: this is the bloud, which is shed into the for-giuenesse of sinnes. Whereas he commandeth to take, he signifieth that it is ours. Whereas he commandeth to eate, he signifieth that that is made one substance with vs. Whereas he faith of the bodie, that it is delievered for vs: of the bloud, that it is shed for vs: therein he teacheth that both are not so much his as ours: because hee tooke and laid away both, not for his commoditie, but to our salvation. And truly it is to be diligently marked, that the chiefe and in a manner whole pith of the sacrament standeth in these wordes. Which is delievered for you, which is shed for you. For otherwise it should not much profit vs, that the body and bloud of our Lorde are nowe distributed, unless they had beene once giuen foorth for our redemption
and

and salvation. Therefore they are represented vnder bread and wine, that we should learne that they are not onely ours, but also ordained for the nourishment of spiritual life. This is it that wee before said, that from the corporall things which are shewed forth in the sacramentes, we are by a certaine proportionall relation guided to spiritual things. So when bread is giuen vs for a signe of the bodie of Christ, we ought by & by to conceive this similitude: As bread nouriseth, susteneth, and maintaineth the life of our bodie: so the body of Christ is the onely meane to quicken and give life to our soule. When we see wine set forth for a signe of his bloud, wee muste call to minde: what vs wine bringeth to the bodie, that we may consider that the same are brought to us spirittually by the bloud of Christ: those vs be to cherish, to refresh, to strengthen, to make merry. For if wee sufficiently weigh, what the deliuering of this holy bodie, what the shedding of this holy bloud, hath profited vs: wee shall plainly perceive that those things which are spoken of bread and wine, according to such proportionall relation do verie well accorde with them towaide vs when they are communicated vs.

4 Therefore the chief partes of the Sacrament are not simply and without higher consideration to reach to vs the bodie of Christ: but rather the same promisse, whereby he testifieth, that his flesh is verily meat: & his bloud is drinke, with which we are sefeed into eternall life: whereby he affirmeth himselfe to be the bread of life, of which who so eate, he shall live for ever. To make vs this signe (I say) and confirm that promisse: and for bringing the same to passe, to send vs to the cross of Christ, where that promisse hath bene trueely performed, and in all pointes fulfilled. For we do not wel and healthfully eate Christ but crucifie, when we do with lively feeling conceive the effectuallnes of his death. For whereas he calleth himselfe the bread of life, he did not borrow that name of the sacrament, as some do wrongfully expound it: but because he was giuen vs of the father, and performed himselfe such, when being made partaker of our humaine mortality, he made vs partners of his divine immortalitie: when offering himselfe for sacrifice, he tooke our accursed bloud upon himselfe, that he might fill vs with blesse: when with his death he deuoured and swallowed vp death: when in his resurrection he raised vp this our corruptible flesh which he had put on, to glorie and ven-corruption.

5 It remaineth that by appliance all the same may come to vs. That is done both by the Gospell, and more clearly by the holy Supper, where both he offereth himselfe to vs with all his good things, and we receive him by faith. Wherefore the sacrament maketh not that Christes first beginneth to be the bread of life: but when it bringeth into remembrance, that he was made the bread of life, which we continually eate, and when it giueth vs the taste and savour of that bread, then it maketh vs to feel the strength of that bread. For it promiseth vs, that whatsoever Christ did or suffered, the same was done to give life to vs. Then, that this giving of life is everlasting, by which we may without ende be nourished, sustenied, and preferred in life. For as Christ should not have eene to vs the bread of life, vnlesse hee had beene borne and had died for vs, vnlesse he had risen againe for vs:

soe nowe he should not be the same vnlesse the effectuallnesse and fruite of his birth, death and resurrection were an euertlasting and immortal thing. All which Christ hath very well expressed in these wordes. The bread which I John 6.53 will give, is my flesh, which I will give for \( y \) life of the world. By which words without doubt he signifieth, that his Body should therefore be to vs for bread, to the spiritual life of the soule, because it should be given forth to death for our salvation: and that it is delievered to vs to care of it, when by faith he makest vs partakers of it. Once therefore he gave it, that he might be made bread, when he gave forth himselfe to be crucified for the redemption of the world: daily he giveth it, when by the worde of the Gospel he offereth it vs to be received, so farre as it was crucified: where he sealeth that deliuerance with the holy mysterie of the Supper: where he inwardlie fulfilleth that which he outwardly bethoketh. Nowe herein we must beware of two faultes, \( y \) neither doing too much in abasing the signes, we seeme to plucke them from their mysteries to which they are in a manner knittie fast: nor that being immeasurable in adauancinge the same, we seeme in the meane time somewhat to darkne the mysteries themselves. That Christ is the brcade of life, wherewith the faithfull are nourished into eternall salvation, there is no man but he granteth, vnlesse he be altogether without religio. But this point is not like wise agreed upon among all men, what is the manner of partaking of him. For there be that in one worde define, that to eare the flesh of Christ and to drinke his bloud, is nothing else but to beleeue in Christ himself. But I thinke that Christ meant some certaine and higher thing, in that notable sermon where he commendeth to vs the eating of his flesh, namely, that we are quickened by the true partaking of him: which also he therefore expresed by the wordes of eating and drinking, lest any man shoulde thinke, that the life which we receive of him is conceuiued by bare knowledge onely. For as not the sight, but the eating of bread sufficeth the body for nourishment: so it behooveth that the soule be truely & throughly made partaker of Christ, that by the power of him it may be quickened into a spirituall life. But in the meane time we confess, y there is no other eating, but of faith: as there can no other be imaginied. But this is the difference betweene my worde & theirs, that with them to eare is only to beleeue: but I say \( y \) the flesh of Christ is eareen with beleeting, because by faith he is made ours, and I say that eareing is the fruite and effect of faith. Or, if you wil haue it plainer, with them eareing is faith; and I thinke it rather to followe of faith. In wordes verily the difference is but small: but in the thing it selfe, not small. For though the Apostle teacheth that Christ dwelleth in our heares by faith: yet no man will expounde this dwelling to be faith: but all men doe perceiue that there is expressed a singular effect of faith, for that by it the faithful doe obteine to haue Christ dwelling in them. After this maner, the Lorde meant, in calling himselfe the bread of life, not onely to teach that in the faith of his death and resurrection, salvation is reposde for vs, but also that by true partaking of himselfe it is brought to passe, that his life paseth into vs, and bcommeth ours: like as bread, when it is taken for focde, ministreth liuclinessse to the body.

6 Neither did Augustine, whome they bring in for their patrone, in anye other other meaning write that we eate by believing, than to thewe that this eating is of faith, not of the mouth. Which I also denie not; but yet therewithall I add, that we do by faith embrace Christ, not appearing a faire of, but making himselfe one with vs, that he may be our head, and we his members. Yet do not I utterly disallow that manner of speaking; but onely I denie it to be a full declaration, if they meane to define what it is to eate the flesh of Christe. Otherwise I see that Quintus hath oft yfed this forme of speche: as when he sayeth in the third booke of Christian doctrine, Verily ye eate the flesh of the Sonne of man: this is a figure teaching that wee must comminicate with the passion of the Lorde, and must sweetely and profitably lay vppe in remembrance that for vs his flesh was crucified and wounded. Againe when he sayeth that the three thousand men which were converted at Peters sermon, did drinke the bloude of Christ by believing, which they hadde shedde by cruel dealing. But in many other places he honorably setteth out that benefite of faith, that by it our soules are no less refreshed with the communing of the flesh of Christe, than our bodies are with the bread which they eate. And the same is it which in a certaine place Chrysostome writeth, that Christe deeth not onely by sayth, but also in deede make vs his body. For he meaneth not that we doe from any other where than from faith, obtaine such a benefite: but this onely he meaneth to exclude, that none when hee heareth faith to bee named, should conceive a naked imagination. As for them that wil haue the Supper to be onely a marke of outward profession, I do now passe them ouer: because I thinke I have sufficiently confuted their errore, when I entreated of sacramentes generally. Onely this thing let the readers marke, that when the cup is called the covenant in the bloude, there is a promise expresed that may be of force to confirm faith. Whereupon foloweth, that vnlesse we haue respect to God, and embrace that which he offreth, we do not rightly vs the holy Supper.

Moreover they also do not satisfie me, which acknowledging that we have some communion with Christ, when they mean to expresse it, do make vs partakers onely of the spirit, without making any mention of flesh and bloude. As though all those things were spoken of nothing, that his flesh is verily meate, that his bloude is verily drinke: that none hath life, but hee that eateth that flesh, and drinketh that bloude: and such other sayinges that belong to the same ende. Wherefore if it be certaine that the full communicacion of Christ proceedeth beyond their description, as it is to narrowly straine: I will now goe about to knit vp in fewe words, howe large it is and how farre it extendeth it selfe, before that I speake of the contrary fault of excess. For I shall have a longer disputation with the excessive teacheers, which, when according to their owne grosseness they frame a maner of eating and drinking ful of absurditie, doe also transfigure Christ stripped out of his flesh into a fantasie: if yet a man may with any words comprehend so great a mysterie, which I see that I can not sufficiently compreheende with minde: and therefore I do willingly confesse it, that no man should measure the highnes thereof by the smale proportion of my childihnesse. But rather I exhort the readers, that they do not restrain the sense of
of their minds within these two narrow bounds: but endeavour to rise vp much higher, than they can by my guiding. For I my selfe, so oft as I speake of this thing, when I have troubled to say all, thinke that I have yet said but little in respect of the worthinesse thereof. And although the minde can do more in thinking than the tongue in expressing; yet with greatnesse of the thing, the minde also is surmounted and overwhelmed. Finally therefore nothing remaineth, but that I must breake forth into admiration of my mysterie, which neither the minde can suffice to thinke of, nor the tongue to declare. Yet after such manner as I can, I will set forth the summe of my sentence: which as I nothing doubt to be true, so I trust that it will not be disallowed of godly heartes.

8 First of all, we are taught out of the scripture, that Christ was from the beginning that life bringing worde of the Father, the fountain and original of life, from whence all things ever receiv'd their having of life. Wherefore John sometime calleth him the worde of life, and sometime writeth that life was in him: meaning that he even then flowing into all creatures, powerd into them the power of breathing & living. Yet the same John addeth afterward, that the life was then & not till then openly shewed, where the Sonne of God taking upon him our flesh, gave himselfe to be seen with eyes and felt with hands. For though he did before also spread abroad his power into the creatures: yet because man, being by sinne estranged from God, having lost the communion of life, fawe on earth fide death hanging over him: that he might recover hope of immortalitie, it behooved that he should be communed into the communion of that word. For howe small a confidence maiest thou counciue thereof, if thou hearest the word of God in deed, from which thou art most farre remoued, containing in it selfe the fulness of life, but in thy selfe and rounde about thee nothing offerest it selfe, and is present before thine eyes but death? But since that fountain of life began not to dwell in our flesh, nowe it lieth not a farre off hidden from vs, but presently delivereth it selfe to be partaken of vs. Yea and it maketh the very flesh, wherein it resteth, to bee of power to bring life to vs, that by partaking thereof wee may be fedde to immortalitie. I am (faith hee) the bread of life, y am come down from heaven. And the bread which I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world. In which wordes he teacheth not onely that he is life, in respect that he is the eternall worde of GOD which came downe to vs from heaven, but that in coming downe he powerd the same power into the flesh whiche he did put on, that from thence the communicatig of life might flowe forth vs. Hereupon also these things nowe follow, that his flesh is verily meat, and his blood is verily drinke, with which sustenances the faithfull are fostered into eternall life. Herein therefore consisteth singular comfort to the godly, y nowe they finde life in their owne flesh. For so they do not onely with chiefe passage attenie vnto it, but have it of it selfe laid abroad for them & offering it selfe vnto them. Oney let them hold open the bosome of their heart y they may embrace it being present, and they shall obtaine it.

9. But although the flesh of Christ haue not to great power of it selfe, that it can giue life to vs, which both in the owne first estate of it was sub-
Cap. 17. Of the outward meanes of it selfe an unwasteful fountain from whence life floweth, both that which must be necessary to be taken thereof, and have fellowship with it.

John 5:19.

... sect to mortality, and now being endued with immortality, liueth not by itself; yet it is rightfully called life-bringing, which is filled with fulnesse of life to powre it into vs, in which meaninge I do with Cyril expounde that saying of Christ: as the father hath life in himself, so hee hath also given to the sonne to have life in himselfe. For there he properly speaketh of his gifts, not which he from the beginning possessed with the father, but with which he was garnished in the same flesh in which he appeared. Therefore hee theweth that in his manhood also dwelleth the fulnesse of life, that whatsoever partakest of his flesh and blode, may therewithall also enjoy the partaking of life. Of what sort that is, we may declare by a familiar example. For as ouer of a fountain water is sometime drunke, sometime is drawne, sometime by forrowes is conected to the watering of groundes, which yet of it selfe doeth not overflow into so many ves, but from the very spring it falleth which with everlastings flowing yeeldeth and ministreth vnto it from time to time newe abundance: so the flesh of Christ is like a riche and unwasteful fountain whiche powreth into vs the life springing from the Godhead into itselfe. Nowe who feeth not that the communion of the flesh and blode of Christ is necessarie to all that aspire to heavenly life? Hereunto tendeth that saying of the Apostle, that the Church is the body of Christ and the fulfilling of it: and that he is the head out of which the whole body coupled and knit together by joynes maketh encrease of the body: that our bodies are the members of Christ. All which thinges we understand to be impossible to be brought to passe, but that hee must wholly cleave to vs in spirit and body. But that most neere fellowship whereby we are coupled with his flesh, hee hath yet set out with a more glorious title, when he said that we are members of his body, and are of his bones and of his flesh. At the last, to declare it to be a matter greater than all words, he concludeth his saying with an exclamation, This is (faith hee) a great secret. Therefore it should be a point of extreme madnesse to acknowledge no communion of the faithfull when the flesh and blode of the Lorde, which the Apostle declareth to bee so great, that he had rather wonder at it than express it.

Ephe. 5:30.

T he body & blode of Christ truely grown vs, & not bare, and naked of vs, thereof in this sacrament.

Let the summe bee, that our soules are so fedde with the flesh and blode of Christ, as brende and wine do maintain, and sustaine the bodily life. For otherwise the proportionall relation of the signe should not agree, vnlesse soules did finde their food in Christ. Which can not be done, vnlesse Christ doe truely growe into one with vs, and refresh vs with the eating of his flesh and drinking of his bloud. But although it seeme incredible, that in so great distance of places the flesh of Christ reacheth to vs, that it may bee meat to vs: let vs remember howe much the secret power of the spirtuall wondrous ABove all our senses, and howe foolishly it is to go about to measure his vnmeasurable bleness by our measure. That therefore which our minde comprehendeth not, let our faith conceive, that the spirit truly kniteth in one those things that are feuered in places. Nowe that same holy communicating of his body and blode, whereby Christ powreth his life into vs, even as if hee pierced it into our bones and marowes, hee in the supper
To Salutation. Lib. 4. 458

Supper also testifieth and sealeth. and that not without setting before us a vain or voided signe, but bringing forth there the effectual working of his spirit whereby he fulfiileth that which he promiseth. And verily he there offereth & delivereth the thing signified to all them that sit at that spiritual banquet: although be received with fruit of the faithful only, which receive so great bountifulness with true faith and thankfulness of mine. After which manner the Apostle saith, that the bread which we break is the communion of the body of Christ: and that the cuppe which we hallowe with the worde and prayers to that purpose, is the communion of his blood. Neither is there any cause why any man should object, that it is a figurative speech, by which the name of the thing signified is given to the signe. I grant verily that the breaking of the bread is a signe, not the thing it selfe. But this being admitted, yet we shall rightly gather of the deliverance of the signe, that the thing it selfe is delivered. For vnlesse a man will call God a deceivers, he can never be so bolde to saye that he feteth before us an emptie signe. Therefore it by the breaking of bread the Lord doeth truely represent the partaking of his body, it ought to be out of doubt that he truly performeth & delivereth it. And this rule is always to be holden of the godly, that so oft as they see the signes ordained of the Lord, they certainly thinke and perswade themselves that the true of the thing signified is there present. For to what purpose should the Lord deliver to thee into thy hand the signe of his body, but to assure thee of the true partaking of it? If it be truely that a visible signe is given unto us, to seal the gift of an invisible thing: when we receive the signe of the body, let vs no lesse certainly beleue that the body it selfe also is given us.

11. I say therefore (which both hath bin alway receiued in the Church, & all they teach at this day that thinke right) that the holy mysterie of the Supper consisteth of two things: that is to say of the bodily signes, which being set before our eyes do represent unto vs invisible things according to the capacite of our weakesesse, and of spirituall truth, which is by those signes both figured and delivered. Of what sort that is, when I meant to shewe it familiarly, I was to set these three things: the signification, the matter which hangeth of the signification, the virtue, or effect which foloweth of both. The signification consisteth in the promises, which are after a certaine manner wrapped together with the signe. The matter of substance I call Christ with his death & resurrection. By effect I understand the redemption, righteousness, sanctification, and eternall life, and whatsoever other benefites Christ bringeth vs. Now although all these things haue respect to faith: yet I leave no place to this caulation: as though when I say that Christ is received by faith, I would have him conceived with understanding only & imagination. For the promises offer him, nor that we should stick fast in the sight alone, and in bare knowledge: but that we should enjoy the true communicating of him, And truely I see not how any man may have confidence that he hath redemption and righteousness in the crosse of Christ, & life in his death. but principally standing upon the true communion of Christ himselfe. For those good things should not come to us, vnlesse Christ first made himselfe ours. I say therefore, that in the mystery of the Supper, by the signes Christ himselfe by faith, even his body and blood truly pataicipated, in this sacrament.

signes of bread and wine Christ is truely delivered to vs, yea and his body & bloud, in which he hath fulfilled all obedience for purchasing of righteousness to vs: namely that first we should grow together into one body with him: and then being made partakers of his substance, we may also feele his power in the communicating of all his good things.

12 Now I come down to the excesse mixtures, which superstition hath brought in. For herein Satan hath played with maruellous astute, that withdrawing the minde of men from heauen, he might fill them with peruerse error, as though Christ were fastened to the element of bread. And first we must not dreame such a presence of Christ in the sacrament, as the craftesmen of the court of Rome have saied: as though the body of Christ were made present with presence of place, to be handled with hands, to bee broossed with teeth, and swallowed with mouth. For this forme of recantation Pope Nicholas endited to Berengarius, to be a witnesses of his repentance: namely with words so fatifie monstruous, that the author of the grosse crieth out: there is danger, if the readers do not wisely take heed to themselves, lest they should sucke out of them an herefor worse then was that of Berengarius. In the seconde distinction, in the chapter beginning thus, Ego Berengarius, but Peter Lombarde, although he tranuial much in excusing the absurditie, yet more inclineth to the contrari sentence. For as we nothing doubt that it hath limits according to the perpetuall nature of the bodie of men: & is holden in heauen, into which it was once received, untill he returne to judgement: to draw it backe vnnder these corruptible elements or to imagine it present euery where, wee account it to be vitall vnlawfull. Neither verily is it so needful to this that we may enjoy the partaking of it: forasmuch as the Lord giveth vs this benefit by his Spirit that we be made one with him in body, Spirit, and soule. The bond therefore of this conioyning is the spirit of Christ, by the knitting whereof we be coupled together: & as it were a certaine conduit, by which whatsoever Christ himselfe both is and hath, is conveyed to vs. For if we behold the Sunne shining forth with his beames vp on the earth after a certain manner to cast forth his substance vn to it to engender, nourish, and quicken the fruities thereof: why should the extending of beames of the spirit of Christ be inferior to convey the communion of his flesh and bloud into vs? Wherefore the Scripture, when it speake of our partaking with Christ, refereth by whole force thereof to the Spirit. Yet in stead of many, one place shalbe sufficient. For Paul in the eights chapter to the Romanes, saith that Christ dwelleth in vs none other wise than by his spirit: whereby yet he taketh not away that communion of his flesh and bloud of which we nowe speake, but teacheth that the Spirit alone worketh that we possesse whole Christ and have him dwelling in vs.

13 The schoolemen thought more shamefully which were withheld with horror of so barbarous vnGodlynesse. Yet they also themselves do nothing but mocke with fustler deceites. They graunt that Christ is not contained there by way of circumscription nor after a bodily manner: but afterward they invent a way, which neither themselves do understand, nor they can declare to other: yet it is such as faileth to this point that Christe must be sought in the forme of breade as they call it. For what is it? When they say that the substance of bread is turned into Christ, do they not fasten him to the whitenes which they there leue? But (say they) he is so contained in the Sacrament, that he abideth in heaven; and we determine no other presence but of habitude. But whatsoever wordes they bring in to clooke it with a deceitfull colour, this is the ende of all, that that is by consecration made Christ, which before was bread: that from thenceforth Christ lieth hid under that colour of bread. Which also they are not ashamed in plaine words to express. For these be the wordes of Lombarde: that the body of Christ, which in it selfe is visible, when the consecration is ended, lieth hidden and is covered under the forme of bread. So the forme of that bread is nothing else but a visour, that taketh away the sight of the flesh fro the eyes. Neither neede we many conceitures, to finde what figures they minded to lay with these wordes, sith the thing itselfe plaine lyke speaketh it. For it is to be seene with howe great superstition in certaine ages past, not onely the common sort of men, but also the verie cheefe of them have benec holden, and at this day be holde in popish Churches. For having little care of true faith (by which alone we both come into the fellowship of Christ, and doe cleave together with him) so that they have a carnal preface of him, which they have framed beside the wordes, they thinke that they have him present enough. Therefore in a summe, we see that this hath bene gotten by this wittie iutilely that bread was taken for God.

14 From hence proceeded the same faine transubstantiation, for which at this day they figh more earnestly than for all the other articles of their faith. For the first builders of that local presence could not unwinde themselves from this doubt howe the bodie of Christ should be mingled with the substance of breade, but that by and by manie absurdities did thrust them selves in place. Therefore they were driven of necessitie to flee to this invention, that there is made a turning of breade into the body: not that the body is properly made to God, but because Christ of he might hide himselfe under the forme, bringeth the substance to nothing. But it is maruellous, that they fell to so great ignorance, yea fenfelesse dullnesse, that not onely scripture but also the consent of olde Church fighting against it, they brought abroad that monster. I grant indeede that some of olde writers sometime vsed the name of turning: not for that they would destroy the substance in outward signes, but that they might teach that the bread dedicate to mytery different farre from common bread and is nowe other. But eeh where they all plainly declare, that the holy supper consisteth of two partes, an earthly part, and a heavenly: and the earthly part they do without controversie expound to be bread and wine. Truely whatsoever they babbie, it is plain that in confirming of this doctrine they want the defence of antiquitie, which they oftentimes presume to set against the evident word of God. For it is not so long age since it was inuented, it was verily unknownen not onely to those better ages, in which purer doctrine of religion yet flourished, but also even when that same purenesse was much defiled. There is none of the old writers doth not in expressse words confesse, the holy signes in the Supper are bread and wine; although, as we haue saide, they sometime for it out with divers tides:to aduance the dignitie of y mysterie. For whereas they say ñ in the confession is made a secret turning, that now it is another thing then bread and wine: I haue euene nowe given warning ñ they do not thereby meane ñ the things themselves, are brought to nought, but that they are now to be otherwise esteemed than common meates, which are appointed only to feede the belly: forasmuch as in them is deliuered rowvs the spiritual meate and drinke of the soule. This we also dente not. If (say these men,) there be a turning, it must needs be that there is of one thing made another thing. If they meane that there is something made which before was not, I agree with them. If they will drawe it to that their owne imagination, let them anfwere me what chage they thinke to be made in baptisme. For herein the fathers also do determine a maruellous turning, where they say that of a corruptible element is made a spiritual washing of ñ soule, yet none of them denieth that water remaineth. But (say they,) there is no such thing in baptisme, as ñ in the Supper. This is my body. As though the question were of those wordes, which have a meaning plaine enough: and not rather of that worde of turning, which ought to signifie no more in the Supper then in baptisme. Therefore farewell they with these faires of syllables, whereby they doe nothing else but bewray their owne hungrie in lust. For otherwise the signification would not agree together vnlesse the truth which is there figured, had a lively image in outward signe. Christes will was by the outward signe to testifie that his flesh is meat. If he did fet before vs onely an empty imaginative forme of bread not true bread, where were the correlatiun or similitude which should lead vs from the visible thing to the invisible? For, that all things may agree together, the signification shall extende no further, but that we be fedde with the forme of the flesh of Christ. As, if in baptisme the forme of water sholde deceive our eyes, it should not bee to vs a certaine pledge of our washing: yea by that deceitfull shewe there should bee given vs an occasion of wauering. Therefore the nature of the sacrament is overthrowen, vnles in the manner of signifying ñ earthly signe, aunswere to ñ heavenly thing. And therefore we loose the teeth of this mysterie, vnlesse true bread represent to vs the true body of Christ. I repeate it againe: Sith ñ Supper is nothing else, than a visible testifying of that promisse which is in ñ sixt: Chapter of John, namely that Christ is the bread of life, which came downe from heauen: there must bee visible bread vsed for a meane whereby ñ same spiritual bread may be figured: vnles we will that we loose all the fruit which in this behalfe God tenderly granteth to sustaine our weaknesses. Now by what reaon shoulde Paul gather, that al we are one body and one bread, which doe together partake of one bread, if there remained onely an imaginative forme and not rather a naturall truth of bread?

But they could never have beene so fowly beguiled with the deceits of Satan, but because they were already bewitched with this error, that the body of Christ inclosed vnnder bread was by the bodily mouth set downe into the belly. Tho the cause of so brutish imagination was, that confession signified as much among them as a magicall enchantment. But this principle was drawn to them, that bread is a sacrament to none but to men, to whom the worde is directed: like as ñ water of baptisme is not changed in it selfe, but soone as the promise is adiouned, it beginneth to be that tos which it before was not. This shall better appeare by example of a like Sacrament. The water springing out of the rocke in the desert was to the fathers a token & signe of the same thing, which the wine doth figure to vs in the Supper. For Paule reacheth that they drink the same spiritual drink. But it was a common watering for the beasts & cattell of the people. Whereas it is caklie gathered, that in earthlie elements, when they are applied to a spiritual vse, there is made no other turning but in respect of men, in so much as they are to them seals of the promises. Moreover, if Gods purpose is (as I often repeate) as it were by handome chariots to lift vs vp to himselfe, they do by their waywardnes wickedly disappoint the same, which do in decede call vs to Christ, but lurking invisible under bread. For it is not possible that the minde of men, vncombring itselfe from the immeasurablenesse of places, should attaine to Christ even above the heauen. That which nature denied them, they attempted to amend with a more hurtfull remedie: that abiding in earth, we should neede no heauenlie neerenes of Christ. Loe, this is the necessity that compelled them to transfigure the bodie of Christ. In Bernard's time, although a harder maner of speaking was grown in vs, yet transubstantiation was not then knowne. And in all ages before that, this similitude did file about in euery mans mouth, that ther is with bread & wine a spiritual thing joyned in this mysterie. Of the words they sunder, as they thinke, thelilie: but bringing nothing fit for this present cause. The rod of Moses (say they) beeing turned into a serpent, although it did get the name of a Serpent, yet keepeth still the old name, & is called a rod. So in their opinion it is as probable, that although the brede passe into a newe subsance, it may be abusively and yet not vnaptly called that which it appeareth to the cies. But what likelihoode or neerenesse find they betweene a cleare miracle, and their fainede illusion, of which no eye in earth is witnesse? The Magicians had mocked with deceites, so that the Aegyptians were persuaded, that they excelled in divine power to change creatures above the order of nature. Moses came forth, and driving away all their deceites, shewed that the inuincible power of God was on his side, because his own rod consumed at the rest. But forasmuch as that was a turning discernable with eyes, therefore as we have sayde, it pertaineth nothing to this present cause: and in a little time after, the rod visibly returned into his own form. Besides it is not knowne, whether that sudden turning was of substance or no. Also the aluding to the rods of the Magicians is to bee considered, which the Prophets therefore woulde not call Serpents, least hee should seeme to signifie a turning where none was: because those deceivers had done nothing but cast a myt before the eyes of the beholders. What likenes herewith have these formes of speeche, The bread which we breake, so oft as ye shall eate this bread, They communicated in breaking of brede, & such other? It is certaine that their eyes were onely deceived with the enchantment of the Magicians. As concerning Moses, the matter is more douteful, by whose hand it was no more hard for God to make of a rod a Serpent, & againe of a Serpent to make a rod, than to cloth Angels with fleshly bodies, and by and by after to vnclot them. If the nature of this mystery were were the same or like, there were some colour for their solution. Let this therefore remaine certaine, that it is not truly nor fitly promised vs that in the Supper the flesh of Christ is truly to vs for meate, vnlesse the true substance of the outward signe agree with it. And (as one error groweth of another) the place of Jeremie is to foolishly wretted to prooue transubstantiation, that it liketh me to rehearse it. The Prophet complaineth that wood is put in his bread; meaning that by the crucifiction of his enemies, his bread was infected with bitterness. As David with a like figure bewaileth that his meate was corrupted with gall, and his drinke with vineger. These men will have it that the body of Christ was by way of allegorie fastened to the crose. But some of the olde fathers thought so. As though we ought rather to pardon their ignorance, & to burie their shame, than to add shamelesnes to compell them yet still to fight like enemies with the naturall meaning of the Prophet.

16 Other, which see that the proportionall relation of the signe and the thing signified, can not be overthrown, but that the truth of the mystery must tall, do confess that the bread of the Supper is verily a substance of an earthly and corruptible element, and suffeth no change in it selfe, but hath vnder it selfe the body of Christ enclosed. If they did doe declare their meaning, that when the bread is deliuered in the mysterie, there is adjoinned the deliuering of the bodie, because the truth is vnseuerable from the signe: I would not much strive with them. But because they placing the body in the bread, doe faine to it a being every where contrary to the nature thereof, and in adding vnder the bread, they will have it lie there hidden: it is necessarie a little while to drawe such suttetliees out of their dennes. For my mind is not yet as of let purpose to go through with all this points: but only that I may lay the foundations of the disputacion which shall by and by followe in place fit for it. They will therefore have the body of Christ to be invisible & unmeasurable, that it may be hid vnder the bread: because they thinke they do not otherwise communicate with him than if he descend into the bread: but they comprehend not the maner of descending, whereby he liesth vpward to himselfe. They lay upon it all the colours that they can: but when they have laid all, it sufficiently appeareth, that they stay vp to the local presence of Christ. Whence commeth that euery because they can abide to conceuie no other partaking of the flesh & bloud, but which confesseth either of joyning & touching of place, or of some grosse enclosing.

17 And, that they may obstinately defend the error once rashly conceived, some of them sticke not to say, that the flesh of Christ had nouer any other measurings, but so farre & wide as heaven & earth is broad. Whereas he was borne a childe out of the wombe, whereas he grew, whereas he was spread abroad on the crose, whereas he was enclosed in the sepulchre, the same was done by a certain dispensation, that he might be borne & die, and perfoarme the other duties of man. Whereas after this resurrection he was seene in his wonted forme of body, whereas he was taken vp to heaven, whereas last of all also after his ascension he was seene of Stephen and Paul: it was done by the same dispensation, that it might appear to the sight of men, he was made a king in heaven. What is this else, but to raise vp Marcion.

For no man can doubt that the body of Christ was a fantastical thing, if he was of such state. Some slip away somewhat more futilely, with saying that this body which is given in the sacrament is glorious and immortal: and that therefore it is no absurdity, if it be contained in many places, if in no place, if with no form, under the Sacrament. But I ask what manner of body Christ gave to the disciples, the date before that he suffered: do not the words found that he gave the same mortal body, which was within a little after to be delivered? He had already before (say they) shewed his glory to be seen to three of the disciples. That is true indeed, but his will was by that brightness to give them a taste of immortality for an hour. In the mean time they shall not there finde a double body, but that one body which Christ did bear, garnished with newe glorious. But when he distributed his body at his first supper, the time was nowe at hand, when he being striken of God, and humbled should lie without glory as a leprous man: so farre is it off that he then would shew forth the glory of his resurrection. And how great a windowe is here opened to Marcioun, if the body of Christ was seen in one place mortal & base, and in another place was holden immortal & glorious? Howbeit, if their opinion take place, the same happeneth daily: because they are compelled to confess that the body of Christ being visible in it selfe, lieth hid inuifibly under the signe of bread. And yet they that vomit out such monstrous conclusions are so not ashamed of their owne shame, that they do unprouoked haughtily raile at vs, because we do not subscire to them.

18 Now if they list to faile the body & blood of the Lord to bread & wine: the one shall of necessitie be plucked in sunder from the other. For as the bread is delivered severally from the cup, so the body vnited to the bread must needs be divided from the blood enclosed in the cup. For when they affirm that the body is in the bread & the blood in the cup: and the bread & wine are by spaces of place distant one from the other: they can by no shift escape, but that the body must be seuered from the bloud. But whereas they are wont to allege, that by accompanying (as they faine) in the body is the bloud, & likewise in the bloud is the body, yt verily is too trifling: forasmuch as the signes in which they are enclosed are seuered. But if we bee lifted vp with our eyes & minds to heauen, yt we seeke Christ there in the glory of his kingdom: as the signes do allure vs to him whole: seuer the signe of bread, we shall be fed with his body, under the signe of wine we shall seuerally drinke his bloud, yt at length we may enjoy him whole. For although he hath taken away his flesh from vs, & in his body is ascended vp into heauen, yet he sitteth at the right hand of the father, that is to say he reigneth in the power, and majestie, & glorie of the father. This kingdom is neither bounded with any spaces of place, nor compassed about with any measure, but the Christ may shew forth his might whereas it pleaseth him both in heauen & in earth: but that he may shew himselfe present with power & strength: but that he may alway be at hande with the that be his, breathing his life into the, may live in them, strengthen them, quicken them, preserve them safe, even as if he were present in body: finally, but that he may feede them with his owne body, the communion whereof he doeth by the power of his spirit power to them. After this manner the body and bloud of Christ is delivered to vs in the Sacrament.

19 But we must appoint such a presence of Christ in the supper, as may neither fasten him to the element of bread, nor that he be vp in the bread, nor by any meane compass him in, (for it is plain that all these things abate his heauenly glory) finally such as may rather take from him his owne measure, nor divirly draw him in many places at once, nor sain to him such an unmeasurable greatness as is spread abroad throughout heauen and earth, for these things are plainely against the truth of the nature of mankind. Let vs (lay) never suffer these two exceptions to be take away from vs. The one, that nothing be abated from the glorie of Christ, which is done, when he is brought vnder the corruptible elements of this world, or is bound to any earthly creatures. The other, that nothing be by faire applie to his body, that agree not with the nature of man: which is done, wche it is either laid to be infinite, or is set in many places at once. But these absurdities being taken away, I willingly receive whatsoever may auaile to expresse the true and substantiall communicating of the bodie and bloud of the Lord, which communicating is delivered to the faithfull vnder the holy signes of the supper: and so that they may be thought not to receive it by imagination only or understanding of minde, but to enjoy it indeede to the foule of eternall life. Why this sentence is so hateful to the world, and all defence taken away from it by the vniust judgementes of many, there is no cause at all, but for that the diuel hath with horrible bewitching madded their mindes. Truely that which we teach, doth in all points very well agree with the Scriptures, it containeth neither any absurdities, nor darkenes, nor doubtfulnesse: it is not against true godlinesse and sound edification: finally, it hath nothing in it, that may offend, sauing that in certaine ages past, whethers ignorance and barbarousnesse of Sophisters reigned in the Church, so clear light and open truth hath beene unworthily oppresed. Yet because Satan at this day also travaileth by troublesome spirits to spoile it with all the flaunders and reproches that he can, and bendeth himselfe to no other thing with greater endeauour: it is profitable the more diligently to defende and rescue it.

20 Now before that we goe any further, we must entreate of the selfe institution of Christ: specially because this is the most glorious obiectio that our aduersaries have, that we depart from the wordes of Christ. Therefore, that we may be dischargd of the false causse of malice wherewith they burden vs, our firste beginning shall be at the exposition of the words. Three Evangelistes and Paul rehearse, that Christ tooke bread: when he had given thanks he brake it, gave it to his discipiles and saide, Take,eate, this is my bodie which is deliverd, or broken for you. Of the cuppe Mathew and Marke say thus: This cuppe is the bloud of the newe Testament, which shall be shed for many unto forgivennesse of sinnes. But Paul and Luke say thus: This cuppe is the newe testament in my bloud. The patrones of transubstantiation will hauie by the pronounc (this) the forme of bread to be signifiied, because the consecration is made in the whole content of the sentence, and there is no substance that can be shewed. But if they bee holden with with religious care of the wordes, because Christ testified, that that which he reached into the disciples handes, was his body: truely this their deuise, that that which was bread is nowe the bodie, is most farre from the proper meaning of them. That which Christ rooke into his handes and gave the Apostles, he affirmeth to be his body: but the rooke bread: who therefore can not understand that bread is yet the word? and therefore there is no greater absurditie, than to remoue that to the forme, which is spok of the bread. Other, when they expounde this word(is) for to be transubstantiate, doe flee to a more enforced and violently wrested gloze. Therefore there is no cause why they shoulde pretende that they be moued with reverence of words. For this was vnheard of among al nations and languages, that the word(is) should be taken in this sense, namely for to be turned into another thing. As for them that leafe bread in the supper, and affirm that there is the body of Christ, they much differ among themselues. They which speake more modestly, although they precisely exact the letter. This is my bodie, yer afterward sweate from their preciouse, and saye that it is as much in effect as that the body of Christ is with bread, in bread, and under bread. Of the matter it selfe which they affirme, we haue alreadie touched somewhat, and we shall by and by have occasion yet to speake more. Now I dispute onely of the words, by which they say they are restraine in that they cannot admit bread to be called the bodie, because it is a signe of the bodie. But if they shunne all figures, why do they leape away from the plaine shewing of Christ, to their owne maners of speaking farre differing from it? For there is great difference betweene this that bread is the bodie, and this that the bodie is with bread. But because they sawe it to be impossible, that this simple proposition might stande, that bread is the bodie: they have attempted to scape away by those figures of speache, as it were by crooked turninges. Some more bolde sticke not to affirme that even in proper speaking, bread is the bodie, and by this mean they truely proue themselves to be literal men, if it be objected, that therefore the bread is Christ, and is God: this verily they will deny, because it is not exprested in the wordes of Christ. But they shall nothing proue by denying it forasmuch as all doe agree that whole Christ is offered vs in the supper. But it is an intolerable blasphemy, that it be without figure spok of of a fraile and corruptible element, that it is Christ. Nowe I aske of them, whether these two propositions bee both of one effect, Christ is the sonne of God, and bread is the body of Christ. If they graunt that they are divers, (which we will enforce them to graunt whether they will or no) then let them answer why the difference? I thinke they will bring none other but that the breade is after the sacramental manner called the body, Whereupon followeth, that Chrifts words are not subject to the common rule, nor ought to be tried by Grammar. Also I aske of all the precise and stiffe require of the letter, where Luke and Paul doe call the Cup the Testament in the bloude, whether they doe not expresse the same thing which they did in the first part, where they call breade the bodie. Truely the same religion was in the one part of the mysterie that was in the other: and because theuddesse is darke, longer speach doth better open the meaning. So oft therefore as they shall affirme...

by one word, that the bread is the body, I will out of moe wordes bring a fit exposition, that it is the Testament in the body. For why? Shall we need to seke a more faithful or surer expositor than Paul and Luke? Neither yet do I tende henceto, to diminish any thing of that communicatting of the bodie of Christ which I haue confessed: onely my purpose is to confute that foolishe and cavardelic, whereby they doe so hartefullie brawle about wordes. I understand, by the authoritie of Paul and Luke, that the bread is the body of Christ, because it is the covenent in the body. If they fight against this, they haue warre not with me, but with the spirite of God. Howsoever they cry out that they be touched with reverence of the wordes of Christ, wherein they doe not figuratiuely understand those things that are plainly spoken: yet this is not a pretence rightfull enough, why they should to refuse all the reasons which we object to the contrarie. In the mean time, as I haue alreadie giuen warning, it is convenient to learne, what manner of thing this is. The testament in the body and bloud of Christ: because the covenent established with the sacrifice of death, shoulde otherwise not profit vs, vnlesse there were adioyned that secret communicating whereby we growe into one with Christ.

21 It remaineth therefore that for the affinitie which the things signified haue with their signes, we confesse that the selfe name of the thing was giuen to the signe: figuratiuely in deed, but not without a most fit proportionall agreement. I leaue allegories and parables, lest any man should quarrell that I seke startingholes, and wander out of the present purpose. I say that this is a speech by figure of transnomination which is commonly vued in the Scripture, when mysteries are entreate of. For neither can you other wise understand that which is said: that circumcision is a covenent: that the lambe is the paschouer: that the Sacrifices of the law are expiatioues: finally that the rocke, out of which water flowed in the desert, was Christ: vnlesse you take it to be spoke by way of transferring of names. Neither are names transferred onely from the higher name to the lower: but contrariwise the name of the visible signe is also giuen to the thing signified: as when it is said that God appeared to Moses in the bush: when the arke of covenent is called God, and the face of God: & the doxe is called the holy Ghost. For though the signe differ in substance from the thing signified: because this is spirituall and heavenly, & that is corporall and visible: yet because it dooth not only figure the thing which it is holily appointed to represent, as a naked and emptie token, but doth also truly deliver it in deed: why may not the name of the thing rightly accorde with it? If signes devised by men, which are rather images of things absent, than markes of things present, which selue absent things, they doe often times deceitfully shadowe, are yet sometime garnished with the titles of the thinges: then those things that are ordained of God, doe by much greater reason borrowe the name of those things, of which they alway both beare a sure and not deceitfull signification, and haue the trueth adioyned with them. There is therefore so great likenesse and neerenes of the one to the other, that it is easie to draw their names to & fro. Therefore let our aduersaries cease to heap vs vnsavourie scoffings against vs, in calling vs Tropists, because we expound ye sacrametal maner.
maner of speaking after the common use of the Scripture. For whereas the Sacraments agree together in many things: in this transferring of names, they have all a certaine commonitie together. As therefore the Apostle teacheth, the stone out of which spiritual drinke did spring to Israelites, was Christ, because it was a visible signe, and which that spiritual drinke was truly in deed but not discernably to the eye perceived: so bread is at this day called the body of Christ, forasmuch as it is a signe whereby the Lord offereth to vs the true eating of his body. Neither did Augustine or other wise think or speake least any man should despise this as a new invention. If (faith he) the sacraments had not a certaine likeness of those things whereof they are sacramentes, they should not be sacramentes at all. And of this likeness oftentimes they take the names of the things themselves. As therefore after a certaine maner the sacrament of the body of Christ, is the bodie of Christ: the sacrament of the bloud of Christ: is the bloud of Christ: so the Sacrament of faith is faith. There be in him many like places, which it were superfluous to heap together, with that one suffiseth: sauing that the readers must be warned that the holy man teacheth the same thing in the epistle to Enodius, but it is a trifling shift to say, that where Augustine teacheth, that when transferring is often and commonly use in mysteries, he maketh no mention of the Supper: because if this shift were receiued, we might not reason from the generality to the specialitie, neither were this a good argument: Euerie feeling creature hath power of moving, therefore an ox & a horse have power of moving. Howebeit long disputacion hereof is in another place ended by the words of the same holy man, where he saith, that Christ stunk not to call it his body, when he gave the signe of his body. Against Adamitus, the Manichean, in the twelf Chapter, And in another place, vpon the thirde Psalme. MaruMFous (faith he) is the patience of Christ, that he receiued Jedaus to the banker, wherein he committed and deliered to his disciples the figure of his bodie and bloud.

22. But if some precise man, being blind at all the rest, do stand only upon this worde (this is) as though it seuered this mysterie from another, the solution is case. They say that the vehement of the substantie verbe (is) so great that it admitteth no figure. Which if wee grant to them: even in the words of Paul is read the substantie verbe, where he calleth bread the communicatie of the bodie of Christ. But the communicatie is an other thing then the bodie it selfe. Yea commonly where Sacramentes are entreated of, we finde the same wordes vied. As: This shall bee to you a couenant: with me. This Lambe shall bee to you a passouer. To rehaire no more: when Paul faith that the rocke was Christes, why doe they take the substantie verbe in that place to be of leffe vehement than in the spech of Christ? Let them also answer, where John faith, the holy Ghost was yet not yet, because Iesus was not yet glorified, of what force the substantie verbe is in that place. For if they abide fastened to their rule, the eternall essence of the holy Ghoste shall bee destroyed, as though it rooke beginning at the ascension of Christ. Finally let them answeare, what meaneth that saying of Paul, that Baptisme is the washing of regeneration and renuuing, which it is eviuent to bee unprofitable to many. But nothing is stronger to
to confute them, than that sayings of Paul, y the church is Christ. For bringing a similitude of the body of man, he addeth, So is Christ: in which place he understandeth the only begotten of God, not in himselfe, but in his members. Hereby I think I have obtained, that to sound witted and uncorrupted men the slaunderers of our enemies, are lothsome, when they spread abroad, that we withdrawe credite from the words of Christ: which we do no leffe obediencely embrace than they, & do weigh them with more godlie reuerence. Ye their negligent carelesnes sheweth that they do not greatly care what Christ meant, so y it give them a buckler to defend their obstina-ces: like as our earnest searching out, to be a witnes how much we esteem the authoritie of Christ. They odiously spread abroad, that natural sense of man witholdeth vs & believeth that which Christ hath uttered with his owne holy mouth: but how maliciously they burden vs with this slander, I have a great part already made plaine, and hereafter it shall more clearely appear. Therefore nothing witholdeth vs from believing Christ whose speake, nor from obeying so soone as he doth but with becke will this or that. Only this is the question, whether it be unlawfull to enquire of the natural meaning.

23. The noble masters, that they may seeme wel lettered, do forbid men to depart be it never so little from the letter. But I on the other side, when the scripture nameth God a warlike man, because I see that without figurative translation it is too rough a maner of speaking, do not doubt that it is a comparison taken from men. And truely upon none other present in the olde time the anthropomorphis troubled the true teaching fathers, but that cat-catching fast hold of these sayinges, the cies of God doe see., It went vp to his cares, His hand stretched out, The earth his footstole, they cryed out that God had his body taken from him, which the Scripture assigneth unto him. If this lawe be receiv'd, outrageous barbarous he shall ouerwhelme the whole light of faith. For what monsters of absurdities may not phrentique men, picke out, if it be graunted them to alledge euery small title to stablish their opinions: That which they object, that it is not likely, that when Christ prepared for his Apostles a singular comfort in adversities, he did then speak in a riddle or dastly, maketh of our side. For if it had not come in the minde of the Apostles, that bread was figuratively called the body, because it was the signe of the body, they had without doubt been troubled with some struous a thing. Almost at the fame moment John reporteth, that they did sticke in perplexitie at euery of the least difficulties. They which strive among themselves, how Christ will go to the father: and doe mone question, how he will goe out of the world: they which understande nothing of those things that are spoken concerning the heavenly father, till they see him: how would they have ben so easy to beleue that which all reason refuseth that Christ stretched at the berde in their sight, and is enclosed invisibill vn der bread? Whereas therefore they in eating the bread without doubting, re-stituted their content, whereby appeareth that they tooke Christs words in the same sense, that wee doe, because they remembered, that which ought not to seeme strange in mysteries, that the name of the thing signified is transferred to the signe. Therefore it was to the disciples, as it is to vs, a certaine and clear
clear comfort, entangled with no riddle. Neither is there any other cause why some should depart from our exposition, but because the inacuteness of the divine hath blinded them, namely that they should find darkness to themselves, where the exposition of an apt figure offereth itself. Moreover if we precisely stand upon the words, Christ should wrongfully have spoken in one place severally an other thing concerning bread than he speaketh of the cup. He calleth the bread his body, he calleth the wine his blood; either that be a confused vaine repetition, or it shall bee such a partition as shall divide the body from the blood. Yea it shall as truly be saide of the cup, This is my body, as of the bread it selfe, and it may likewise interchangeably be saide, that the bread is the blood. If they answer that we must consider to what ende or use the signes were ordained: I grant it in deed: but in the mean time they shall not unwind themselves, but that their error must draw this absurdity with it, that the bread is the blood, and the wine is the body. Nowe I wot that this meaneth, when they grant the bread and the body to be diverse things, yet to affirm that the one is spoken of the other properly & without any figure: as if a man should say that a garment is indeede a thing differing from a man, & yet that it is properly called a man. In the mean time as though their victorie consisted in obstinacie and railing, they say that Christ is accused of lying, if an exposition be sought of the words. Nowe it shall be case for vs to shew to the readers how vnjustly wrong these catchers of syllables do to vs, when they silly simple with this opinion: we withdraw credit from the words of Christ, which we have proued to be furiously perverted and confounded by them, but to be faithfully and rightly expounded by vs.

24. But the slander of this lie cannot be utterly purged, till another crime be wiped away. For they spread abroad, we are so addicted to natural reafon, that we give no more to the power of God, than the order of nature sufficeth and common sense teacheth. From so malicious flanders I appeal to the verie doctrine it selfe which I have declared: which doeth clearely enough shew, I do not measure this mystery by the proportion of man's reason, nor do make it subject to the lawes of nature. I beseech you, have we learned out of natural philosophy, *Christ doth so from heauen feed us soules & bodies with his flesh, as our bodies are nourished with bread & wine: Whence commeth this power to flesh? it may give life? All men will say that it is not done naturally. It will no more please mans reason, the flesh of Christ reacheth to vs, that it may be food unto vs. Finally whooeuer hath tasted of our doctrine, shall be rauished into admiration of the surecte power of God. But these good men that be so zealous of it, forge to themselves a miracle, which being taken away, God himself vanisheth with his power. I desire to have my readers once againe warned, they diligently wry what our doctrine bringeth, whether it hang upon common sense, or with the winges of faith, surmounting the world, climbeth vp beyond it into the heaues. We say that Christ as well with the outward sign as with his spirit, descendeth to vs, that he may truly quicken our soules with the substance of his flesh and of his blood. In these fewe wordes he that perceueth not to bee contained many miracles, is more than senselesse: for as much as there is nothing more beside nature

They that make Christ to lurke invisible under bread, are neither thereby led by the words of Christ, nor helped therein by God's straitness.
Phil. 2. 7

The outward meanes, that soules should borowe spiritual and heavenly life, of the fleth which tooke her beginning of the earth, & which was subject to death. Nothing is more incredible, than that thinges distant and sunder by the whole space of heauen and earth, should in so great distance of places not onely be conioyned, but also united, that soules may receive food of the fleth of Christ. Therefore let wayward men cease to procure hatred to vs, by a filthy slander, as though we did enviously restrain any thing of the immeasurable power of God. For they do either too foolishly err, or too maliciously lie. For it is not heere in question what God could, but what he would. We affirme, to be done which pleased him. But it pleased him, that Christ should be made like to his brethren in all things, except sinne. What maner of thing is our fleth? Is it not such as confesseth of the certain measure of it, as is contained in place, as is touched, as is scene? And why (say they) may not God make, that one selfe same fleth may occupy many and divers places, may be contained in one place, may be without measure and former? Thou maddest man, why requirest thou of the power of God to make fleth at one selfe time to be & not to be fleth? Like as if thou shouldest instantly require, him to make at one selfe time the light to be both light and darkenesse. But he will eth light to be light, darknesse to be darknesse, fleth to be fleth.

He shall in deed when it pleaseth him, turne darkenesse into light, and light into darkenesse, but when thou requirest that light and darknesse may not differ, what dost thou else but pervert the order of the wildome of God? Therefore fleth must be fleth; and Spirit Spirit, euery thing in such lawe and condition as God hath created it. But such is the condition of fleth, that it must be in one yea and that a certaine place, and consist of her measure & of her forme. With this condition Christ tooke fleth upon him, to which (as Augustine witnesseth) he hath giuen instead incorruption and glory, but he hath not taken from it nature and truth.

They answere, that they have the word, whereby the will of God is made plaine: namely if it be granted them to banish out of the Church ye gift of expositio, which may bring light to the word, I grant ye have ye word: but such as in olde time the Anthropomorphites had, when they made God, having a body such as Marcion & the Manachese had, when they fained the body of Christ to be, either heavenly or fantastical. For they alledge, for testimonies. The first Adam was of the earth earthly, the seconde Adam is of heauen, heavenly. Againe, Christ alaced himselfe, taking upon him the forme of a seruantant, & was founde in likenesse as a man. But the grosse catechists think that there is no power of God, yeales with the monster forged in their brains, the whole order of nature be overthrowe: which is rather to limite God, when we couet with our fained inuocations to procure what he can doe. For out of what word have they taken ye the body of Christ is visible in heauen, but lurke invisible in earth under innumerable little pieces of bread? They wil say ye necesstic requireth this ye the body of Christ should bee giue in the supper, Verily because it pleased them to gather a filthy eating out of the words of Christ: they being caried away by their owne forciudgement, were driven to necesstic to come to this suttletic, which the whole scripture crieth out against. But ye any thing is by vs diminished of the power of godis.

To falsely by our doctrine the praise of it is very honorable, so our. But for as much as they always accuse us that we defraud God of his honour, when we refuse that which according to common sense is hard to be believed, although it have been promised by the mouth of Christ, I make againe the same answer, wherefore that I made even now, that in the mysteries of faith we do not aske counsel of common sense, but with quiet willingnesse to learn, and with the spirit of meekenesse, which James commendeth, we receive the doctrine come from heaven. But in that when they perniciously err, I denie not that we follow a profitable moderation. They hearing the wordes of Christ, This is my body, imagine a miracle most farre from his mind. But when out of this fained inuition arise tooke absurdities, because they have already with head-long haste put snares upon themselves, they plunge themselves into the bottomlesse depth of the almightinesse of God that by this meane they may quench the light of truth. Hereupon commeth that proude presiden, We will not knowe howe Christ lieth hid under the breade, holding ourselves contented with this saying of his, This is my body. But we, as we doe in the whole Scripture, doe with no lesse obedience than care, study to obtaine a sound understanding of this place: neither doe we with preposterous heate rashly and without choice catch holde of that which first thrilleth itselfe into our minde: but vsing diligent musing upon it, we embrace the meaning which the spirite of God ministreth: and standing thereupon we do so aloft despise whatsoever earthly wisdom is set against it. Yea we holde our minde captive that they may not be bold so much as with one little word to carp against it: and do humble them, that they may not dare to rise vp against it. Hereupon sprung vp the exposition of the wordes of Christ, which to be by the continuall vogue of the scripture common to all Sacraments, all they that haue ben thought but meanely exercised therein, do knowe. Neither doe we, after the example of the holy Virgin, thinke it lawfull for vs, Luk.1,34. in a hard matter to enquire how it may be done.

26 But because nothing shall more aviall to confirme the faith of the godly than wher they haue learned that the doctrine which we have taught is taken out of the wordes of God, and standeth upon the authoritie thereof, I will make this also evident with as great briefenesse as I can. The body of Christ, since the time that it rose againe, not Aristotle but the Holy Ghost receaveth to be limited, and that it is comprehended in heaven until the last day. Neither am I ignorant that they boldly mocke out those places that are allledged for this purpose. So oft as Christ faileth that he will depart, leaving the world, they anfwer that that departing is nothing els but a changing of mortall state. But after this manner, Christ should not set the Holy Ghost in this place to supple (as they call it) the want of his absence: forasmuch as he doeth not succeede into this place, nor Christ himselfe doth descende againe out of the heavenly glory to take vpon him the state of mortall life. Truely the coming of the Holy Ghost, and the ascension of Christ are thinges set as contrary, therefore it cannot be that Christ should according to the flesh dwell with vs after the same manner that hee sendeth his spirite. Moreover he in plaine wordes expresseth, that hee will not be alway with his disciples in the world. This saying also they thinke that they doe daily wipe away, as though Christ said that he will not alway be poor and miserable or subject to the necessities of this frail life. But the circumstance of the place crieth plainly to the contrary, because there is not inreated of pouerie and need, or of the miserable state of earthly life, but of worship and honour. The anointing pleased not the disciples, because they thought it to be a superfluous & unprofitable cost, and mere vnto riotous excess; therefore they had rather that the price thereof, which they thought to be ill wafted, had beene bestowed upon the poore. Christ answereth that he shall not alway be present that he may be worshipped with such honour. And none otherwise did Augustine expound it, whole wordes bee these which are nothing doubtfull. When Christ said, Ye shall not alway have me, he spake of the presence of his body. For according to his maieftie, according to his prouidence, according to his vnspakable and innuable grace, this was fulfilled which he said, behold, I am with you euen to the ending of the world. But according to the flesh which the word tooke vnto him, according to this that he was borne of the Virgin according to this he was taken of the Iews, that he was fastened to the tree, that he was taken downe from the crosse, that he was wrapped in linnen clothes, that he was laid in the grave, that he was manifestly shewed in the resurrection, this was fulfilled. Yee shall not alway have me with you. Why so? Because he was conversant according to the presence of his bodie fourtie dayes with his discipkes, and while they accompanied him in seeing not in following he ascended. He is not here for he fitteth there at the right hand of the Father. And yet he is here: because he is not gone away in presence of Maieftie. Otherwise according to the presence of maieftie we have Christ alway, and according to the presence of the flesh it is rightly said, But me ye shall not alway have. For according to the presence of the flesh, the Church had him a fewe dayes: nowe shee holdeth him by faith, but seeth him not with eyes. Where (that I may note this also briefly) he maketh him present to vs three waies, by maieftie, prouidence, and vnspakable grace, vnder which I comprehend this maruellous communion of his bodie and blood: if so that we understand it to be done by the power of the holy Ghost, not by that saied enclosing of his bodie vnder the clement. For our Lord hath testified, that he hath flesh and bones which may be felt and seene. And to goe away and Ascend do not signifie to make a shewe of one ascending and going away, but to do in deede that which the wordes signifie. Shall we then (will some man say) affigne to Christ some certaine coast of heauen? But I answere with Augustine that this is a most curious and superfluous question, if so that ye yet wee believe that he is in heauen.

27 But what doth the name of ascending so oft repeated? doth it not signifie a remouing from one place to another? They deny it, because after their opinion, by height is onely signified maieftie of Empire. But what meaneth the verie manner of ascending? was he not in sight of his disciples looking on, lifted vp on high? Do not the Euangelistes plainly declare that he was taken vp into the heauens? These wittie Sophists do answere that with a cloud set betweene him and them he was conuicte out of their sight, that the faithfull might learne that from thence forth he should not bee... be visible in the world. As though, to make credit of his invisible presence, he ought not rather to vanish away in a moment, as the cloud, nor rather to compass him before, he stirred his foot. But when he is carried vp on high into the aire, & with a cloud cast underneath him, teacheth he is no more to be sought in the earth: we fafeli gather, that now he lieth his dwelling place in the heavens: as Paul also affirmeth, and from thence biddeth vs to looke for him. After this manner the Angels warned the disciples, they in vain gazed vp into heavens, because Jesus which is taken vp into heavens, shall so come as they have seen him go vp. Here also the adversaries of sound doctrine, start away with a pleasant shift as they think, saying that he shall then come visible, which never went out of the earth, but that he abideth invisible with them that be his. As though the Angels did there signify a double presence, and do not simply make the disciples witnesses of his going vp, seeing it with their eyes: no doubting might remain: even as if they had said: hee in your sights beholding it, being taken vp into heavens, hath claimed to himselfe the heavenly empire: it remaineth that ye patiently abide in expectation, till hee come againe the judge of the world: because he is now entered into heavens, not that hee may alone possesse it, but that he may gather together with him you and all the godly.

23 But forasmuch as the defenders of this bastard doctrine are not ashamed to garnish it with the consentient voices of the olde writers and specially of Augustin: I will in fewe wordes declare how peruersely they go about it. For whereas their testimonies have beene gathered together of learned and godly men, I will not do a thing already done: let him that will, seeke them out of their works. I will not heape together, neither out of Augustinus himselfe, all that might make to the purpose: but will bee content to shewe by a fewe that he is without controuersie, whole on our side. As for this that our adversaries, to write him from vs, doe allege that it is commonlie read in his booke, that the flesh and bloud of Christ is distributed in the supper, namely the sacrifice once offered in the croffe: it is but trifling: for he also calleth it either thanksgiving, or the sacrament of the body. But in what sense heeth the wordes of flesh and bloud, we neede not to fecke how long cophasing about: forasmuch as he declareth himselfe, saying that sacraments take their names of the likenes of the things which they signify: and that therefore after a certain manner the sacrament of the body is vs body. Where with according another place which is well enough known. The Lord spake not to stay, This is my body, when he gave the signe of it. Again: they obiect, that Augustinus writeth expresslie, that the body of Christ fellath to the grounde, and entreth into the mouth: even in the same sense, that he affirmeth it to be consumed, because he joineth them both together. Neither doth that make to the contrarie, which he faith: that when the mysterie is ended the bread is consumed: because he had a little before said: Sich these things are knowne to men, forasmuch as they are done by men, they may haue honour as things: but as maruellous things, they may not. And to no other end tendeth that which our adversaries do too unadvisedly draw to themselves: that Christ did (after a certain manner) bear himselfe in his owne hands, when he reacheth the mysticall breade to the discipul.

ciples. For by entering this aduerbe of likenesse (after a certain maner) he sufficiently declareth, that he was not truely nor really enclosed under the bread. And no maruel: sith in another place he plainlie affirmeth that bodies, if places of places be taken from them, shall be nowhere: & because they shall be nowhere, they shall be not at all. It is a hungrie caualation, to say that in that place is not entreated of the Supper, in which God vtereth speciall power: because the question was mowed concerning the flesh of Christ, and the holy man of set purpose answering faith: Christ gave immortality to his flesh, but tooke not nature from it. After this form it is not to be thought that he is eke where spread abroad: for we must beware that we do not to affirm the Godhead of the man, that we take away the truth of the bodie. And it followeth not, that that which is in God must be eche where as GOD is. There is a reason by and by added: for one person is God and man, and both are one Christ: which, by this that he is God: in heauen, by this that he is man. What a negligence had it beene, not to except: the mysterie of the Supper being a thing so earnest and weightie, if there had beene in it any thing against the doctrine which he entreated of. And yet if a man doe heedfully reade that which followeth within a little after, he shall finde that under that general doctrine, the Supper is also comprehended, that Christ the onelie begotten sonne of GOD, and the same the son of man, is eche where whole present as God: that he is in the temple of God (that is in the Church) GOD as it were there dwelling, and in some certain place of heauen by reaon of the measure of his true body. We see howe, to the uniting of Christ with the Church, he doeth not drawe his bodie out of heauen: which surelie hee would haue done, if the bodie of Christ were not truely meate to vs vnlesse it were enclosed under bread. In another place defining howe the faithfull doe nowe poseffe Christes. Thou haft him (faith he) by the signe of the croffe, by the sacrament of Baptisme, by the meate and drinke of the altar. How rightlie he reckoneth a superstitious vmage among the signes of the presence of Christ: I doe not nowe dispute: but hee that compareth the presence of the flesh to the signe of the croffe, sufficiently sheweth that he faineth not a two bodied Christ, that the same he may take hidden under the bread, which sticke visible in heauen. If this need plainer declaration, it is by and by added in the same place, that according to the presence of maiefty, wee alway haue Christe that according to the presence of the flesh, it is righly saide, mee ye shal not alway haue. They saue, that this is also added, that according to an unspeakable and invisible grace, it is fulfilled which is saide of him, I am with you, even unto the ending of the worlde. But that is nothing for their advantage: because this is at length restrained to his maiefty, which is cuer in coparison set against the body, & his flesh by express name is made different from his grace & power. As in an other place the same coparison of contraries is red in him, that Christ by bodily presence left the disciples, that by spiritual presence he may be still with them: where it is plainly the substance of the flesh is distinguished from the power of the spirit, which coniunctly vs with Christ, though we be otherwise farre severall by distance of places. The same manner of speaking he oftentimes vseth, as when he faith: He is.
to come again to the quicke & the dead with bodily presence, according to the rule of Faith & found doctrine. For with spiritual presence he was also to come to them, and to abide with the whole Church in the worlde vntill the ending of the worlde. Therefore this speeche is directed to the beleuers whom e he had already begonne to save with bodily presence, & whom he was to leave with bodily absence: that he might with his Father save them with spiritual presence. To take bodily for visible is but trifling: for he setteth also the body in comparison against the divine power: and adding (to save with the Father,) he clearly expresseth that he doth powre abroad his grace from heaven to vs by his spirit.

29 And 3th they put so much confidence in this lurking hole of invisibile presence, goe too let vs see how well they hide themselves in it. First they shall not bring foure th one fallable out of the scriptures, whereby they may proue that Christ is invisibile: but they take that for confessed which no man that hath his founde wit will graunt them, that the body of Christ can not otherwise bee giuen in the Supper but being covered with the vifor of bread. And this is the verie point about which they strive with vs, so faire is it off from having the place of a principle And when they babbble, they are compelled to make a double bodie of Christ: because after their opinion it is in itself visible in heaven, but invisibile in the supper after a special manner of dissipation. But howe trulie, this agree eth, it is easie to judge both by other places of scripture, and by the witness of Peter. Peter faith that Christ must be holden or conteined in heaven, till he come againe. These me teach that he is euery where, but without forme. They take exception and say that it is vnust dealing, to make the nature of a glorified bodie subjict to the lawes of common nature. But this answer was draweth with it that doinge error of Semites (which is worthily to bee abhorred of all the godlie:) that the bodie was swallowed vp of the Godhead. I doe not say that they thinke so. But if this bee reckoned among the qualities of a glorified bodie, to fill all things after an invisibile manner, it is evident, that the bodilie substance is destroied, and that there is lefte no difference of the godhead and the nature of man. Againe if the bodie of Christ bee of so manie fashions and dierete, that it is seen in one place, and is invisibile in another where is the verie nature of a bodie which consisteth of his measured proportions? and where is vnust? Much more rightly doth Ierusalem say, which affirmeth that the body of Christ was a true and natural bodie, because in the mysterie of the Supper the figure of it is set before vs for a pledge and assurance of the spiritual life. And verilie Christ sayde of his glorified bodie, see and feele, for a Spiriute hath not fleshie and bones. Loe by Christes owne mouth the truth of the fleshie is prooued, because it can bee feele and seen. Take away these things, then it shall cease to bee fleshie. They still fee to their desyre of dissipation which they have frame to themselves. But it is our parte so to embrace that which Christ absolutely pronunteth, that he may be of force with vs without exception. Hee prooueth himselfe to bee no Ghost, because hee is visible in his fleshie. Let that he taken away which hee doth not as proper to the nature of his bodie? must they not then be faine to coine a newe definition of a body? Nowe whither soever they turne themselves about, their fained dispensation hath no place in that place of Paul where he faith, that we looke for a Saviour from heauen which shall fashion our base body like to his glorious bōdie. For we may not hope for a like fashioning in those qualities which they faine to Christ that ev-ery one should have an invisible and unmeasurable body. Neither shall there be found any man so full witted whom they may make to beleue so great an absurditie. Let them not therefore ascribe this gift to Christes glorified bōdie, to be at once in many places, and to be conteynd in no space. Finally let them either openly deny the resurrection of the flesh, or let them grant that Christ being clothed with heavenly glory, did not put off his flesh, who then made vs in our flesh fellowes and parttners of the same glory, when we shall have the resurrection common with him. For what doeth the scripture teach more plainly, than that as Christ did put on our true flesh when he was borne of the Virgin, and suffered in our true flesh when hee satisfied for vs: so he receiued againe also the same true flesh in rising againe, and carried it vp to heauen? For this is to vs the hope of our resurrection and ascending into heauen, that Christ is risen againe and ascended: and (as Tertullian faith) he carried the earnest of our resurrection into the heavens with him. Now how weake and fraile shoulde that hope be, vnlesse this our felle flesh had bee raised vp with Christ and entered into the kingdom of heauen? But this is the proper whole of a bodie, to be conteynd in space, to consist of his measured proportions, to haue his forme. Therefore away with this foolish deuise, which dooth often both the minds of men & Christ to the bread. For to what purpose serveth the secret presence vnder bread, but that they which see to have Christ joyned with the, may rest in that signe? But the Lord himselfe willed vs to withdrawe not onely our eyes but all our senses from the earth, forbidding himselfe to bee touched of the women vntill he had gone vp to his Father. When hee seeth Marie with godlie zeal of reuence to make haft to kisse his feet, there is no cause why he shoule d disallowe and forbid this touching till he have beene taken vp into heauen, but because he will be sought no where else. Whereas they obiect that he was afterward seene of Stephen, the solution is easie. For neyther was it therefore necessarie that Christ should chang place, which could give to the eyes of his ferraunt such sharpeneffe of sight as might perce through the heavens. The same also is to be saide of Paul. Whereas they obiect that Christ came out of the Sepulchre being shut: and entred in among the disciples, the dores being shut: that makes it neuer a whitte more for maintenance of their error. For as the water like a fast pavenement made a way to Christ walking vpon the lake: so it is no maruell, if at his comming the hardnes of the stone yeledd it selfe. Howbeit it is more proeuable, that by his commandement the stone was removed, and by and by after passage given him returned into his place. And to enter the dores being shut: is not asmuch in effect as to perce through the whole substaunce, but by divine power to open an entrie for himselfe, that hee sodenly foode among the disciples, verily after a maruellous manner, when the dores were fast locked. That which they alledge out of Luke, that Christ sodenly vanished away away from the eyes of the disciples with whom he went to Emmaus, profitteth them nothing, and maketh for vs, For, that he might take away the sight of himself from them, he was not made invisible, but only went out of sight. As when he went in journey together with them (as the same Luke witnesseth) he did not put on a new face, that he might not be known, but held their eyes. But these fellows do not only transforme Christ, that he may be consequent in earth, but in divers places they make him diverse and unlike himself. Finally, in so trifling they do not by one word in deed, but by a circumstance, make of the flesh of Christ a spirit; and not contented therewith, they put upon it altogether contrary qualities. Whereupon of necessitie followeth that it is double.

Now although we graunt them that which they prate of the invisibly presence, the unmeasurablenes shall not be yet pounced, without which they shall in vain attempt to enclose Christ vnder bread. Unlesse the body of Christ may be euerie where at once, without any compass of place, it shall not be likely that he, eth hidden vnder bread in the Supper. By which necessity they brought in the monstrous being euerie where. But it is shewed by strong and plaine witnesses of Scripture, that it was limited about by the measure of the body of a man; and then by that extending he hath made it plain that he is not in all places, but that when he passed into one place, he leaueth the other that he was in before. Neither is the promise which they allege, to be drawn to the body, I am with you even to the ending of the world, First the continual conoyning can not stand, vnlesse Christ dwel in vs corporallie without the use of the Supper. Therefore there is no just cause why they shoule to sharply brawle about the worde of Christ, that they may in the Supper enclose Christ vnder bread. Again the text is eellie prooth, that Christ speaketh nothing lesse than of his flesh, but promiseth to his disciples invincible helpe, whereby he may defend and susteyn them against all the assaults of Satan and the world. For when he injoyed them a hard charge: lest they should doute to take it in hand, or should fearfully execute it, he strengetheth them with affiance of his presence: as if he had said, that his succour shall not fail them, which shallbe impossible to be overcome. Unlesse they list to confounde all thinges, must they not to have made distinction of the manner of presence. And verily some had rather with great shame to vter their ignorance, than to yeeld never so little of their error. I speake nor of the Papistes: whose doctrine is more tolerable, or at the least more shamefull. But contentiousnes so carrieth some away, that they say that by reason of the natures vnitied in Christ, wherefore the Godhead of Christ is, there is also his flesh, which cannot be seuered from his Godhead. As though that same uniting have compounded of those two natures; I wote not what mean thing which was neither God nor man. So in deede did Eutyches and after him Serenus. But it is plaine gathered out of the Scripture, that the only one person of Christ doth so consist of two natures, that either of them hath still her owne propertie remaining safe. And that Eutyches was rightfully condemmed, they will bee affaunded to deny: it is maruellous that they marke not the cause of this condemning, that taking away the difference betweene the natures, enforcing the

Of the outward meanes, he made of God man, and of man God. What madness therefore is it, rather to mingle heaven and earth together, than not to draw the bodie of Christ out of the heavenly sanctuaries? For whereas they bring for themselves these testimonies, None is gone up to heaven, but he that is come downe the sonne of man which is in heaven. Against The sonne which is in the bosom of the Father, he shall declare them: it is a point of like sense, the nature of the body, to deliuer the communicating of properties which was in old time not but out of the world. Truely, wile the Lord of glory is said to be crucified, Paul doth not mean that he suffred any thing in his Godhead, but because the same Christ which being an abject and despised in the flesh did suffer, was God and Lord of glory. After this manner also the Sonne of man was in heaven; because the same Christ, which according to the flesh did dwell the Sonne of man in earth, was God in heaven. In which so is said he descended from the said place according to his Godhead, not that the Godhead did forsake heaven, to hide it self in the prison of the body, but because, although it filled all things, yet in the veste manhood of Christ it dwelled corporally, that is to say naturally and after a certain vnspakeable maner. It is a common distinction in schooles, which I am not ashamed to rehearse: that although whole Christ be every where, yet not whole that is in him is every where. And I would to God the Schoolemen themselves had well wuyed the pitfall of this saying: for so should the vnscary nunciation of the fleshly presence of Christ have bin met withall. Therefore our mediator is whole every where, which is at hand with his, & in the supper after a speciall maner giueth himself present: but yet so, that whole he is present, not the whole that he is: because, as it is said, in his flesh he is contained in heaven till he appeare to judgement.

But they are farre deceived, which conceieve no presence of the flesh of Christ in the supper, vnlesse it be made present in bread. For so leame nothing to the secrete working of the Spirit, which viueteth Christ himselfe vnto vs. They think not Christ present, vnlesse he come downe to vs. As though if he did lift vs vp to him, we should not as well enjoy his presence. Therefore the question is onely of the manner: because they place Christ in the bread, but we thinke it not lawfull for vs to plac him out of Heauen. Let the readers judge, whether is the righter. Oney let this caullation be driven awaie, that Christ is taken away from his supper, vnlesse he be hidden vnder the cover of bread. For if this my flesche is heavenly, it is no need to draw Christ into the earth, that he may be joyned to vs.

Now if any man do ask me of the manner, I will not be ashamed to confess, that it is a higher secret than it can be either comprehended with my witte, or uttered with my words: and, to speake it more plainely, I rather feele it, than I can understand it. Therefore I doe herein without controversy embrace the truth of God, in which I may safely rest. He pronounceth his flesh is the meare of my soule, & his bloud is the drink. With such food do I offer my soule to him to be fedde. In his holy Supper he com- manded me vnder the signes of breade and wine to take, eate, and drink his body & bloud. Nothing doubt that both doth truely deliver them, and
and I doe receive them. One ly I refuse the absurdities, which appear to bee either unworthy of the heavenly majestie of Christ, or disagreeing from the truth of his nature of manhoo'de: forasmuch as they must also fight with the worde of God, which also teacheth that Christ was so taken vp into the glory of the heavenly kingdome that it lifteth him vp above all estate of the world, and no lesse diligently seteth forth in his nature of man, those things that are properly belonging to his true manhoo'de. Neither ought this to seeme incredible, or not conformant to reason, because as the whole kingdom of Christ is spiritual, so whatsoever he doth with his Church, ought not to be reduced to the reason of this world Or, that I may vse the worde of Augustine, his mysterie, as other are, is done by men, but from God: in earth, but from heaven. Such (I say) is the presence of the bodie, as the nature of the Sacrament requireth: which we say here to excel with so great power, and great effectual holie, that it not onely bringeth to our minde, undoubted truth of eternal life, but also assured vs of the immortalitie of our flesh. For it is now quickned of his immortal flesh, & after a certain maner communicateth of his immortalitie. They which are carried about this with their excessive speeches, do nothing but with such entanglements darken the simple and plaine truth. If any be not yet satisfied, I would haue him here a while to consider with me, that we now speake of a Sacrament, all the partes whereof ought to be referred to faith. But we do no lesse deintily and plentifully feede faith with this partaking of the body which wee haue declared, than that they plucke Christ himselfe out of heaven. In the meanes time plainly confesse, that I refuse y mixture of the flesh of Christ with our foule, or the pouring out of it such as they reach be cause, it sufficeth, that Christ doeth out of the substance of his flesh breath life into our foules, yea doeth power into vs his owne life, although the very fleche of Christ doeth not enter into vs. Moreover it is no doubt that the proportion of faith, where by Paul willeth vs to examine all exposition of Scripture, doeth in this behalfe very well agree with me. As for them that speake against so evident a truth, let them looke after what rule of faith they fashion themselues. He that doth not confesse that Jesus Christ is come in the fleche, is not of God. These men, although they cloke it, or make it not, doe spoile him of his fleche.

33 Of communicating is to be likewise thought, which they acknowledge none, vnlesse they denoue the fleche of Christ vnder breade. But there is no small wrong done to the holy Ghost, vnlesse we beliue that it is brought to passe by his incomprehensible power, that we communique with the fleche and blood of Christ. Yea if the force of the mystefie, such as it is taught of vs, and as it was known to the olde Church from foure hundred yeares ago, were weighed according to the worthiness of it, there was enough and morewhereupon we might be satisfied: the gate had beene shut against manie foule errors, out of which have beene kinded many, horrible discensions, where with both in old time and in our age the Church hath bene miserably vexed, while curious men doe enforce an excessive maner of presence, which the scripture never kneweth. And they torrmoyle about a thing soundly and rathly conceiued, as if the enclosing of Christ vnder breade were (as

(as the proverbe is) the prowne and poupe of godlineesse. It principally behooved to knowe, howe the bodie of Christ was once delivered for vs, is made ours: howe we are made partesakers of his bloud that was shedd: because this is to possesse whole Christ crucified, that we may enjoy all his good things. Now these things, in which was so great importance, being omitted yea neglected & in a manner buried, this only crabbed question pleaseth them how the body of Christ lieth hid vnder bread or vnder the fourme of bread. They falsely spread abroad that whatsoeuer we teach concerning spirittuall eating, is contrarie to the true and reall eating, as they call it; because wee have respecte to nothing but to the manner, which among them is carnall, while they enclose Christ in bread, but to vs it is spirittuall, because the secret power of the spiritt is the bond of our conioyning with Christ. No trueer is that other objection, that we touch onely the fruit or effect which the faithful take of the eating of the flesh of Christ. For we have iarde before, that Christ himselfe is the substance of the Supper: and that thereupon followeth the effecte, that by the sacrifice of his death we are cleansed from sinnes, by his bloud we are washed, by his resurrection we are raised vp into hope of the heavenely life. But the foolish imagination, whereof Lombarde was the author, hath percellett their minde, while they thinke that the eating of the flesh of Christ is the Sacrament. For this faith he: The Sacrament and not the things are the fourmes of breade and wine: the Sacrament and the thing are the flesh and bloud of Christ: the thing and not the Sacrament, is the mysticall fleche. Againe within a little after. The thing signified and contained, is the proper fleche of Christ: the thing signified and not contained, is his mysticall bodie. Whereas he maketh difference be- twene the flesh of Christ, and the effectuall power of nourishing, wherwith it is ended, I agree: but whereas he raeneth it to be a sacrament ye and contained vnder bread, it is an error not to be suffered. Herupon hath growen the selle exposition of sacramentall eating, because they haue thought that wicked men also and evill doers doe eate the flesh of Christ, howe much soeuer they be trasurers from him. But the flesh of Christ, it selue in the mysterie of the Supper is no lesse a spirittuall thing than eternall salvation. Whereupon we gather, that whatsoeuer be voyde of the spirit of Christ, can no more eate the flesh of Christ, than they can drinke wine wherewith is joyned no raff. Truely Christ is too hainously torne in funder, when that dead body and which hath no liuely strength, is gien foorth in commone to vnbeleeveres: and his expresse wordes are direcely against it. Whosoeuer eate-eth my fleche and drinketh my bloud, abideth in me, and I in him. They aunowre that in that place is not entreated of the sacramentall eateing: which I graunt, so that they will not now and then stumble against the same stone, in saying that the fleche it selue is eaten without fruitre. But I woulde knowe of them, howe long they holde it when they have eate it. Here, in my judgement, they shall have no way to get out. But they object, that nothing can be withdrawen or faile of the promises of God by the vnthankefulness of men. I graunt in deed, and I sayne that the force of the mysterie remaineth whole, howseuer wicked men doe, as much as in them lyeth, endeuour to make it voide. Yet it is one thing to be offered, and an other thing thing to be received. Christ reacheth this spiritual meat and offereh this spiritual drinke to all men: some do greedily ease of it, some do loathingly refuse it: shall these men refusing make the meat and the drinke to looke their nature? They will say that their opinion is holpen by this similitude, namely, that the flesh of Christ, though it be vsuafiorie, is nevertheless his flesh. But I deny that it can be eaten without the tatt of faith: or (if we left rather to speake as Augustine doeth) I say that men beare away no more of this Sacrament, than they gather with the vessell of faith. So nothing is abated from the Sacrament, yea the truth and effectualness thereof remaineth unminished, although the wicked depart emptie from the outwarde paraking of it. If they againe object that this word, this is my bodie, is diminished, if the wicked receive corruptible bread and nothing else we have a solution ready, that God will not be acknowleden true in the receiuing it selue, but in the effectualnesse of his owne goodnesse, when he is ready to giue, yea liberally offereh to the vnworthie that which they refuse. And this is the fulnesse of the Sacrament, which the whole world cannot brake, y the flesh and blood of Christ is no lesse giuen to the vnworthie than to the chosen faithful full ones of God: but therewithal it is true, that as water lighting upon a hard stone, falleth away, because there is no eneme open into the stone; so the wicked do with their hardnesse drive backe the grace of God that it cannot percease into them. Moreover, that Christ should be received without faith is no more agreeing with reason, than to eade to budde in the fire. Whereas they ask, how Christ is come to damnation to some: unless they receiue him vnworthily, it is a verie colde question: for as much as we no where read, that men do procure death to themselves by vnworthily receiuing Christ, but rather by refusing him. Neither doth Christes parable help them, where he faith that seade groweth vp among thornes, and afterward being choked is marred: because hee there entreateth of what value the faith is which endureth but for a tyme, which they doe not thinke to be necessarie to the eating of Christs flesh and drinking of his blood, that in this behalfe do make Judas equally fellow with Peter, But rather by the same parable their error is confuted, where Christ faith that some seede falleth in the highway, other sone vpon stones, and neither of them taketh roote. Whereupon following that to the vnbelieuers their owne hardnesse is a lye that Christ attaineth not to them. Whosoeuer desireth to have our salvation holpen by this mystery, shall finde nothing fitter, than that the faithfull being led to the very fountaine, should drawe life out of the Sonne of God. But the dignitie of it is honorably enough set out, when we keepe in mind that it is a helpe whereby we be grafted into the body of Christ, or beeing grafted do more & more growe together, til he do fullie make himselfe one with vs in the heauenly life. They object that Paul ought not to have made them guiltie of the bodie & blood of Christ, unless they were partakers of them, But I answere that they are not therefore condemned because they have eaten them, but onely because they have prophesied the mysterie, in treading under feete the pledge of the holy conioynung with God, which they ought receicentely to receiue.

34 Nowe because, Augustine among the old writers chiefly hath affirmed that that article of doctrine, that nothing is abated from the Sacraments, nor the grace which theyfigure is made void by the infidelity or naughtiness of men: it shall bereprovable to prove clearly by his own words, howe vitually and perversely they doe drawethat to this present cause, which causeth the bodie of Christ to dogges to ear. The sacramental eating, after their opinion, is whereby the wicked receive the bodie and blood of Christ, without the power of the spirit, and yet of grace.

_ffeuerly_, Namely the power of the sacrament, not only the visible sacrament: and verily within, not without: hee eateth it with heart, not he that preseneth it with tooth. Whereupon all men in the supper of the Lorde, to some vnto life, to some vnto destruction: but the thing itself whereof it is a sacrament, to all men vnto life, to none vnto destruction: who soever hee partaker of it. That none should here caushat the thing is called not the bodie, but the grace of the Spirit: which may be seuered from the bodie, the contrarie comparison betwene these two words: Addition of visible and invisible: drinketh away all these myfles. For vnder the first of them cannot be comprehended the bodie of Christ. Whereupon followeth that the vnbelievers doe communicate openly of the visible signe. And that all doubting may be better taken away, after that he had faide that this bread requieth the hunger of the inward man, he addeth Moses and Aaron and Phinees, and many other that did eat these manna, pleased God. Why for? because the spiritual meate they spiritually vnderstood, spiritually hungered, spiritually tasted, that they might be spiritually filled. For we also at this day have received spiritual meate, but the Sacrament is one thing, and the power of the sacrament is another. A little after: and by this he that abideth not in Christ, and in whom the Christ abideth not, ye cut not neither eate his flesh, nor drinketh his blood, though carnally and visible he preseth with teeth the signe of the bodie and blood. We heare againe that the visible signe is set in comparrison as contrarie to spiritual eating. Whereby that error is confus'd, that the bodie of Christ invisible is in deed eaten sacramentally, though not spiritually. We heare also, that nothing is granted to profligate and uncleane men beside the visible receiving of the signe. Hereupon commeth his famous saying, that the other disciples did eate the breade the Lorde, but Judas did eate the bread of the Lorde: wherein he plainly excepteth the vnbelievers from partaking of the body & blood. Neither to edeeth it to any other end which he faith in another place: What maruellous thought to Judas was given to be bidden of Christ, by which he might be made bond to the diuell. when thou seest on the contrarie side, to Paul was given the angell of the diuell, by whom he might be made perfect in Christ: he faith verily in another place, the bread of the supper was the bodie of Christ to them, to whom Paul said, He that eateth unworthily, eateth & drinketh judgemenent to himselfe: and that they have not therefore nothing because they have received naughtie. But in what sense he declareth mee fully in another place. For taking in had purpose to define how the wicked & euill doers, which professe the Christian faith... faith with mouth but with deeds doth deny it, doth eat the body of Christ: (and that against the opinion of some which thought that they did not eat in sacrament one like but in verie deed.) But neither faith he ought to be said that they eat the body of Christ, because they are not to be reckened among the members of Christ. For (to speake nothing of the rest (they can not together see the members of Christ, and the members of a harlot. Finally where him selfe faith, He that careeth my flesh, & drinketh my blood, abideth in me, & I in him, he sheweth what it is not sacramentally but in verie deed to eat the body of Christ. For this is to abide in Christ, that Christ may abide in him. For he so said this, as though he had said, he that abideth in me, & in whom I abide not, let him not say or thinke that he doeth eat my body, or drink my blood. Let the reader weigh the things let as contraries in the comparison to eat, sacramentally, and in verie deed: and there shall remaine no doubt. He confirmeth the same, no lesse plainely in these words: Prepare not your iawes, but your heart. Hereupon is this Supper condemned. Loe we beleue in Christ, when we receive by faith in receiv- ing we know what to thinke. We receive a little & are fatted in heart. Therefore not that which is seen, but that which is beleued, doeth feede. Here also whereby the wicked receiue, he restrayneth to the visible signe: and teacheth that Christ is none other wise receiued than by faith. So also in an other place, pronouncing expressly that the good and the euill doe communicate together in the signes, he excludes the euil for the true eating of the flesh of Christ. For if they receiued the thing itselfe, he would not utterly have left that vnspoken which was more fit for his matter. Also in an other place, entrating of the eating and the fruit thereof, he concludes thus: Then shall the body and bloud of Christ be life to every man, if that which in the sacra- ment is visibly receiued, be in the truth it selfe, spirituallie eaten, spirituallie dronk. Therefore who to make vnbeleeuers partakers of the flesh & bloud of Christ, that they may agree with Augufline, let them sawe vs the visible bodie of Christ: forasmuch as, by his judgement, the whole truth is spiritual. And it is certainly gathered out of his words, that the sacramentall eating, when vnbeleeue olvol the entrance to truth, is as much in effect as visible or outward eating. If the body of Christ might be eaten truly and yet not spiritually, what should that meane which he faith in an other place? Yee shall not eat this body which ye see, and drinke the bloud which they shall shedde that shall crucifie me. I have commended a certaine sacrament unto you, being spiritually understood it shall quicken you. Verily he would not deie, but that the same bodie which Christ offered for sacrifice, is delivered in the Supper: but he did set out the manner of eating: namelie that be- ing receiued into heavendie glorie, by the secret power of the Spirit, it breatheth life into vs. I grant in deed that there is oftentimes founde in him this manner of speaking, that the bodie of Christ is eaten of the vnbeleeuers: but he expoundeth him selfe, adding, In Sacrament. And in an other place he describeth spiritually eating, in which our bitinges consume not grace. And leaft mine aduersaries should say, I fight with them with a heape of places, I would know of them howe they can vnwinde themselues from one saying of his, where he faith that Sacraments doe worke in the only

Adoration of Christ in the Sacraments unvaranted.

This knowledge shall also easily draw vs away from the carnal worshipping, which some haue with peruerse rashnesse erectt in the sacraments, because they made account with themselves in this manner: If it be the body, then both the soule & the Godhead are together with the body, which now cannot be seuered: therefore Christ is there to be worshipped. First if their accompanying which they pretend be denied them, what will they doe? For how much seuer they cry out vpon an absurditie, if the body bee seuered from the soule and the Godhead: yet what sound wittted & sober man can perswade himselft that the body of Christ is Christ? They thinke themselves in deed gaily to prove it with their logical arguments. But if Christ speacheth distinctly of his body and bloud, but describeth not the manner of presence: how will they of a doubtfull thing gather certainly that which they would? What then? if their consciences chaunce to be exercised with any more grievous feeling, shall not they by & by with their logical arguments be dissolve and melt? namely when they shall see themselves destitute of the certaine word of God, vpon which alone our soules do stand fast, when they are called to account, & without which they faint at every first moment: where they shall call to minde that the doctrine & examples of the Apostles are against them, & that themselves alone are to themselves the authors of it. To such motions shall be added other more small prickings. What? Shall it be a matter of no importance, to worship God in this forme, where nothing was prescribed vnto vs? When it concerned the true worship of God, ought they with so great lightnesse to have attempted that of which there is no where reade any one word? But if they had, with such humblenesse as they ought, holden all their thoughts vnder the worde of God, they would truly have harkened to that which he sayde, Take, eate, drinke, and would have obied this comandement, wherein he biddeth the Sacrament to be receiued, not to be worshipped. But they which, as it is commanded of God, doe receiue it without worshipping, are assured they doe not swarde from Gods comandement: than which assuredly there is nothing better when we take any worke in hand. They haue the example of the Apostles, who we read not to haue fallen down flat & worshipped it, but eate as they were sitting, to haue receiued it & eaten it. They haue the vs of the Apostles like Church, wherein Luke reporteth the faithful did communie not in worshipping but in breaking of bread. They haue the Apostles doctrine, wherewith Paul instructed the Church.
Church of the Corinthians, professing that he had received of the Lord that which he delivered.

36 And these things verily tend to this end, that the godly reader should weye howe perillous it is in so hie matters to wander from the simple word of God to the dreams of our owne braine. But those things that are aboue sayde, ought to deliuer vs from all dout in this behalfe. For that godly soules may therein rightly take holde of Christe, they must needs be lifted vp to heaven. If this be the office of a Sacrament, to helpe the mind of man which otherwise is weake, that it may rise vpwarde to reach the height of spiritual mysteries; then they which are holden downe in the outward signe do stray from the right way of seeking Christ. What then? Shall we deny that it is a superstitious worshipping, when men doe throw themselves downe before bread, to worship Christ therin? Doubtlesse the Nicene Synode meant to meet with this mischiefe, when it forbade vs to be humbly intentive to the signes set before vs. And for none other cause was it in olde time ordained, that before the consecration the people should with a loud voice be put in mind to have their hearts lifted vpwarde. The Scripture it selfe also, beside that it diligently declareth vnto the ascension of Christ, wherby he conueyed away the presence of his body from our sight & conversation: so shak away from vs all carnall thining of him, so oft as it maketh mention of him, commandeth vs to be in minds raised vpwarde, & to seke him in heaven sitting at the right hand of his father. According to this rule he was rather to be spirituallly worshipped in heauenly glorie, than this so perillous a kinde of worshipping to be deuised, full of carnall and grosse opinion of God. Wherefore they have inuented the worshipping of the Sacramet, have not only dreamed it of themselues beside the Scripture, in which no mention of it can be shewed (which yet shoulde not have beene overstared if it had beene acceptable to God.) But also all the Scripture crying out against it, they have framed to themselues a God after the will of their owne lust, leaving the living God. For what is idolatrie, if this be not, to worship the gifts in stead of the giver himself? Wherin they have doublely offended: For both the honor taken from God was conveyed to a creature: and he himselfe also dishonored in the deluding and prophaning of his benefite, when of his holy Sacrament is made a cursed idle: But let vs contrariwise, least we fall into the fame pitte, throughlie settle our cares, eyes, heartes, minds, and tongues in the holy doctrine of God. For that is the schoole of the holy Ghost, ye best scholemaster, in which such profit is attained, that nothing needs more to be gotten from any where else, but we willingly ought to be ignorant of whatsoever is not taught in it.

37 But now (as superstition, when it hath once passed the right bounds, makest no ende of sinning, they fell a great way further. For they have devised Ceremonies altogether strange from the institution of the Supper, to this end only that they might giue divine honors to the signe. We yeeld (say they) this worship to Christ. First, if this were done in the Supper, I would say that that worshipping onely is lawfull, which resteth not in the signe, but is directed to Christ sitting in heaven. But nowe by what pretence doe they boast that they worshippe Christ in that bread, when they have no promise thereof?

thereof. They consecrate an host, as they call it, which they may carry about in pompe, which they may shew forth in a common gazing to be looked upon, worshipped, and called upon. I ask by what power they thinke it to bee rightly consecrate. Verily they will bring forth those wordes, This is my body. But I will obiect to the contrarie, that it was therewithall saide, Take and eate. Neither will I doe that of nothing. For when a promise is knit to a commandement, I say that the promise is so contained under the commandement, that being feuered it is made no promise at all. This shalbe made plainer by a like example. God gave a commandement, when he saide, Call vpon me: He added a promise, I will heare thee. If any man calling vpon Peter & Paul, do glorie vpon this promise, wilt not all men rise up that he doth wrongfullie. And what other thing I pray you, doe they which leaving the commandement concerning eating, do catch holde of a maimed promise, this is my body, to abuse it to strage ceremonies fro the institution of Christ? Let vs therefore remember that this promise is gien to them which keepe the commandement joyned with it: but that they be destitute of all the word, which remoue the Sacrament to any other way. We haue heretofore entreated how the mystery of his holy supper seuereth our Faith before God. But forasmuch as the Lorde doeth here not onely bring into our remembrance so great largenes of his bountie, as we haue before shewed, but doth as it were from hand to hand bring it forth, & stirreth vs to acknowledge it: he doth therewithall warne vs that we be not vs thankfull to so plentiful liberality: but rather that we would publish it with such praises as it is meete, and advance it with thanksgivings. Therefore when he deliuered the institution of the Sacrament it selfe to the Apostles, he taught them that they shoulde doe it in remembrance of him. Which Paul expoundeth, to declare the Lordes death. That is, publikely and altogether with one mouth openly to confesse, that all our affiance of life and salvation is reposed in the death of the Lorde; that wee may glorifie him with our confession, and may by our example exhort other to give glorie to him. Here againe it appeareth whereunto the marke of this Sacrament is directed, namely to exercise vs in the remembrance of the death of Christ. For, this that we are commanded to declare the Lordes death till he come to judge, is nothing else but that we shoulde publishe that with confession of mouth, which our faith hath acknowledged in the Sacrament, that is, that the death of Christ is our life. This is the second vs of the Sacrament, which pertaineth to outward confession.

38 Thirdly the Lord also willed it to be to vs in stead of an exhortation, than which none other can more vehemently encourage & enflame vs both to pureneffe and holinesse of life, and also to charitie, peace & agreement. For the Lord doth therein so communi-cate his body to vs, that he is made throughly one with vs, and we with him. Nowe sith he hath but one body, whereof he maketh vs al partakers, it is necessarie that al we also be by such partaking made one body. Which vnite the brede which is deliuered in the Sacrament, representeth: which as it is made of many graines in such sort mingled together that one can not be discerned from an other: after the same manner we also ought to be conioyned & knit together with so great agree-agreement of mindes, that no disagreement or diviſion come betweene us.
This I had rather to be expressed with Paules wordes. The cup of blessing (faith he) which we blesse is the communicating of the blood of Christ: & 1 Cor. 10, 16, the bread of blessing which we breake, is the partaking of the body of Christ. Therefore we all are one body that partake of one bread. We shal haue verie well profited in the Sacramente, if this thought so shall be imprinted and ingrauen in our mindes, that none of the brethren can bee hurte, deſpised, refuſed, abuſed, or any wise be offended of vs, but that there withall we doe in doing hurte, deſpife, and abufe Christe without our injurious dealings: that we can not disagree with our brethren but that wee must therewithal disagree with Christe: that Christe cannot bee loued of vs, but that he must be loued in our brethren:that what care we haue of our owne body, such alfo we ought to haue of our brethren which are members of our body; as no part of our body is touched with any feeling of grece, which is not spread abroad into all the other partes, fo we must not suffer our brother to bee greeued with any euill whereof we should not also be touched with compaſſion. Therefore Augustine not without cause so oft calleth this Sacrament that bond of charitie. For what sharper coulde bee put to vs, to stirre vp mutuall charitie among vs, than when Christ giving himselfe to vs, doth not onely allure vs with his owne example that we shoule mutually dedicate and deliver our felues one to another; but in so much as he maketh himselfe common to all, he maketh al vs also one in himselfe.

39 But hereby is that verie well confirmed which I have saide in an other place, that the true ministration of the Sacrament diadeth not without the word. For whatfoever profite commeth to vs of the Supper, requireth the word: whether we be to be confirmed in faith, or to be exercised in conſecution, or be stir'd vp to durie, prayer is needful. Therefore nothing can be more disorderly done in the Supper, than if it be turned to a dumbe actione as hath bene done vnnder the tyranny of the Pope. For they would haue the whole force of conſecration to hang vnpon ye intent of the Priest, as though this nothing pertained to the people, to whom it most of all behooved that the mysterie shoulde be declared. But therupon hath grown this errore, they marked not that those promises where with the conſecration is made, are directed not to the elements themſelves, but to them receiue the. But Christ speaketh not to the bread, it may be made his bodie, but commandeth his disciples to eat, & promiseth to them the communicating of his body & blood. And none other order doth Paul teach than that together with ye bread and the cup, the promises should be offered to the faithfull. Thus it is truely. We ought not to imagine any magickall enchantment, that it be sufficient to haue mumbled vp ye words, as though the elements did hear them: but let vs understande that those wordes are a liuely preaching, which may edifce the hearers, which may inwardly pearce into their mindes, which may be imprinted and seeld in their hearts, which may shewe forth effectuallnes in fulfilling of ye which it promiseth by these reasons it clearly appeareth ye the laying vp of the Sacrament, which many do earnestly require, it may be extraordinarily distributed to ye sick, is vnprofitable: For either they receive it without rehearsing of the institution of Christ, or the minister shall together with the signe joyn the true declaration of the mysticke. In silence is abuse and faulte. If the promises be rehearsed, and the mysticke declared, that they which shall receive it may receive it with fruite, there is no cause why we shoulde doubt that this is the true consecration. To what ende then will that other consecration come the force whereof commeth not so farre as to the sickne? But they that doe so, have the example of the old church. I grant but in so great a matter, and in which wee eare not without greater danger nothing is later than to follow the truth itself.

For (as Paul faith) they that eate & drinke unworthy are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, and doe eate and drinke judgement to themselves, not discerning the body of the Lord. For such kind of men as without any scruple of faith, without any zeal of charity, doe thrust themselves forth like swine to take the Supper of the Lord, doe not discern the body of the Lord. For in so much as they doe not beleue that that body is their life, they doe as much as in them lieth dishonour it, spoiling it of all the dignity thereof, and finally in so receiuing it they prophane and defile it. But in so much as being estranged and disagreeing from their brethren, they dare mingle the holy signe of the body of Christ with their disagreements, it is no thankes to them that the body of Christ is not rent in sunder, and limmesale turne in peeces. And so not unworthy they are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord, which they doe with vngodlineffe full of sacrileges so foule defile. Therefore by this unworthy eating, they take to themselves damnation. For whereas they have no faith repose in Christ, yet receiuing the sacrament they profess there is salvation for them no where else than in him, and doe forsware all other affiance. Wherefore they themselves are accusers to themselves, they themselves pronounce witness against themselves, and they themselves scale their owne damnation. Again, when they being with hatred and cuill will deuide and drawn in sunder from their brethren, that is from the members of Christ, have no part in Christ: yet they doe testify that this is the onely salvation to communicate with Christ, and to bee made one with him. For this cause Paul commandeth, that a man proue himselfe, before that hee eate of this brede or drinke of this cup. Whereby (as I expound it) he meant that every man should descend into himselfe, and weigh with himselfe, whether hee doe with inward affiance of heart rest upon the situation which Christ hath purchased: whether hee acknowledge it with confession of mouth then whether hee doe with defirous endeavour of innocence and holiness esteem to the following of Christ: whether after his example hee be ready to give himselfe to his brethren, and to communicate himselfe to them with whom he hath Christ common to him: whether, as he himselfe is accompted of Christ, he doe likewise his behalf take all his brethren for members of his owne body; whether he count to cherish, defend and helpe them as his owne members. Not for that these duties both of faith and charitie can now be perfect in vs: but because we ought to endeavour this, and with all our desires to long towards it, that wee may daily more and more encrease our Faith begun.

41 Commonly when they go about to prepare men to such worthines of eating, they have in cruell wise tormented and vexed poore confessions: and yet they brought never a whitte of all those things that might serve to the purpose. They said that those did eate worthily which were in state of grace. To be in state of grace they expounded to bee pure and cleansed from all sinne. By which doctrine al y men that ever haue at any time bene or now be in earth, were debarred from the vs of this sacrament. For if we go about this to fetch our worthines fr0 our selves, we are utterly vn done: onely despaire & damnable sinnes abideth for vs. Though we endeavour with our whole strengths, wee shall nothing more preuaile, but that then at last we shall bee most vnworthy, when we haue most of all troubled about seeking of worthines. To value this fore, they haue devised a way to attaine worthines: that, as much as in vs lieth, making examination, and requiring of our selves accompt of all our doings, we should with contrition, confession, and satisfaction cleanse our vnworthines. which way of cleansing, what manner of thing it is, we have already shewed there where was more convenient place to speake of it. So much as sertouch for our present purpose, I say y these be two hungrie and vanishing confortes, to dismaid and discouraged confidences, and such as are striken with horror of their sinne. For if Lord by special forbidding a dimentecnone to the partaking of the supre, but the righteous and innocents there needeth no small heed, that may make a man affued of his owne righteousness which he heareth to be required of God, But whereas this assurednes confirmed unto vs, that they are discharge d for God, which have done so much as in them lay? But although it were yet when shall it be that a man may be bold to assure himselfe that he hath done as much as in him lay? So when there is made no certaine assurance of our worthines, the eache shall alway remaine that by that horrible forbidding, whereby is pronounced that they eate and drinke judgement to themselves, which eate and drinke vnworthily.

42 Nowe it is cary to judge what manner of doctrine this is which reigneth in the Papacie, and from what author it hath proceeded, which with outrageous rigor thereof bereaucheth and spoileth miserable sinners & such as be tormented with feare and sorrow, of the comfort of this Sacrament in which yet at the sweete delicatoes of the gospel were set before them. Surely the devil could by no readier way destroy men, than by so making them senseless, that they could not perceive the taste and favour of such food, wherewith it was the will of the most good heavenly father to feed them. Least therefore we run into such headlong downfall, let us remember that this holy banquet is medicine to the sick, comfort to sinners, liberal gift to the poor: which bring no profit to the healthie, righteous, and rich, if any such could be found. For whereas in it Christ is given vs for meat: we understand that without him we pine, starve, and faint, like as famine destroith the lively strength of the body. Again whereas he is given vs for life: we understand yt without him we are in our selves utterly dead. Wherefore this is the worthinesse both the onely & best that we can bring to god, if we offer to him our own vilenes & (as I may so call it) vnworthines, yt of his mercie he may make vs worthy of him: if we despare in our selves, that we may be comforted in him: if we humble our selves, that we may bee raised vp of him: if we accuse our selves, yt we may be justified of him: moreover if we aspire to that vnirie which he commendeth to vs in his supper: & as he maketh vs al one in himselfe, so if we with vs all altogether one soule, one heart, one tongue, if we have these things throughly wel weied & confounded, such thoughts although they shake vs, yet shall never overthrow vs. As how should we being needie & naked of all good things, we desiled of filthines of sins, we halfe dead, eat the body of the Lord worthily? We will rather think that we being pure come to the liberall giver, we sick to the phisician, we sinners to the author of righteousness, finally we dead men to him that giveth life: that that worthinesse which is commanded of God, consisteth chiefly of Faith, which repofeth all things in Christ and nothing in vs: and next of charitie, and the selfe same charitie which it is enough to offer vnperfect to God, that he may increase it to better, forasmuch as it cannot be given perfect. Some other agreeing with vs in this, that the worthinesse is selfe consisteth in Faith and charitie: yet in the measure of worthinesse have gone farre out of the way, requiring a perfection of Faith, whereunto nothing may be added, and a charitie egall with that which Christ hath shewed to vs. But hereby they doe none otherwise than those other before, draine all men away from coming to this holie Supper. For if their sentence should take place, no man should receive but vnworthily, forasmuch as all without exception should bee helden guilte and consist of their vnperfectnesse. And truely it were a point of two much amazed dulnesse, I will not say foolishnesse, to require such perfection in the Sacrament, as may make the Sacrament void and superfluous: which was not ordained for the perfect, but for the weake and feeble to awake, to stirre vp, to prickle forward and exercise the affection of faith and charitie, and to correct the default of either of them.

43 But so much as concerneth the outward forme of doing, whether faithfull receive it in their hand or no, whether they divide it, or curie one cate that which is given him: whether they put againe the cup in the hand of the dead, or deliver it to next: whether the bread be leaned, or unlea-uened: whether the wine be red or white: it maketh no matter. These things be indifferent and left in the libertie of the Church. Howbeit it is certain that the vglage of the olde Church was, that euerie one shou'de take it into his hande. And Christ said, Divide it among you. The histories report that it was leavened and common bread before the time of Alexander Byscope of Rome, which first delited in unleavened bread: But for what reasow I see not, unlea's wete with a newe froght to drawe the eyes of the common people to wonder at it, rather than to instruct their minds with good religion. I aduere all them that are touched with any though but light ycale of godliness, to tel whether they do not euidenty see, both howe much more brightly the glorie of GOD shineth herein, and howe much more abundant sweeteneze of spirituall comfort commeth to the faithfull, than in these cold and player like trsles, which bring none other vice but to deceive the sense of the amazed people. This they call the holding of the people in religion, when being made foolish & senfel. se with superstition it is drawen whether they lift. If any man will defende such inventions by antiquitie, I my selfe also am not ignorant how auncient is the vice of chriseine, and bloowing in Baptismo: Howtie to the age of the Apostles the Supper of the Lords was infected with ruine: but this verily is the waiwandness of mans boldnessse, which can not wniolde itselfe but that it must alwaie play and bee wanton in the mysteries of GOD. But let vs remember that GOD doeth to highly esteeme the obedience of his word: he willeth vs in it: to judge both his angels and the whole wolda. Now, bidding farewell to so great a peace of ceremonies: it might thus have been most courly ministred, if it were oft and at least every weeker before the Church, but that first they should beginne with publique prayers: then a sermon should be made, then the minister, haung bread and wine set upon the boorde, should rehearse the institution of the supper: and then should declare the promisses that are in it left unto vs: and therewithal should excommunicate all them that by the Lords forbidding are debarred from it; afterwarde they should pray with what liberalitie the Lord hath giuen vs this holy fooode, he would instruct & frame vs also with the same faith, and thankeswene of minde to receive it, and that so much as we are not of our selues, he woulde of his mercie make vs worthy of such a banke: that then either Pfalmes should be sung, or somewhat read, and the faithful should in secomely order communicate of holy banke, the ministers breaking the bread and giuing it to the people: that when the supper is ended, exhortation should bee made to pure faith & confession of faith, to charitie, and to maners meete for Christians: last of all that giuing of thanks should be rehearsed, and praises be song to GOD which being ended the congregation should be set goe in peace.

44 These things that we haue hitherto spoken of this Sacrament doe largely shewe, that it was not therefore ordyned, that it should bee receiued yearely once, and that lightly for maners sake, (as nowe commonly the custome is,) but that it should bee in often vice to all Christians that with often remembrance they shoulde repeate the passion of Christ; by which remembrance they might subteyne and strenthen their Faith, and exhort themselves to sing confession of praise to GOD, and to publishe his goodness: finally by which they might newesifie the mutuell charitie, and re-stitue it among themselves, whereof they sawe the knot in the vnitie of y body of Christ. For so ofte as we communicate of the signe of the body of the Lord, we doe as by a token giuen and receiued, interchaungeably binde our selves one to another vnto all dutie of love, that none of vs do any thing whereby he may offende his brother, nor leaue any thing vndone whereby he may help him, when neede requireth and abilitie sufficeth. That such was the vse of the Apostolike Church, Luke x. heare seeth in the Acts, when he faide that the faithfull were continuing in the doctrine of the Apostles, in communicating in breaking of bread, and in prayers. So was it altogether neeted to be done, that there should be no assemblie of the Church without the word, prayers, partaking of the Supper and almes. That this order was also instituted among the Corinthisians, we may sufficiently gather of Paul and it is certaine that in many ages afterwarde it was in vse. For theereupon came those olde Canons, which they father vpon Anacleto and Callistus, that when the consecration is done, all shoulde communicate, that will not be without the doers of the Church, and it is red in those old Canons, which they call the canons of the apostles, that they which continue not vnto the ende, and do not receive the holy Communion, must bee correctted as men that moue vnquietnesse of the Church. Also in the Councell at Antioch, it was decreed that they which enter into the Church, and heare the scriptures, and doe absten from the communion, shoulde be remoued from the Church, till they have amended this faulte. Which although in the first Councell at Tolosum it was either somewhat qualified or at least fet forth in milder wordes yet it is there also decreed, that they, which when they have hearde the sermon, are founde never to communicate, shoulde be warned; if after warning they absteyne, they shoulde be debarred from it.

45. Verily by these ordinances the holy men meant to retaine & maintaine the often vse of the Communion, which often vse they had received fro the Apostles the firstes, which they saw to be most wholesome for faithfull, and by little & little by the negligence of the common people to grow out of vse. Augustin testifieth of his owne time: The Sacrament (faith he) of this thing, of the vnitie of the Lordes body, is somewhere daily, somewhere by certayne distances of the dayes, prepared vnto the Lordes table; and is there receiued at the table, to some vnto life, to others vnto destruction. And in the first Epistle to Januarius: some doe daie in daie communicat ye body and bloude of the Lord: some receiue it at certayne dayes: in some places there is no day let passe wherein it is not offered in some other places onely vpon the Saturday and the Sunday, and in some other places never but on the Sunday, But forasmuch as the common people was (as we have saide) somewhat slacke, the holy men did call earnestly vpon them with sharpe rebukinges, lest they shoulde seeme to winke at such slothfulness. Such an example is in Chrysostome vpon the Epistle to the Ephesians. It is not saide vnto him that dishonoured ye banker: wherefore didst thou sitt downe? but wherefore didst thou come in? Whoseuer is not partaker of the mysteries, he is wicked and shamelesse for that he standeth here present. I beseech you if any be called to a banker, whereth his handes, streeth downe, seemeth to prepare his selfe to eat; and then deeth caste of nothing: that he not shame both the banker and the maker of the banker? So thou standing among among them that with prayer doe prepare themselves to receive the holy meat, hast euen in this that thou hast not gone away, confessed that thou art one of the number of them, at the last thou dost not partake hast it not bin better that thou hadst not bin present? Thou wilt say, I am unworthy. Therefore neither wait thou worthy of the communion of prayer, which is a preparing to the receiving of the holy mystery.

46 And truly this custome, which commandeth to communicate yereely once, is a most certaine institution of the deuil, by whose mimisletic focuer it was brought in. They say that Zepherinus was author of that decree, which it is not likely to haue bene such as we nowe haue it. For he by his ordinance did peraduenture not after the worst manner prouide for the church, as the times then were. For it is no doubt but that then y holic supper was set before the faithfull so oft as they came together in assembly, neither is it any doubt but y a good part of them did communike. But when it scarcey at any time happened that all did communike together, and whereas it was necessarie y they which were mingled with profane men and idolaters, should by some outward signe testify their faith: the holy man for order and policies fake appointed that day, where in the whole people of Christians shold be partaking of the Lords supper utter a confession of their faith. The ordinance of Zepherinus beeing otherwise good hath beene cuill wrested of them that came after, when a certaine lawe was made of one communicatting yereely: whereby it is come to passe, that almost all men when they have once communicat, as though they had gaily discharged them selves for at the rest of the yere, sleepe soundly on both cares: it ought to haue bin farre otherwise done. Every weeke at the least, the Lords table should be set before the assembly of the Christians: the promises should be declared, which might feede vs spiritually at it: none should indeede be compelled by necessity, but all should bee exhorted and pricked forward: the sluggishnesse also of the slothfull should be rebuked. All should by heapes, as hungrie men, come together to such dainty vs. Not without right full cause therefore at the beginning I complained, that by the craft of the deuil this custome was thrust in, which when it appointeth one certaine day of the yeare, maketh men slothfull for all the rest of the yere. We see in deede that this peruerse abuse was crept in euen in the time of Chrysostome: but wee may also therewithall see how much it displeased him. For he complained with greeuous wordes in the same place which I enen now alleagled, there is so great inequalitie in this matter, that ouen in some times of the yeare they came not euen when they were cleane, but at Easter they came euen when they were uncleane. Then he crieth out: O custome, O presumption. Then in vaine is the daily offering vid: in vaine we stand at the altar: there is none that partaketh together with vs. So farre is it off that he allowed it by his authoritie adiowned to it.

47 Out of the same shop proceeded also another ordinance, which hath stolen away or violently taken away the half of the supper from the better number of the people of God, namely the signe of the bloude, which being denied to lay & profane me, for with such titles forsooth they set out Gods inheritance became a peculiar possession to shauen and appointed men.

It is the commandement of the eternall God, that all shou'd drink: which commadement man dare discontinue and repel with a newe & contrarie law, commanding that not all should drink. And these lawmakers should not seeme to fight without reason against their God, they pretend peril's that might happen if this holy cup were commonly given to all: as though those dangers had not bene foreseen & marked of the eternall wisdome of God. And then furctly for goth they reason, that the one is enough for both. For if they be the body, it is whole Christ, which cannot now be seuered from his body. Therefore by accompanying the body containeth the blood. Lo howe our wit agreeith with God, when it hath never so little begun with loose reines, to be wanton and wilde. The Lord shewing bread faith that it is his body: when hee sheweth the cup, he calleth it his bloude. The boldnes of mans reason, crieth our contrariwise, that the bread is the bloude; and the wine is the bodie: as though the Lord had for no cause seuered his body from his bloude both in wordes and in signes: or as though it had ever bene heard spoken that the bodie or bloude of Christ is called God & man. Verily if he had meant to signify whole himselfe, he might have said it is I: as he is wont to speake in the scriptures, and not, this is my body, this is my bloude. But he willing to helpe our weaknesse, did set the cup seuerally from the bread, to teach that he sufficeth no lesse for drink then for meate. Nowe let one part be taken away, then wee shall finde but the one halfe of the nourishments in him. Therefore, although it be true which they pretend, that the bloude is in the bread by way of accompanying, and againe, the body in the cup, yet they defraude godly soules of the confirmation of faith which Christe delivereth vs as necessarie. Therefore bidding their furcties farewell, we must hold fast the profit which is by the ordinance of Christ in the two earnefts.

48 I know in deede that the ministers of Sathan do here cauil, as it is an ordinarie thing with them to make mockery of the Scriptures. First they allege that of one bare doing ought not to be gathered a rule wherby the Church should be bound to perpetuall obseruing. But they lie when they say that it was but a bare doing: for Christ did not only deliver the cup, but also did institute that his Apostles should in time to come do the same. For they are the wordes of a commander, drink ye all of this cup, And Paul so rehearseth that it was a deede, that he also commendeth it for a certaine rule. Another starting hole is, that the apostles alone were receiued of Christ to the partaking of this supper whom he had already chosen & taken into the order of the sacrificing priestes. But I woulde haue them answer me to suche questions, from which they shal not be able to escape, but that they shall be easely convinced with their lies. First, by what oracle have they this solution revealed, beeing so straung from the word of God? The Scripture reckoneth twelue that fate with Iesus; but it doeth not so obserue the dignities of Christ that it calleth them sacrificing priestes of which name we will speake hereafter in place for it. Though he gave it then to the twelue, yet he commanded that they shou'd doe the same, namely that they shou'd so distribute it among them. Secondly, why in that better age, from the Apostles almost a thousand yeares, were all without exception made made partakers of both the signes was the old church ignorant what guests Christ had receiued to his Supper? It were a point of most depeate shamelessne, here to sticke and daily in granting it to be true. Ther e remaine the ecclesiasticall histories, ther remaine the books of the olde writers, which minifter evident testimonies of this matter. The seafe (sayth Tertullian) is fed with the body and bloud of Christ, that the soule may be fatted with seeing vpon God. Howe (sayde Ambrose to Theodosius) wilt thou receive with such hands the holy body of the Lorde? With what boldenesse wilt thou with thy mouth partake of the cup of y'precious bloud? And Hierome sayth. The Priests which make the Thankesgiving, and doe distribute the bloud of the Lorde to the people. Chrysostome, Not as in the olde lawe the Priest did eate part, and the people part: but one body is set before all, and one cuppe. Those things that pertaine to the Thankesgiving are all common betweene the priest and the people. The selfe same thing doeth Augustine testifie in many places.

49 But why dispute I about a thing most knowne? Let all the greekes and Latine writers be read ourselfe testimonies shal shew where offer the elues. Neither was this custome grown ouer oue, while there remainede one drop of purenesse in the church. Gregorie, whom ye may righthely se to have bene the selfe Bishop of Rome, teacheth that it was kept in his time. What is the bloud of the Lamb, ye have now learned, not by hearing but by drinking. His bloud is poured into the mouthes of the faithful. Yea it yet endured foure hundred yeares after his death, when all things were grown ouer of kinde. For neither was that taken only for an vantage, but also for an inviolable law. For then was in force the reverence of Gods institution, & they doubted not if it was sacrilege, to seuer those things which the Lord had coiyned. For thus faith Gelasius. We haue founde, y'one receiuing only the portion of the holy body, do abstain frō the cup. Let them with out doubt, because they seeme to be bound with I wot not what superstition, either receiue the sacraments whole, or be debarred frō the whole. For y diuiding of this mysterie is not comitted without great sacrilege. ThoReasons of Cyprian were heard, which truly ought to move a chriitian mind. How sayth he, do we teach or prouoke them to shed their bloud in the confessing of Christ, if we deny his bloud to the that shall fight? Or how do we make them sit for the cup of Martyrdom, if we do not sit in the church by the right of communion admet them to drink the cup of the Lord. Wheras the canonists do restraine that decreas of Gelasius to the priests, that is so childish a cauiat that it neede not to be contested.

50 Thridly, why did he simply say of the bred, that they should eat; but of the cup, that they should drinke; even if hee had meant offset purpose to sticke with the craft of Satan. Fourthly, if(as they would haue it) the Lord vouchsafed to admit to his supper only sacrificing priests, what manuer durst call to the partaking of it, strangers whom the Lord had excluded? yea and to be partaking of that gift, the power whereof was not in their handes, without any commandement of him which only could give it? Yea upon confidence of what warrant do they vse at this day to distribute to the common people the signes of the body of Christ, if they haue neither commcommandement nor example of the Lorde? Firstly, did Paul lye, why he said to the Corinthians, that he had received of the Lord that which he had declcued to them: For afterwarde he declareth the thing that he delivred, that all without difference should communicate of both the signes. If Paul receiued of the Lord, that all should be admitted without difference: let the looke of whom they have received which doe drive away almost all the people of God: because they can not nowe pretend God to be the author of it, with whom there is not yea and nay. And yet full for cloaking of such abomina-tions they dare pretend the name of the Church, and with such pretence defend it. As though either these Antichrists where the church, which so easilie tread vnderfooote, scatter abroad, and destroy the doctrine and institu-tion of Christ: or the Apostolike Church were not the church, in which the whole force of religion flourished.

The xvii. Chapter.

Of the Popish Masse, by which sacrifice the Supper of Christ hath not one else bin prophaned, but also brought to nought.

With these and like inuentions Satan hath travailed, as by ouerspreading of darkenesse to obscure and defile the holy supper of Christ, that at least the purenesse of it should not be kept still in the Church. But the heade of horrible abomination was, when hee advanced a signe, by which it might not only be darkened and perverted, but being utterly blotted and abolished should vanish and fall out of the remembrance of men: namelie, whiche he blinded almost the whole world with a most pestilential error that they should beleue that the Masse is a sacrifice and oblation to obtain the forgiveness of sinnes. Howe at the beginning the foundcr sorne of the schoolmen tooke this doctrine, I nothing regard: farewell they with their crabbed subtilties: Which howsoever they may be defended with cauilling, yet are therefore to be refused of all good men, because they do nothing else but spread much darkenesse ouer the brightnesse of the supper. Therefore bidding them farewell, let the readers understand that I heere match in fight with that opinion, wherwith the Romaine Antichriste and his prophets have infected the whole worlde: namely that the masse is a worke whereby the sacrificing Prieft which offereth vp Christ, and the other that do partake at the same oblation, do deserve the favoure of GOD: or that it is a cleansing sacrifice, whereby they reconcile GOD to themselves. Neither hath this beene receiued only in common opinion of the people, but the verie doing it selfe is so framed, that it is a kinde of parifying wherwith satisfaction is made to GOD for the purging of the quicke and dead. The wordes alio which they use, doe express the same: and no other thing may we gather of the daily use of it. I knowe howe deepe rootees this pestilence hath taken, vnder howe great seeming of goodnes it lurketh, howe it beareth in shewe the name of Chrifte, howe in the one name of Maffe many beleue that they comprehend the whole summe of faith. But when it shalbe by the wordes of God most cleeerly prooued, that this Maffe, how how much more it bee coloured & glorious, yet shamefully dishonoureth Christ,burketh & oppresseth his cross, putteth his death in forgetfulness, taketh away the fruite & commeth thereof vs, doth weaken and destroy the sacrament wherein was left the memorie of his death: shall there then be any so deep rooted, which this most strong axe, I mean the word of god, shall not cut downe & overthowe? Is there any face so beautiful, that this light cannot bewray the euiil which Jarketh under it?

2. Let vs therefore shew that which hath bene in the first place, that in it is intolerable blasphemy & dishonor done to Christ. For he was consecrate of his father a Priest & bishop, not for a time as were reade that they were ordained in the old testament, whose life being mortal their priesthood also could not be immortal; for which cause also there needed successors they should from time to time be put in the place of them that died. But in place of Christ, which is immortal, there needed no vicar to be set after him. Therefore he was ordained of the father a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchisedech, that he should execute an everlasting priesthood. This mysterie had bene long before figured in Melchisedech, whom when the Scripture had once brought in for the priest of the living god, it never afterward made mention of him, as though he had had no ende of his life. After this point of lkenesse, Christ was called a priest according to his order. Nowe they that doe daily sacrifice, must needes appoint priests to make their oblations whom they must appoint as it were successors and vicars in the stead of Christ. By which putting in stead of him, they doe not onely spoile Christ of his honour, and placke from him the prerogative of eternal priesthood, but also travaile to shruft him downe from the right hande of his Father, on which he cannot sit immortal, but that he must therewithall remaine the eternall priest. Neither let them lay for these sues that their pettie sacrificers are not put in place of Christ as if he were dead, but onelie are helpers of his eternal priesthood, which ceaseth not therefore to continue. For they are more strongly holden fast with the wordes of the Apostle, than that they may so escape: namelie, that there were many other priests mad, because they were by death louted to continue. Therefore there is but one that is not letted by death, & he needeth no companions. Yet, such is their scowardness, they arme them selues with the example of Melchisedech to defende their wickedness. For, because it is said that he offered bread and wine, they gather that he was a forshewing of their Maile: as though the lkenesse betwene him and Christ were in the offering of bread and wine. Which is so empty and trifling that it needeth no confutation. Melchisedech gave bread and wine to Abraham and his companions, to refresh them being weary after their journey and battaile. What is this to a sacrifice? Moses praiseth the gentleness of the holy king; these fellowes unreasonably coyne a mysterie whereof no mention is made. Yet they deceitfullie paint their error with another colour, because it followeth by and by after, and he was priest of the highest God. I anfwere, that they wilfully draw to the bread & wine that which the apostle referreth to the blessing. Therefore when hee was the priest of God he blessed Abraham. Whereupon the same Apostle (than whom we neede to secke no better evpistor) gathereth his his excellency, because the lesser is blessed of the greater. But if the oblation of Melchisedec were a figure of the sacrifice of the Mass, would the Apostle pray you, which searcheth out all even the least things, have forgotten so earnest and weightie a thing? Nowe (howsoever they trite) they shall in vaine goe about to overthrowe the reason to which the Apollos himselfe bringeth, that the right and honour of sacrificing priesthood is askest among mortall men, because Christ which is immortal, is the onely and perpetuall sacrificing priest.

3 An other vertue of the Mass was, that it oppressed and buried the crosses and passion of Christ. This vertue is most certaine, that the cross of Christ isuerthrowen so soone as the altar is set vp. For it he offered himself for a sacrifice upon the cross, that he might sanctifie vs for ever, and purchase vs eternal redemption: undoubtedly the force and effectuall nature of that sacrifice continueth without any end. Otherwise we should think no thing more honourably of Christ, than of oxen and calves which were sacrificed under the law: the offerings whereof are proved vnesffectual & weake by this that they were oft reneged. Wherefore either we must confesse, that the sacrifice of Christ, which he fulfilled upon the cross, wanted the force of eternal cleansing, or that Christ hath made an end of all with one sacrifice once for ever. This is it that the Apostle saith, that this chiefest bishop of Christ once appeared by offering vs of himself before the ending of the world, to the driving away of sinne. Againe, That we are sanctified by the will of God, by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once. Again, That Christ with one oblation for ever hath made perfect them that are sanctified: whereunto he adioneth a notable sentence, that forciuences of sines being once purchased, there remains no more any oblation. This also Christ signified by his last saying and uttered among his last gaspings, when he said, it is ended. We are wont to note the last sayings of men when they are dying, for oracles. Christ dying testifieth that by his own sacrifice is perfited & fulfilled whatsoever was for our saluation. Shall it be lawful for us daily to pacch innumerable sacrifices to such a sacrifice, (the perfection whereof he hath so shiningly set forth) as though it were vnperfect? When the holy word of God not onely affirmeth, but also crieth out, and protesteth, that this sacrifice was once fully done that the force thereof remaineth everlasting: who so require an other sacrifice, do they not accuse this of imperfection and weakenes? But as for the Mass, which hath beene deliuered in such sort that there may every day be made a hundred thousand sacrifices, to what end tendeth it, but that the passion of Christ whereby he offered him an only sacrificed oblation to the father, should he buried & drowned? Who, vnlesse he be blind, cannot see that it was the boldnes of Satan, which was filed against so open and cleare truth? Neither am I ignorant with what decreits that Father of lying vifeth to colour this his fraud, saying that there are not fundrie nor diuers sacrifices, but that one selfe same sacrifice is repeated. But such smokes are easily blown away. For in the whole discours the Apostle travaileth to proue not only that there are no other sacrifices, but that one sacrifice was once offered vp, & that no more be repeated. The susteller men do yet slip out at a narrower hole, saying, that it is not a repeating but but an applying. But this Sophisticall argument also is no leffe calme contended. For neither did Christ once offer vp himselfe with this condition: that his sacrifice should be daily confirmed with new oblations: but by the preaching of the Gospel, & ministring of the holy Supper, the fruit thereof should be communicated vnto vs. So Paul faith that Christ our pasqueower was oftered vp, & biddeth vs to eate of him. This (I say) is the meane whereby the Sacrifice of the Croffe is rightly applied to vs, when it is communicated to vs to take the vs of it, & we with true faith receiue it.

4 But it is worth the labour to heare, with what other foundation beside these they vphold the sacrifice of the Mass. For they drawe to this purpose the prophecie of Malachie, whereby the Lord promiseth that the time shall come when throughout the whole world there shall be offered to his name incense and a cleane sacrifice. As though it were a newe or vnwonted thing among the prophets, when they speake of the calling of the Gentiles to express by the outward ceremone of the lawe the spirituall worshipping of God, to which they exhort them, that they might the more familiarly declare to the men of their age, that the Gentiles should be called into the true fellowship of religion. Like as also they are wont altogether to describe by figures of their law, the truth that was delievered by the Gospel. So they set for turning to the Lord, ascending into Jerusalem for the worshipping of God, the offering of all kinds of gifts: for larger knowledge of him which was to be giuen to the faithful in the kingdom of Christ, dreams & visions. That therefore which they allege, is like vnto another prophecie of Esay, where the Prophet foretellth of three altars to be set vp in Assyria, Egypt, and Judy. For first I aske, whether they doe not grant that the fulfilling of this prophecie is in the kingdom of Christ. Secondly, where be these altars, or when they were euer set vp. Thirdly whether they thinke that to e-eery seuerall kingdom is appointed a seuerall Temple, suche as was that at Jerusalem. These things if they weigh, I thinke they wil eoyeste, that the Prophet vnder figures agreeable to his time, prophesie with of the spiritual worship of God to be spread abroad into the whole world. Which we give to the for a solution. But of this thing fith there doe euerie where examples commonly offer themselves, I will not busie my selfe in longer rehearsal of them.
Howbeit herein also they are miserably deceived, that they acknowledge no sacrifice but of the Mass, whereas in deed the faithfull doe now sacrifice to the Lord, & do offer a cleane offering of which shall be spoken by and by.

5 Nowe I come downe to the third office of the Mass, where I must declare howe it blotteth our the true and onelie death of Christ, & that-keith it out of the remembrance of men. For as among men the strengthe of a Testament hangeth vpon the death of the testator: so also our Lorde hath with his death confirmed the testament whereby he hath giuen vs forgiveness of sinnes and eternall righteousness. They that dare varie or make newe anything in this testament, doe deny his death, and holde it as it were of no force. But what is the Mass, but a newe and altogether diverse testaments? For why? Doeth not euery seuerall Mass promise newe forgu-ness of sinnes, newe purchasing of righteousness? So that nowe there bee so many testaments, as there be Masses? Let Christ therefore come againe, and
Cap. 18. Of the outwarde means.

and with another death confirmsthis testament, or rather with infinite deathes confirmethnumerable testamentsof Masse. Haue I not therefore laid true at the beginning, that the only and true death of Christ is blouded out by Masse? Yea what shall we say of this that the Masse directly tendeth to this end, that if it be possible, Christ should be slaine againe? For where is a testament (faith the Apostle): here of necessitie must be the death of the testator. The Masse sheweth it selfe to be a new testament of Christ: therefore it reuayeth his death. Moreover the boffe which is offered, must necessarily be slaine and sacrificed. If Christ in every seuerall Masse be sacrificed, then hee must at every moment bee in a thousande places cruellly slaine.
This is not minde, but the Apostles argument, if he had needed to offer himselue off, he must oft have died since the beginning of the worlde. I knowe that they haue an aunswere in readinesse, whereby also they charge vs with flander. For they say that that is objected against them which they never thought, nor yet can. And wee knowe, that the death and life of Christ is not in their hand. We looke not whether they goe about to kill him: onely our purpose is to shew what manner of absurditie followeth of their va-godly and wicked doctrine. Which selue thing I produce by the Apostles owne mouth. Though they crieth out to the contrary a hundred times, that this sacrificie is vnbloudie: I will denie that it hangeth upon the will of men, that sacrificies should change their nature, for by this means the holy & invioable ordinance of God should faile. Whereupon followeth that this is a sure principle of the Apostle, that there is required shedding of blood, that washing may not be wanting.

6 Now is the fourth office of the Masse to be entreated of, namely to take away from vs the fruite that came to vs of the death of Christ, while it maketh vs not to acknowledge it and thinke upon it. For who can call to minde that he is redeemed by the death of Christ when he seeth a newe redemption in the Masse? Who can trust that sinnes are forgiven him, when he seeth a newe forgivenesse? Neither shall he escape that shall say, that we do for no other cause obtaine forgivenesse of sinnes in the Masse, but because it is alreadie purchased by the death of Christ. For he bringeth nothing else than as if he should bothe, that Christ hath redeemed vs with this condition that we should redeeme our selues. For such doctrine hath beene spread by the ministers of Satan, & such at this day they maintaine with crying out with swords and fire, that we when in the Masse we off vp Christ to his Father, by this worke of offering do obtaine forgivenesse of sinnes, & are made partakers of the passion of Christ. What nowe remaineth to the passion of Christ, but to be an example of redemption, whereby we may learne to be our owe redeemers? Christ himselfe, when in the Supper he fealeth the confidence of pardon, doth not bid his discipules to sticke in that doing, but sendeth them away to the sacrificie of his death: signifying that the Supper is a monument or memorial (as the common speech is) whereby they may learne that the satisfactorie cleansing sacrificie, by which God was to be appeased, must have bene offered but once. For neither is it enough to knowe that Christ is the onely sacrificie, vnlesse the onely sacrificie be joyned with it, that our faith may be fastened to his cross.
7 Now I come to the conclusion, namely that the holy Supper, in which the Lord had left the remembrance of his passion graven and expressed, is by the setting vp of the Maffe, taken away, defaced, and destroyed. For the Supper itself is the gift of God, which was to be received with thanksgiving. The sacrifice of the Maffe is fained to pay a price to God, which he may receive for satisfaction. How much difference there is between to give and to receive, so much more the sacrifice differs from the Sacrament of the Supper. And this truly is the most wretched unthankfulness of man, that where the largesse of God's bounty ought to have been acknowledged, and thanks to be given, there he maketh God his debtor. The Sacrament promised, that by the death of Christ we are not only once restored into life, but are continually quickened, because then all the parts of our salvation were fulfilled. The sacrifice of the Maffe signifies a far other song, that Christ must be daily sacrificed, that he may fomewhat profit vs. The Supper should have been distributed in the common assembly of the Church, that it might enforce vs of the communion whereby we are cleave together in Christ Jesus. The sacrifice of the Maffe dissolueth and plucketh in sunder this community. For after that the error grew in force, that there must be sacrificers that should sacrifice for the people, the Supper of the Lord as though it were past over to them, ceased to bee communicated to the congregation of the faithful according to the commandement of the Lord. A sacrifice was made open to private Masses, which might rather resemble a certaine excommunication, than that same community ordained of the Lord, when any sacrifice willing generally by himselfe to devour his sacrifice, doth feuer himselfe from the whole people of the faithful. I call privat Masse (lest any man be deceived) wherefoever there is no partaking of the Lords Supper among the faithful, although otherwise a great multitude of men be present.

8 And whiche the verie name of Maffe first sprong, I could never certainly judge, that it seemeth to me likely that it was taken of the offerings that were given. Whereupon the olde writers use it commonly in the plural number. But to leaue striuing about the name, I say that privat Masses are directly against the ordinance of Christ, and therefore they are a wicked prophaning of the holy Supper. For what hath the Lord commanded vs? nor to take, and divide it among vs? What manner of observing of the commandement doth Paul teach? not the breaking of bread, which is the communion of the body & blood? Therefore when one taketh it without distributing, what like asse is there? But that same one man doth it in his name of the whole church. By what commandement? Is not this openly to mock god, when one man privately taketh to himself that which ought not to have beene done but among many? But because the wordes of Christ and Paul are plain enough, we may briefly conclude, that wherefoever is not breaking of bread to the communion of the faithful, there is not the supper of the Lord, but a vsle and wrongfull counterfeit of the supper. But a vsle counterfeiting is a corrupting. Now the corrupting of so great a mysterie is not without wickednes. Therefore in privat massies is a wicked abuse. And (as one fault in religion from time to time breedeth another) after that that manner of offering

Offering without communion was once crept in, by little and little, they began in every corner of churches to make innumerable Masses, and diversly to drawe the people hither and thither, which should have come together into one assembly, that they might reknowledge the mysterie of their owne mysteries. Now let them goe and deme it to be idolatrie, that in their Masses, they shew forth bread to be worshipp'd in stead of Christ. For in vaine they boast of those promisinges of the presence of Christ, which howsoever they be understandeth, verily were not given to this purpose, that wicked & profane men so oft as they will: and to whatsoever abuse they list, may make the body of Christ: but that the faithful, when with religious observation they doe in celebrating of the Supper follow the commandement of Christ, may enjoy the true partaking of him.

9 Beside that, this peruerse was unknovvn to the purer church. For howsoever the more shameles for among our adversaries do here go about to disguise the matter with false colours, yet is it most sure that all antiquitie is against them, as we have afore proued in other things, and it may more certainly be judged by the continuall reading of old writers. But ere I make an ende of speaking of it, I ask our Massing doctors, whether they know that obedience is more esteemed of God than oblations, and that he more requireth that his voice be harden to, than that sacrifices bee offered: howe they beleue that this manner of sacrificing is acceptable to God, whereof they have not certaine commandement, and which they see not to be allowed by any one syllable of the Scripture. Moreover when they heare the Apostle say, that no man takest to himselfe the name & honor of sacrificing priesthood, but he that is called as Aaron was, yea & that Christ himselfe did not thrust in himselfe, but obeyed the calling of his Father: either they must bring forth God the author & ordainer of their sacrificing priesthood, or they must confesse that the honour is not of God, into which they have with wicked flashes brok in uncalled. But they cannot shew one title of a lettere mainteineth their sacrificing priesthood. Why therefore shall not their sacrifices vanish away which can not be offered without a priest?

10 If any man do thrust in short sentences of the olde writers gathered here & there, and do by their authoritie travaile to prove that the sacrifice which is done in the supper is farre otherwise to be understood than we doe expounde it: let him be breffield answered thus: if the question be of allowing the forged devise of sacrifice, such as the Papistes have faigned in the Mass, the olde writers doe never speake in defence of such sacrilege. They do in deed use the word Sacrifice: but therewithall they expounde, that they meane nothing els but the remembrance of that true and only sacrifice, which Christ our only sacrificing priest (as they ech where reporte of him) made on the croffe. The Hebrewes (faith Augustine) in the sacrifices of beasts which they offered to God, did celebrate a prophesie of the sacrifice to come, which Christ offered: the Christians doe with the holy oblation and partaking of the body of Christ celebrate a remembrance of the sacrifice already made. Here verily be teacheth altogether the same thing, which is written in most wordes in the booke of faith to Peter the deacon, whosoever be the author of it. The wordes be these, Beleeue most faithly faithly & doubt not at all, that the only begotten himself, being made flesh for us, offered himself for vs a sacrifice and oblation to God into a favour of sweetness: to whom the Father and the Holy Ghost in the time of old testament beasts were sacrificed: and to whom now with the father and the holy Ghost (with whom he hath one godhead) the holy Church throughout the whole world ceaseth not to offer the sacrifice of bread and wine. For in those fleshly sacrifices was a figuring of the flesh of Christ which he thought offer for our sinnes: and of his blood which he should shed to the forgiveness of sinnes: But in this sacrifice is thanksgiving and rehear-sal of the flesh of Christ which he offered for vs. Whereupon Augustine himselfe in many places expoundeth it to be nothing else but a sacrifice of praise: Finally you call commonly find in him, the supper of the Lord is for no other reason called a sacrifice, but because it is the remembrance, image and witnesses of that singular, true, and only sacrifice wherewith Christ hath cleansed vs. Also there is a notable place in his fourth booke of the Trinitie the xxiii. Chapter where after that he hath discoursed of the only sacrifice he thus concludes: because in a sacrifice fewer things are considered, to whom it is offered, and of who, what is offered, and for whom. The same he himselfe the one and true mediator reconciling vs to God by the sacrifice of peace, remaineth one with him to whom he offered: maketh them one in him for whom he offered: is one himselfe which offered, and the thing which he offered, To the same effect also speaketh Chrysostome. But they so challenge the honour of sacrificing priesthood to Christ, that Augustine testifieth it to be the voice of Antichrist if any man make a Bishop in cerebror between God and men.

Yet doe we not deny but that the offering vp of Christ is there so shewed in vs, that the spectacle of the crosse is in a manner set b. for our eyes: as the Apostle saith that Christ was crucified in the eyes of the Galatians, when the preaching of the crosse was set before them. But forasmuch as I see those old Fathers also wrested this remembrance another way than was agreeable with the institution of the Lord (because their supper contained not what repeated or at least renewed forme of sacrificing) the selfe way for godly hearts shalbe to rest in the pure & simple ordinance of God: whose also the supper is therefore called: because in it his authority alone ought to be in force. Truely fith I find that they have kept a godly and true sense of this whole mystery: and I do not perceiue that they meant to abate any thing were it never so little from the only sacrifice of the Lord, I cannot condemn them of ungodliness: yet I thinke they cannot be excused, but theire offended somewhat in the manner of the celebration. For they counterfaite the Jewish manner of sacrificing more nearly than either Christ had ordained, or the nature of the Gospel did bear. Therefore that same over-thwart appliance to heavenly things is the only thing whereby a man may worthy blame them, for that being not conformed with the simple & natural institution of Christ they swerved to the shadowes of the law.

If a man doe diligently way, that this difference is put by the word of the Lord betweene the sacrifices of Moses, and our Thanksgiving, that whereas those did represent to the Jewish people, the same effectuallnesse Qqq of the death of Christ, which is at this day delivered to vs in the supper, yet the manner of representing was diverse. For in those, the Leuitical priests were commanded to figure that which Christ should performe it: there was brought a sacrifice which should be in the stead of Christ himself: there was an altar whereupon it should be offered: Finally all things were so done, y there was set before their eyes an image of that sacrifice which was to be offered to God for a satisfactional cleansing. But since the time that the sacrifice is ended the Lorde hath appointed to vs another order: namely that it should come to the faithfull people the fruit of the sacrifice offered to him by the sonne. Therefore he hath givn vs a table whereat we shoulde eate, not an altar whereupon sacrifice should be offered: see hath not consecrated priests to sacrifice, but ministers to distribute the holy bount. Howe much more hee and holy the mysterie is, so much more religiously & with greater reverence it is meete to be handled. Therefore there is no way fater, than putting away all boldnesse of mans vnderstanding, to sticke fast in that alone which the Scripture teacheth. And truly if wee consider that it is the Supper of the Lorde and not of men, there is no cause why we should suffer our selves to be removed one heire breadth from it by any authoritie of men or prescription of yeares. Therefore when the Apostle minded to cleanse it from all faulutes which had alreadie crept into the Church of the Corinthians, hee vseth the readiest way thereunto, that is, he calleth it backe to the onely institution of it, from whence he sheweth that a perpetual rule ought to be fetched.

13 Nowe least any wrangler, shoulde flit the vs of the sacrifice, and sacrificing priest, I will also declare, but yet breedly what in the whole discourse I haue meant by a sacrifice, and what by a sacrificing priest. Whereof I stretche the word sacrifice to all holy Ceremonies and doings of religion, I see not by what reason they doe it. We doe knowe that by the continuall use of Scripture a sacrifice is called that which the Greekes call sometime Thysia, sometime Prosphora, somtime Telec. Which being generally taken comprehended whatsoever is in any wife offered to God. Wherefore we must make distinction: but yet so, that this distinction may haue a supernall appliance of similitude from the sacrifices of the lawe of Moses: vnder the shadowes whereof the Lorde willed to represent to his people the whole truth of sacrifices. Of those although there were diverse forms, yet they may all be referred to two sortes. For either there was oblation made for sinne after a certaine manner of satisfaction, whereby guiltinesse was redeemed before God: or it was a signe of the worshipping of God, and a testifying of religion: sometime in stead of suppliation, to crave the favoure of God: sometimes instead of thanksgiving, to testifie thankfulnesse of minde for benefits received: sometime only for an exercise of godlinesse, to renewe the establishing of the covenaut: to which latter sort pertained burnt offerings, drinke offeringes, oblations, first fruytes, and peace offeringes. Wherefore let vs also divide ours into two kindes: and for teachynges sake let vs call the one the sacrifice of worship and of Godly dutie, because it consisteth in the honouring and worshipping of GOD, which the faithfull both owe and yelde unto him: or, if you will, the sacrifice

The name of sacrifice, two kinds thereof in the law, in the Gospell two other thercunto as favorable.
The sacrifice of oblation, as much as it is given to God of none but of them that being loden with immeasurable benefits, do render to him themselves with all their doings. The other may be called propitiatory or of expiation. The sacrifice of expiation is that which tendeth to appease the wrath of God, to satisfy his judgment, and to wash and wipe away sins; whereas the sinner cleansed from the filthy spots of them, and restored into purity of righteousness, may return into favour with God himself. So in the law those were called sacrifices that were offered for the purging of sins; not for that they were sufficient to recover the favor of God, or to put away iniquity: but for that they shadowed out such a true sacrifice which at length was fully done by Christ alone: and by him alone, because it could be done by none other: and once, because the effectualnes and force of that one sacrifice which Christ hath fully done, is eternal, as he himself hath testified by his own mouth, when he said that it was ended and fulfilled: that is to say, that whatsoever was necessarie to the reconciling of the fathers favor, to obtaining of the forgiveness of sins, to righteousness and to salvation, all the same was performed and fulfilled with that his onely oblation, and there is nothing wanted thereof, than there was afterward no place left to any other sacrifice.

Wherefore I determine, that it is a most wicked reproach, & blasphemy not to be suffered, as well against Christ as against the sacrifice which he hath fully done by his death upon the cross: for if any man by renewing an oblation think to purchase the pardon of sins, to appease God, and to obtain righteousness, but what is else done by Massing, but that by distributing of new oblations we may be made partakers of the passion of Christ? And that either may be no measure of madding; they thought it but a small thing to say that there is made indifferently a common sacrifice for the whole Church, unlesse they further said that it is in their choyse to apply it peculiarly to this man or that man to whom they would, or rather to every one whatsoever he were that would buy for himself such ware with ready money. Now because they could not reach to the price that Judas had: yet that they might in some manner resemble their author, they kept the likeness of number, Judas solde him for thirtie silver pence: these fellows fell him, after the French account, for thirtie brassen pence: but Judas solde him once, these fellows solde him as oft as they can finde a buier. In this sense also we deny that they be sacrificing priests, that is to say, that with such an oblation are means to God for the people, they that appeasing God, may purchase the satisfactorie purging of sins. For Christ is the onely by shop & sacrificing priest of the new Testament, into whom all Priesthoodes are removed, and into whom they be shut vp & ended. And if the Scripture had made no mention of the eternall priesthoode of Christ: yet forasmuch as God, since that he hath taken away those old priesthooes, hath ordained none, the apostles argument remaineth invincible, that no man taketh honor to himselfe but he that is called of God. By what assurance therefore dare these robbers of God, that boast themselves for the butchers of Christ, call themselves the sacrificing Priests of the living God?

15 Plato hath an excellent place in his second booke of common weale.

Where when he entreateth of the old manners of expiation, & laugheth to scorn the foolish confidence of evil men and wicked doers, which thought that their wicked doings were by these as by courerings hidden that the Gods could not see them, and did as if they had gotten warrant of the gods by covenants, more carelessly follow their own laws: he seemeth thoroughly to touch the manner of satisfactorie purging of the Masse, such as is at this day in the world, To beguile & undermine another man, all men knowe to be unlawful, To griewe widows with wrongfull dealings, to robbe the Fatherlesse, to trouble the poor, by cull crafty meanes to catch other mens goods to themselves, with forwerings and deceits to enter forceably into any mans possessions, to oppresse any man with violence & tyrannous fear, all men confesse to be wicked. How therefore dare so many commonly doe all these things as though they should freely be bolde to do them? Truely, if we rightly weigh it, no other cause doeth so much encourage them, but because they have confidence, that by the sacrifice of a Masse, as by payment of full price for recompence, they shall satisifie God, or at the least, that this is an easie way to compound with him. Then Plato proceeded further to scorn their gross blockishnesse, which thinke that by such satisfactorie cleansings those paines are redeemed that otherwise they should suffer in hell. And whereto seuere at this day the yeerely obites, and the greater part of Masses, but that they which through all their life haue bene most cruelly tyrants, or most ravenous robbers, or given fourth to all mischivous doings, should as though they were redeemed by this price, escape the fire of purgatory.

16 Under the other kind of sacrifice, which we have called the sacrifice of Thanksgiving, are contained all the dutifull workes of charitie, which when we extend to our brethren, we honour the Lord himselfe in his members; then, all our prayers, praisings, giveinges of thankes, and what soever we do to the worshipping of God. All which things finall do hang upon the greater sacrifice, whereby we are in soule and body halowed to be a holy temple to the Lorde. For neither is it enough, if our outward doinges bee appli- cated to the obeying of him; but first our felues, and then all that is ours ought to be consecrat and dedicate to him, that whatsoever is in vs, may serve his glory, and may fauor of zealous endevour to advance it. This kind of sacrifice tendeth nothing at all to appease the wrath of God, nothing at all to obtaine forguenesse of sinnen, nothing at all to deferue righeousnesse: but is occupied only in magnifying & extolling of God. For it cannot be pleasant and acceptable to God, but at their hands, whom by forguenesse of sinnes already received he hath by other meanes reconciled to himself, and therefore acquited them from guiltiness. But it is so necessarie for the church, that it can not be awaie from it. Therefore it shall be everlasting, so long as the people of God shal continue, as we haue before already shewed out of the prophet: for in that meaning I will take this prophecie, For from the rising of the sunne to the going downe thereof, great is my name among the Gentiles, and in euery place incense shalbe offered to my name, and a clean offering: because my name is terrible among the Gentiles, saith the Lord: so far is it off, that we would put it away. So Paul biddeth vs to offer our bodies a sacrif-

a sacrifice living, holy, acceptable to God, a reasonable worship. Where he spake verie pitifully, when he added that this is our reasonable worshipping: for he meant the spiritual manner of worshipping of God, which he did secretly set in comparison against the carnall sacrifices of the lawe of Moses. So all doing of good and communicating are called sacrifices by which God is pleased. So the liberalitie of the Philippians, whereby they had relieved the poverty of Paul, is called a sacrifice of sweet smelling. So all the good worke of the faithfull are called spiritual sacrifices.

17 And why do we seeke out many examples? For commonly this manner of speaking is often found in the scriptures. Yea and while the people of God was yet holde under the outward schooling of the lawe, yet the Prophets did sufficiently express, that under those carnall sacrifices was the truth, which the Christian Church hath common with the nation of the Jewses. After which manner David prayed, that his prayer might ascende into the sight of God. And Osee called giving of thankes, the calues of lips, which in another place David calleth the sacrifices of praise. Whom the Apostle himselfe following, calleth them also the sacrifices of praise, & expoundeth them the fruities of lipspes confessing to his name. This kind of sacrifice the Supper of the Lord cannot want: wherein when we declare his death and render thanksgiving, wee doe nothing but offer the sacrifice of praise. Of this office of sacrificing, all wee Christians are called a kingly Priesthood: because by Christ we offer to God that sacrifice of praise of which the Apostle speketh, the fruities of lipspes that confess his name. For neither doe we with our gifts appeare in the sight of God without an intercessor; Christ is he, which being the mediator comming betwene, we offer vs and ours to the Father. Hee is our Bishoppe, which being entred into the sanctuarie of heavne, hath opened the entrie to vs. He is the altar, upon which wee lay our gifts, that in him wee may bee boarde all that wee are boarde. It is hee (I say) that hath made vs a kingdome and Priestes to the Father.

18. What remaineth, but that the blinde may see, the deafe may heare, children themselves may understand in this abomination of the Maffe? which being offered in a golden cup, hath made dronke the kings and peoples of the earth, from the hieft to the lowest, hath so stricken them with drowsinesse and giddenesse, that being become more senselss then brutie beasts, they have set the whole ship of their safetie only in this deadly deouering gulf. Truely Satan never did bend himself with a stronger engine than this to affaile and vanquish the kinglydome of Christ. This is the Helene, for whom the enemies of the true fight at this day with so great rage, so great furousnesse, so great crueltie: and a Helene in deed, with whom they do desile themselves with spirituall whoredome, which is the most cursed of all. I doe not here so much as once touch with my lingle finger those greater abuses, where with they might colour the vnholie purenesse of their holy Masse: howe filthyke marketinges they vs, how vnhandy gains they make with their morninges, with how great rauening they fill their courteousnesse. Oonly I doe point vnto, and that with fewe and plaine wordes, what manner of thing is euens the verie holies antique holinesse of the Masse, for which it hath deferued in certain ages past to be so honorable & to be had in so great reuerence, for to have these so great mysteries set out according to their worthinesse, requireth a greater worke: & I am unwilling to mingle herewith those filthie vnicleanesses that commonly thewe themselfes before the eyes and faces of all men, that all men may understand, that the Mass taken in her most piked purenesse: and wherewith it may be set out to the best shew, without her appendances, from the roote to the toppes warmeth full of all kinde of wickednes, blasphemous, idolatrie, and sacrilege.

19 The readers nowe have in a manner almost all those things gathered into an abridgement, which we have thought behovent to be knowne concerning these two Sacramentes: the use of which hath beene delivered to the Christian Church from the beginning of the newe testament, to continue to the verie end of the world: namely, that Baptisme shoulde he as it were a certaine entrie into it, and an admission into faith: and the supper should be as it were a continual food, wherein Christ spiritually feedeth the familie of his faithful. Whereas as there is but one God, one faith, one Christ, one Church, his body: so there is but one Baptisme, and is not oft ministred againe. But the supper is from time to time distributed, that they which have beene once received into the Church, may understand they be continually fed with Christ. Beside these two as there is no other sacrament ordained of God, so neither ought the Church of the faithfull to acknowledge any other. For that it is not a thing that lieth in the choise of man to raise and set vp newe sacraments, he shall easily understand that remembrance, which hath beene here before plainly enough declared, that is, that sacramentes are appointed of God to this end, that they should instruct vs of some promise of his, and testify to vs his good will toward vs: and he also that calleth to minde, that none hath bin Gods counsellor, that might promise vs any certaine of his will, or assure vs, and bring vs out of care, what affection he beareth toward vs, what he will giue, or what he will deny vs. For therewith is also determined, that no man can set forth a signe to be a testimonie of any will or promise of his: it is he himself alone, that can by a signe giuen testify to vs of himselfe. I will speake it more briefly, and parallelly: there is no certaine promise of salvation. All men gathered on a heape together can of themselves promise nothing of their salvation. Therefore neither can they of the seules set forth or set vp a sacrament.

20 Therefore let the Christian Church be contented with these two, and let her not only not admit or acknowledge any thirde for the present time, but also not desire or looke for any to the end of the world. For whereas certaine diverse sacramentes, beside those their ordinarie ones, were giuen to the Iewes according to the diverse course of times, as Manna, Water springing out of the rocke, the brazen serpent and such other: they were by this change put in minde, that they should not stay vpon such figures whose state was not verie steadie: but that they should looke for some better thing from God, which should continue without any decaying, & without any end, But we are in a farre other case, to whom Christ is openly shewed: in whom all the treasures of knowledge and wisedome are hidden with with so great abundance and plenty, that either to hope for or looke for any new encrease to these treasures, is verily to move God to wrath, and to provoke him against vs. Wee must hunger for, seek, looke vpon, learne, and throughly learne Christ alone, vntill that great day shall appear, wherein the Lord shall openly shewe to the full the glorie of his kingdom, and himselue such as he is, to be beholden of vs. And for this reason this our age is in the Scriptures signified by the last hour, the last dayes, the last times, that no man should deceive himselfe with vaine looking for any new doctrine or reuelaion. For many times & in many sortes he spake before of his prophets in these last dayes the heavenly Father hath spoken in his beloved Sonne, which onely can manifestlie shew the Father: and in deed he hath manifestlie shewed him to the full, so much as behoueth vs, while we now behold him by a glasse. As therefore therefore this is now taken away from men, that they cannot make newe Sacraments in the Church of God: so it were to be wisthed, that as little as were possible of manus uenenti might be mingled with those sacramentes that are of God. For like as when water is powered in, the wine departeth and is delayed: and as with leaue scattered among it, the whole lump of doce waxeth fower: so the purenesse of the mysteries of god is nothing else but defiled when man addeth any thing of his owne. And yet we see how farre the sacramentes are swarued out of kinde from their natural purenesse, as they be handled at this day. There is ech where too much of poms, ceremonies, and gestuations: but of the worde of God in mean time there is neither any consideration or mention, without which even the sacramentes themselfes are not sacramentes. Yea and the very ceremonies that are ordained of God, in so great a rout cannot once lift vp their head, but lie as it were oppressed. How little is that scene in baptism, which onely ought there to have shined and beene looked vpon, as we haue in an other place rightfullie complained, even baptism itselfe? As for the supper, it is vitterly buried, since that it hath bene turned into the maffe, sauing that it be scene once cery yeare but in a mangled and halfe torne fashion.

The xix. Chapter.

Of the fite falfeties named Sacramentes: where is declared, that the other five which have bene lisberto commonlie taken for sacramentes, are not Sacramentes:
and thence is shewen vobis manner of thinges they bee.

Ov former discourse concerning Sacramentes might haue obtained this with the sober and willing to learne, that they shoulde not over curiously procede any further, nor should without the worde of God embrace any other Sacramentes besides those two which they knewe to bee ordained of the Lord. But forasmuch as that opinion of the seven sacramentes, being commonly vse'd in all mens talk, having wandred through all schooles and preacheings, hath by verie auncientie gathered routes, and is yet still settled in the mindes of men; I thought that I shoule do a thing worth the travell, if I should feuerally and more necerely search those other fives that are commonly adnumbred among the true and natural Sacramentes of the Lord.

Cap. 19. Of the outward meanes

Lord, & wiping away all deceitfull colour, should set them forth to be scene of the simple such as they be, and how falsely they have bene hitherto take for sacramentes. First, I here protest to all the godly, that I doe not take in hand this contention about the name for any desiring of triuing, but that I am by weightie causes led to fight against the abuse of it. I am not ignorant that Christians are Lords, as of words, so of all things also, & therefore may at their will apply wordes to thinges, so that a godly sense be kept, although there be some vnproperneffe in the speaking. All this I grant: although it were better that the wordes should be made subject to thinges, than things to the wordes. But in the name of Sacrament, there is another consideration. For they which make seven Sacraments, do therewithall give to them all this definition, that they be visible formes of invisible grace: they make them altogether vessels of the holy ghost: instruments of gining of righteousnesse, causes of the obtaining of grace. Yea and the master of the sentence himselfe denyeth that the Sacraments of the Law of Moses are properly called by this name, because they did not deliver in deede the thing that they figured. Is it, I beseech you, to be suffered, that thofe signes which the Lord hath hallowed with his owne mouth, which hee hath garnished with excellent promises, should not bee accounted for Sacramentes; and in the meantime this honour should bee conveyed away to those visages which men either have deuised of themselves, or at least do obtaine without express commandement of God? Therefore either let them change the definition, or let them abstain from the wrongful using of this word, which doth afterward engender false opinions & full of absurditie. Extreme anointing (as they) is a figure and cause of invisible grace, because it is a Sacrament, if we ought in no wise to grant that which they gather upon it, then truly we must refite them in the name it selfe, lest thereby we admit that it may give occasion to such an error. Againe when they would proove it to be a Sacrament, they adds this cause, for that it consisteth of the outward signe and the word. If we finde neither commandement nor promise of it, what can we doe but cry out against them?

2 Now appeareth that we brawle not about the wordes but do moue a controversie not superfluous concerning the thing it selfe. Therefore this we must strongly holde fast, which we have with invincible reason before confirmed, that the power to institute a sacrament is in the hande of none but of God only. For a sacrament ought with a certaine promise to raise vp & comfort the consciences of the faithful: which could never receive this certainty from man. A sacrament ought to be vs a witnessinge of the good will of God toward vs, wherof none of all men or Angels can be witnes, for as much as none hath bene of Gods counsel. Therefore it is he alone which doth with right authority testifie of himselfe to vs by his word. A sacrament is a seal, wherewith the testament or promise of God is sealed. But it could not be sealed with bodily things and elements of this world, vnlesse they be by the power of God framed and appointed thereunto. Therefore man can not ordaine a sacrament, because this is not in the power of man, to make that so great mysteries of God should lye hidden under so base things. The word of God must goe before, which may make a sacrament to be a sacrament.
ment, as Augustine verily well teacheth. Moreover it is profitable that there be kept some difference between the Sacraments and other ceremonies, w ene else we will fall into many absurdities. The Apostles prayed kneeling, therefore men shall not kneele without a Sacrament. It is said that the disciples prayed toward the East: therefore the looking into the East shall be a Sacrament. Paul calleth men in every place to lift vp pure hands, and it is rehearsed that holy men oftentimes prayed with their hands lifted vp, then let the lifting vp of hands also be made a Sacrament. Finally let al ye gestures of the holy ones turne into Sacraments. Howbeit I would not al[o] much passe upon those things, if so that they were not joyned with those other greater discommodiies.

3. If they will presse vs with the authoritie of the old Church, I say that they pretend a false colour. For this number of seuen is nowhere founded among the Ecclesiastical writers: neither is it certain at what time it first crept in. I grant indeed that sometime they bee very free in vnholy name of a Sacrament: but what meane they thereby ? Seuen all ceremonies & out warde rites, and all exercises of Godinesse. But when they speake of those signes that ought to be witnesses of the grace of God toward vs, they are con tented with these two, Baptisme, & the Supper. Least any man should thinke that I falsely boast of this, I will here rehearse a few testimonies of Au gnine. To Iohninus he faith, Frist I would have thee to holde fast that which is the chief point of this disputation, that our Lord Christ (as he himselfe faith in the Gospel) hath made vs subject to a light yoke and a light burden. Wherefore he hath bound together the fellowship of the newe people with Sacraments very few in number, verie easie in obseruing, very excellent in signification. As are Baptisme hallowed in the name of the Trinitie, and the Communicating of the body & blood of the Lorde, & whatsoever else it set forth in the Canonical Scriptures. Again, in his book of Christian doctrine, Since the Lords resurrection, the Lord himself & the doctrine of the Apo stles hath deliuered certaine fewe signes in seede of many, and those most easie to be done, most recuered in understanding, most pure in obseruing: as is Baptisme, and the celebrating of the body and blood of the Lorde. Why doth he here make no mention of the holy number, that is, of the number of seuen? Is it likely that hee woulde have passed it over, if it had beene at that time ordered in the Church, specially futh he is otherwise in obseruing of numbers more curious than neede were? Yea, when he nameth Baptisme and the Supper, and speaketh nothing of the rest : dooth he not sufficiently signify, that these two mysteries do excell in singular dignitie, and that the other ceremonies doe rest beneath in a lower degree ? Wherefore I say that these Sacramentarie Doctors are defitute not onely of the worde of the Lorde, but also of the consent of the olde Church, how much soever they glorie of this pretence. But now let vs come down to the special things themselves.

Of Confirmation

4. This was the maner in olde time, that the children of Christians, when they were grown to age of discretion should be brought before the bishop: that they should suffice that dutie which was required of those that being grown For confirmation as at this day they use it in the Church of Rome their is in the wordes of God no warrant.

Cap. 19. Of the outward meanes grown in yeres did offer themselves to baptism. For these are among those that were to be catechised, til being fully instructed in the mysteries of the faith, they could make a confession of their faith before the bishop and the people. Therefore they that were baptised being infants, because they had not then made confession of their faith before the church, were about the end of their childhood or in the beginning of their yeres of discretion presented againe by their parents, and were examined of the Bishop according to the forme of the Catechisme, which they had the certaine & common. And that this doing, which otherwise ought worthlie to be grave and holy, might have the more reuerence and dignitie, there was added also the Ceremonie of laying on of handes. So that, when childe, his faith being allowed, was let goe with solemnie blessing. The olde writers doe oft make mention of this manner. Leo the Pope wryteth: If any returne from Heretikes, let him not be baptised againe; but (which hee wanted among the Heretikes) let the vertue of the Spirit be given him by the Bishops laying on of his handes. Here our adueraries will crie out, that it is rightlie called a Sacrament, in which the holy Ghost is giuen, but Leo himselfe deeth in an other place declare what he meaneth by these wordes: Who so (sayth hee) is baptised among heretikes, let him not be rebaptised, but with calling upon the holy Ghost, let him be confirmed with laying on of handes: because hee receiued one and the same formes of baptism without sanctifying. Hierome also maketh mention of it, writing against the Lucifrians. But although I doe not deny that Hierome sometime erreth therein, for that he sayeth that it is an obseruation of the Apostles; yet he is most farre from these mens folies and the verie same also he qualifieth, when he addeth, that this blessing is giuen to the Bishops only, rather in honor of their priesthood than by the necessity of lawe. Therefore such laying on of handes, which is done simply in stead of blessing, I praise and would that it were at this day restored to the pure use thereof.

5 But the later age having in a manner blotted out the thing itselfe, hath set I wote not what fainde confirmation for a Sacrament of God. They have fained that the vertue of confirmation is to giue the holy Ghost to the encreas of Grace, which in baptism was giuen to innocencie; to strengthen them to battle, which in baptism were never begotten to life. This Confirmation is celebrate with anointing, and with his forme of wordes, signe thee with the signe of the holy crofse, and conforme thee with the chrsme of salvation, in the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the holy Ghost. All this is gaily and trimly done. But where is the word of God, that may promise here the presence of the holy Ghost? They cannot bring forth one title. Whereby then will they certify vs, that their chrsme is the vefsel of the holy Ghost? We see oyle, that is a thick and far liquor, and nothing else. Let the word (sayth Augustine) bee added to the element, and there shall be made a sacrament. Let them (I say) bring forth this wordes, if they will have vs in the oyle to looke vpon any thing but the oyle. If they did acknowledge themselues ministers of the Sacramentes, as they ought, we needed to strive no longer. This is the first lawe of a minister, that he do nothing without commandement. Go to, let them bring forth any commandement of this point of ministry, & I will not speake one word more. If they have no commandement, they cannot excuse their boldnes full of sacrilege. After this manner the Lord asked the Pharisees, whether the baptism of John were from heaven or from men: if they had answered, from men, then he had made them confess that it was trufling and vaine: if from heaven, then were they compelled to acknowledge the doctrine of John. Therefore leaft they shoule too much slander John, they durft not confess that it was from men. If therefore Confirmation be from men, it is proud to be vaine and trufling: if they will perswade vs that it is from heaven, let them proue it.

6. They doe in deede defend themselves with the example of the Apostles, whome they thinke to have done nothing raflly. That is well in deede: neither would we blame them, if they shewd themselves followers of the Apostles. But what did the Apostles? Luke reporteth in the Acts, that the Apostles which were at Hierusalem, when they heard that Samaria had received the word of God, sent thither Peter & John: they prayed for the Samaritans, that they might receive the holy Ghost, which was not yet come into any of them, but they were baptised onely in the name of Iesus: when they had prayed, they laid their hands upon them: by which laying on, the Samaritans received the holy Ghost. And of this laying on of hands he diuers times maketh mention. I heare what the Apostles did: that is, they faithfully executed their minifterie. The Lord willed that those visible and wonderfull graces of the holy Ghost, which hee then poured out vpon his people, should be ministrd and distributed of his Apostles by the laying on of hands. But vnder this laying on of hands: I thinke there was not containted anie higher mysterie: but I expound it, that they adjoined such a ceremonie, that by the verie outward doing they might signify, that they commended & as it were offered to God him vpon whom they laide their hands. If this minifterie which the Apostles then executed, were yet still remaining in the Church, the laying on of hands also ought to be kept. But since that same grace hath cease to be given, where to serve the laying on of hands? Truely the holy ghost is yet present with the people of God, without whom being guider & directer, the church of God cannot stand. For wee haue the eternal promise & which shall ever stand in force, by which Christ calleth to himselfe them that thirst, that they may drinke living waters. But those miracles of powers, & manifeft workings, which were distributed by the laying on of hands, haue ceased, neither behoued it that they should be but for a time. For it behoued that the preaching of the gospell while it was newe, should be gloriously set forth and magnifed, with vnheard of and vnwonted miracles. From which when the Lord ceased, he did not by & by forfake his Church, but taught that the royaltie of his kingdome & the dignitie of his worde was excellently enough disclofed. In what point therefore will these stageplayers say that they follow the Apostles? They shoule haue done it with laying on of hands, that the euidens power of the holy Ghost might by and by shew forth it selfe. This they bring not to passe: why therefore doe they boast that the laying on of hands maketh for them, which we read in deede that the Apostles voul, but altogether to an other ende?

7 This hath like reason as if a man should reach that the breathing where-with the Lord breathed upon his disciples, is a sacrament whereby the holy ghost is given. But whereas the Lord did this once, he did not also will that we should do the same. After the same manner also the Apostles laid on their hands, during the time that it pleased the Lord that the visible graces of the holy Ghost should be distributed at their prayers: not that which came after, should only playerlike & without the thing in deed counterfeit an emptie & cold signe, as these apostles. But if they procure that in laying on of hands they follow the Apostles, (wherein they have no like thing with the apostles) sauing I wote not what overthwart wrongfull counterfeating yet whence commeth their oyle which they call the oyle of saluation? Who taught them to secke saluation in oyle? Who taught them to give to it the power of strentghening? Did Paul, which draweth vs farre away from the elements of this world, which condemneth nothing more than the sticking to such petty observations: But this I boldly pronounce not of my selfe, but from the Lord. Who do call oyle the oyle of saluation, they forswear the saluation which is in Christ; they deny Christ, they have no part in the kingdom of God. For oyle is for the belly, and the belly for oyle, the Lord shall destroy both. For all these weake elementes, which decay with very vse, belong nothing to the kingdom of God, which is spirituall and shall never decay. What then? will some men say: doe you measure with the same measure, the water wherewith we be baptised, and the bread & wine vnder which the supper of the Lord is given? I answer: that in sacramentes given of God, two things are to be looked vnto: the substance of the bodily thing which is set before vs, and the forme that is by the word of God printed in it, wherein lyeth the whole strengthe. In respect therefore that the bread, wine, and water that are in the Sacraments offered to our fight, doe keep their owne substance, this laying of Paul alway hath place. Meate for the belly, and the belly for meate: God shall destroy them both. For they passe & vanish away with the fashion of this world. But in respect that they are sanctified by the word of God, that they may be Sacraments, they do not hold vs in the flesh, but do truely and spiritually teach vs.

8 But let vs yet more necerely looke into it, how many monsters this fat liquor fostereth and feedeth. These opposers say, that the holy Ghost is given in baptism, to innocence: in confirmation, to increase of grace: that in Baptisme, we are newe begotten into life: in confirmation, we are prepared to battle. And they are so past shame, that they denie that baptism can well be done without confirmation. O wickednesse! Are we not therefore in baptism buried together with Christ, beinge made partakers of his death, that wee may bee also partners of his resurrection? But this fellowship with the death & life of Christ Paul expounds to be the mortifying of our flesh, and quickening of our spirit; for that our old man is crucified, that we may walke in newnes of life. What is to be attuned to battle if this be not? If they counted it a matter of nothing, to tread vnder feete the word of God: why did they not yet at least reverence the church, to whom they wil in every point seem so obedient? But what can be brought forth more strong against their doctrine, than y decree of the Mileuitan e councel? Who so faith that that baptism is given only for forgiveness of sins, and not for a help of grace to come, accused be he. But whereas Luke, in the place which we have alleged, saith that they were baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, which had not received the holy Ghost: he doeth not simply deny that they were endued with any gift of the holy Ghost, which he received in Christ with his, and confessed him with mouth: but meaneth that receiving of the holy Ghost, whereby the open powers and visible graces were received. So is it saith that the Apostles received the Spirit on the day of Pentecost, whereas it had been long before faide into them of Christ, it is not you that speake, but the Spirit of my Father which speaketh in you. Behold all ye are of God, the malicious and slyous deceite of Satan. That thine which was truly given in baptism, hee lyingly faith to be given in his confirmation, that he may by stealth lead you unaware from baptism. Who now can doubt that this is the doctrine of Satan, which cutting away from baptism the promises properly belonging to baptism, doth convey away and remove them, to another thing? It is found (I say) upon what manner of foundation this godly anointing standeth. The word of God is, that all they which are baptized in Christ, have put on Christ with his gifts. The word of the ancients is, that they received in baptism no promise, by which they may be armed in battle. That is the voice of truth, therefore this must be a voice of lying. Therefore I can more truly define this confirmation than they have hitherto defined it. Namely, it is not baptism, which darkeneth, yea abolieth the word thereof: that is a false promise of the devil, which draweth us away from the truth of God. Or, if you will, it is oyle despised with the lying of the devil, which as it were by overspreading of darkeneesse deceiteth the eyes of the simple.

9 They adde furthermore, that all the faithfull ought after baptism to receive the holy Ghost by laying on of hands, that they may be founde full Christians: because he shall never be a Christian, is not chremed with the bishops Confirmation. These be their owne sayynges wordes for wordes. But I had thought, whatsoever things pertained to Christianitie, were as

Sec forth in writing and comprehended in Scriptures. Now, as I perceive, the true forme of religion is to be sought and learned from elsewhere. Therefore the whole wisdome of God, the heavenly truth, the whole doctrine of Christ, doth but begin Christians, and oyle maketh them perfect. By this sentence are damned all the Apostles, and so many Martyrs, whom it is most certaine to have never beene chremed: forasmuch as the oyle was not yet made, which being poured upon them, they might fully all parts of christianitie, or rather might be made Christians which yet were none. But, though I holde my peace, they doe largely confute themselves. For howe many of the number of their owne people do they anoint after baptism? why therefore do they suffer such halfe christians in their flocke, whose imperfection might easily be holpen? Why doe they with so carelesse negligence suffer the to omit, that which was not lawfull to bee omitted without gresseous office? Why doe they not more severely call upon the keeping of a thing so necessarie, & without which salvation can not be obtained, ynles peradventure some be prevented by death? Verily

when they so freely suffer to bee despised, they secretly confesse that it is not of so great value as they boast it.

10 Last of all they determine that this holy anointing is to bee had in greater reverence than baptism, because this anointing is peculiarly ministered by the hands of the chiefest bishops, but baptism is commonly distributed by ordinary priests. What may a man here say, but y they are vextly mad, which to flatter their owne inventions, that in comparison of the they carelessly despite the holy ordinances of God? O mouth that robbest God, dost thou let a fatte liquor only defiled with the stinke of thine own breath, and enchanted with murmuring sound of words, against the Sacrament of Christ, and to compare it, with water hallowed with the word of God? But thy wickednes accounted this but a small matter, vnes thou didst also prefer it above the same. These be the answers of the holy sea, these be the Oracles of the Apostolike trestle. But some of them, even in their owne opinion, beganne somewhat to qualifie this vnbridled madness. It is (say they) to be worshipped with greater reverence: peraduenture not for the greater vertue and profit it giveth but because it is given of the worther men, & is made in the worther part of the body, that is, in the forehead; or because it bringeth a greater increase of vertues, although baptism is able more to forgive- nesse. But in the first reason do they not bewray themselves to be Donatists, which measure the force of the Sacrament by the worthiness of the minister. But I will admitte, that Confirmation bee called the worthier by reason of the worthines of the Bishops hand. But if a man ask them, from whence so great prerogatvie hath bee gcncd to bishops, what reason will they bring beside their owne luft? The Apostles alone vded that power, which alone distributed the holy Ghost. Are the bishops alone Apostles? Yea are they Apostles at all? But let vs also grant them that, why do they not by the same argument affirm, that bishops alone ought to touch the Sacrament of the blood in the Supper of the Lord: which they therefore deny to lay men, because the Lord gave to the Apostles alone? Is to the Apostles alone, why do they not conclude therefore to the bishops alone? But in that place they make the Apostles, simple priests, but now ye giddines of their head car- rie them another way, suddenly to create them bishops. Finally, Ananias was no Apostle, to whom yet Paul was sent that he shold receive his sight, be baptised, and be filled with the holy Ghost. I will adde this also to the heape. If by the law of God this was the proper office of bishops, why have they bins so bold to give it away to common priests? as we read in a certaine epistle of Gregoric.

11 As for their other reason, how trifling,sonde, and foolish is it, to call their confirmatiow worthier than the baptism of God, because in it the forehead is anointed with oyle, and in baptism the hinder part of the head, as though baptism were done with the oyle & not with the water? I call all the godly to witnesse, whether those lofels do not endevour themselves to this onely ende, to corrupt the pureness of the sacraments with their leaun. I have already spoke this in another place, that in the sacraments, which is of GOD, scarcely glimmereth through at holes, among the rout of the inventions of men. If any man did not beleue me therein, lette him nowe at least believe his owne masters. Loe passing over the water, and making no account of it, they highly esteeme the one only oyle in baptism. Wee therefore on the contrary side doe say, that in baptism the foreheade also is dipped in water. In comparison of this, wee esteeme not your oyle worth one piece of dong, whether it be in baptism or in confirmation. If any allege that it is solde for more: by this adding of price, the goodness (if any were in it) is corrupted: so much thefe may they commend a most filthy deceit by theft. In the third reason they bewray their owne vngodlines, while they prate that in confirmation is given a greater increase of vertues than in baptism. By the laying on of hands the Apostles distributed the visible graces of the Spirit. In what thing do these mens fat liquor thefe it selfe fruiteful? But away with these qualities, that couer one sacrifice with maie factileges. It is like the Gordian: which it is better to breake in sunder, than to labour so much in vndoing it.

12 But nowe when they see themselves destitute of the word of God & probable reason, they pretend as they are wont, that it is a most auncient observation and established by consent of many ages. Although they were true, yet they win nothing thereby. A Sacrament is not from the earth, but from heaven: not from men, but from God alone. They must proove God to be the author of their confirmation if they will have it taken for a Sacrament. But why do they object antiquitie, whereas the old writers, when they mind to speake properly, do no where reckon more Sacraments than two? If a foretree of our faith were to be fought from me, we have an invincible tower, that the old fathers never acknowledged those for Sacraments which these men joyfully faie to the Sacraments. The old writers speak of the laying on of handes: but do they call it a Sacrament? Augustine plainly affirmeth that it is no other thing than prayer. Neither let them here barke against me with their flinking distinctions, that Augustine meant that not of the laying on of hands, but of confirmation, which was vsed to healing or reconciliation. The booke remaineth and is abroad in the hands of men. If I wreath it to any other sense than Augustine himselfe wrote it, I giue them leave after their ordinarie manner to oppresse me not onely with railing but also with spitting at me. For he speaketh of this that returned from Schisme to the unity of the Church. He denieth that they needed to be newly baptised: for he faith, that the laying on of hands sufficeth, that by the bond of peace the Lord may giue them the holy Ghost. But for as much as it might seeme a absurditie, that the laying on of hands should be done of new rather than baptism he sheweth a difference. For (faith he) what other thing is the laying on of hands, than prayer vpon a man? And that this is his meaning appeareth by another place, where he faith: Hands is laid vpon here-takes amended, for the coupling of Charitie, which is the greatest gift of the Holy Ghost, without which whatsoeuer holy things are in man they availe not to saluation.

13 But I would to God we did keepe still the manner which I haue said to haue bin in the old time, before that this vntimely deluered image of a sacramet was born: nor that it should be such a confirmation as they sayne, which cannot once be named without injury to baptism: but a catechizing, wherewherby children or they that were nere to the age of discretion did declare an account of their faith before the Church. But it should be the best manner of Catechizing, if a forme were written to that vse, containing and familiarly setting out a summe in a manner of all the articles of our religion, in which the whol church of the faithful ought without controuersy to agree: that a childe being ten yeares old should offer himselfe to the Church to declare a confession of his faith, should be examin'd of every article, and answer to every one: if he were ignorant of any thing, or did not understand it, he might be taught. So should he, before the Church witnessing and beholding it, profess the onely, true, and pure faith, wherewith the people of the faithful doth with one mind worship the one God. If this discipline were at this day in force, truly the sloufthfulness of some parents would be whetted, who doe carelessly neglect the instruction of their children as a thing nothing belonging to them, which then without open shame they could not omit: there should be among Christian people a greater consent of faith, and not so great ignorance and rudenesse of many: some should not be so rashly carried away with new and strange doctrines: finally all should have as it were a certaine orderlie instruction of Christian learning.
Cap. 19. Of the outwarde means.

Of Penance.

14 In the next place they set Penance, of which they intreat so confusely & disorderedly, that consciences cannot bear away no sure or found thing of their doctrine. We have already in another place declared at large what we have learned out of the scriptures concerning repentance, & then what they also teach of it. Nowe we haue this onely to touch, what reason they had raised vp the opinion, which hath heretofore raign'd in Churches and Schooles, that it is a sacrament. But first I will briefly say somewhat of the visage of the old Church, the pretence whereof they have abused to establish theirained invention. This order they kept in publike penance, they which had fully done the satisfactions enjoined them, were reconciled with solemn laying on of handes. That was the signe of absolution, whereby both the sinner himselfe was rais'd vp before God with trust of pardon, & the Church was admonished gently to receive him into favor, putting away the remembrance of his offence. This Cyprian oftentimes calleth, to give peace. That this doing might be of great dignity, and have more commendation among the people, it was ordained that the bishops authority should always be used for the mean herein. From hence came ye decree of the secon council at Carthage: Be it not lawful to a priest at the Masse publicly to reconcile a penitent. And another decree of the council at Araratium, let those which in time of their penance depart out of this life, be admitted to the Communion without the laying on of hands used in the reconciling: if they recover of their sicknesse let them stand in the degree of penitents, and when the time is fully expired, let them receive of the byshop the laying on of hands used in reconciling. Againe the decree of the third council at Carthage: Let not the priest without the authority of the bishop, reconcile a penitent. All these tended to this end, ye severity which they would have to be used in behalfe should not with too much lenitie grow to decay. Therefore
To Salvation. Lib. 4.

For they willed the bishop to be judge of it, which was likely he would be more circumspect in the examination thereof. Howbeit Cyprian in a certain place sheweth, that not only the bishop, but also the whole clergy laid their hands on him. For thus he saith. At the full time they do penance, then they come to the Communion, and by the laying of hands of the bishop & the clergy they receive power to partake of the communion. Afterward by process of time it came to this point, that beside publicke penance they used this ceremony also in private absolutions. Hereupon came that distinction in Gratian between publice and private reconciliation. I judge that same old usage of which Cyprian maketh mention, to have bin holy and healthful for the Church, and I would that it were at this day restored. As for this latter, although I dare not disallow it, or at least speake more sharply against it, yet I think it to be but necessary. Howsoever it be, yet we see that the laying on of hands in penance is a ceremony ordained of me, nor of God, which is to be set among mean things & outward exercises: & those verily which are not to be despised, but which ought to be in a lower degree than those which are commended unto vs by the word of the Lord.

15 But the Romanists and the schoolmen, (which have an ordinarie custom to corrupt all things with wrong expounding them) doe here very carefully travell in finding out a Sacrament. Neither ought it to seeme any maruell, for they seek a knot in a rush. But where they have it best, they leave a thing entangled in suspense, vncertaine, and confounded and troubled with diversitie of opinions. They say therefore either that the outward penance is a Sacrament, and if it be so, that it ought to bee taken for a signe of the inwarde penance, that is, of the contrition of heart, which shall be the thing of the Sacrament; or that they both together are a Sacrament, not two Sacraments, but one ful one. But, that the outward penance is only the Sacrament: the inwarde is both the thing and the Sacrament: & that the forgivenesse of sinnes is the thing and not the Sacrament. Let them which keepe in remembrance the definition of a Sacrament which we haue above set, examine whereby that which these men call a Sacrament, & they shall finde that it is not an outwarde ceremony ordained of the Lord for the confirming of our faith. If they caull that my definition is not a lawe which they need to obey: let them heare Augustine, whom they saine that they esteeme as most holy. Visible Sacramentes (faith hee) were ordained for carnall mens sakes, that by degrees of sacraments they may be conuellred from those things that are seen with eyes to those things that are understood. What like thing doe either they themselues see, or can they shewe to other in that which they call the Sacrament of Penance? The same Augustine saith in another place: It is therefore called a Sacrament, because in it one thing is seen, and another thing is understood. That which is seen hath a bodily forme; that which is understood, hath a spirituall fruit. Neither doe these things in any wise agree with the Sacrament of penance such as they saine it, where there is no bodily forme that may represent a spirituall fruit.

16 And to kill these beastes upon their owne fighting place, if there be any Sacramet here to be sought, may it not be much more colourable said, the

the absolution of the priest is a sacrament, than penance either inwarde or outwarde for it might readily be said, that it is a ceremony to assure our faith of the forgivenesse of sinnes, and hath a promise of the keyes as they call it, Whatsoever ye shall abide or lose upon earth, shall bee bound or loosed in heaven. But some man would have objected, that the most part of them are absolved of the Priests oblique such thing by such absolution where as by their doctrine the Sacramentes of the new law ought to work indeed which they figure. This were but to be laughed at. For, as in the supper, they make a double eating, a Sacramentall eating which is equalie common to good and to cuill, and a spiritual eating which is onelie proper to the good; why might they not also faine the absolution is receiv'd two waies? Yet could I not biter to understand what they meant with this their doctrine, which we have already taugl, how farre it disagreeeth from the trueth of God, where we purposely intertreated of that argument. Here my mind is onelie to shewe, that this doubt withstandeth not, but that they may call the absolution of the priest a Sacrament. For they might aunswere by the mouth of Augustine that sanctification is without the visible Sacrament, & the visible sacrament with outward sanctification. Againe, that the sacramentes doe worke in the onelie elect that which they figure. Againe, that some do put on Christ so far as to the partaking of the Sacrament, others to sanctification; the one, the good and cuill equally doth other the good onely. Truly they have more than childishly erred, and be blinded in the cleare sunne, which traveling with great hardness, yet espied not a thing so plain, and open to every man.

17 Yet least they should waxe too proud, in what part soever they set the sacrament, I denie that it ought rightfully to be taken for a Sacrament. First, because there is no speciall promise to it, which is the onely substance of a Sacrament. Againe, because whatsoever ceremonial is here shewed forth, it is the meere invention of men; whereas we have already proved that the ceremonies of Sacraments cannot be ordained but of God. Therefore it was a lie and deceit which they have invented of the Sacrament of penance. This fained sacrament they have garnished with a meere commendation, calling it a second board after shipwrecke, because if a man have by sinning marred his garment of innocence which he received in baptism, hee may by penance repair it. But it is the saying of Hierome, Whose Scole it be, it cannot be excused but it is utterly wicked if it be expounded after their meaning. As though baptism be bloted out by sinne, & is not rather to be called to remembrance of euerie sinner, so oft as he thinketh of the forgivenesse of sinne, that he may thereby gather vp himselfe, and recouer courage, and strengleth his faith, that he shall obtaine the forgivenesse of sins which is promised him in baptism. But that which Hierome hath spoken hardly and vnproperly, that by penance baptism is repaired from which they fall away that deserre to be excommunicate from the Church; these good expounders draw to their wickedness. Therefore you shall most fully speake, if you call baptism the sacrament of penance, then it is given for a confirmation of grace, and scale of confidence, to them that purpose repentance. And lest you should thinke this to be our deuise, beside this it agreeth with

The words of the Scripture, it appeareth that it was in the old Church commonly spoken like a most certain principle. For in the book of Faith to Peter, cap. 1., he saith, that Jesus, who is called the Son of Man, saith, 'As my Father hath given me power to forgive sins, so also do I forgive.' Now if this be so, it is evident that forgiveness is not only the result of faith, but is given by Jesus to them who believe. But why do we use uncertain sayings? As though we could require an act of faith more plain, than that which the Evangelist reciteth: that John preached the baptism of repentance, and that salvation of sins?

Of extreme vocation as they call it.

18. The third named Sacrament is extreme vocation, which is not done by the priest, and by the elders, in extreme cases, (for they term it) & with oil, consecrated of the bishop, & with this form: By this holy anointing, & by his most kind image, God pardon thee whatsoever thou hast offended by seeing, by hearing, by smelling, feeling, tasting. They say that there be two virtues of it, the forgiveness of sins, & ease of bodily sickness if it be so expedient: if not, the salvation of the soul. They say that the institution of it is set of James, whose words are these: Is any sick among you? Let him bring in the Elders of the church, & let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: & the prayer of faith shall save the sick man, and the Lord shall raise him vp: and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him. Of the same sort is this anointing, of which we have above shewed that the other laying on of hands is, namely a playerlike hypocrite, whereby without reason and without fruit they would resemble the apostles. Mark, heareth they the apostles at their first sending, according to the commandment which they have received of the Lorde, raised vp dead men, cast out devils, cleansed leprous men, healed the sick, and by healing of the sick they used oil. They anointed them with oil. And they were healed, Hereunto James had respect, when hee commanded the Elders to be called together to annoint the sick man. That under such Ceremonies is contained no higher mystery, they shal callie judge which mark how great liberty the Lord and his Apostles vied in these outward things. The Lorde going about to restore fight to the bine man, made cley of dust and spittle, some he healed with touching, others with his word. After the same manner the apostles healed some diseases with his word only, some with touching, others with anointing. But it is likely this anointing was not (as all other things also were not) caulefly put in use, I grant: yet not that it should be a mean of healing, but onely a signe, that the dulnes of the vnskilful might be put in minde from whence so great power proceedeth, to this end that they should not give the praise thereof to the apostles. And that the holy ghost and his gifts are signified by oil it is a common & useful thing. But that same grace of healings is vanished away, like as all the other miracles, which the Lord willed to be shewed for a time, whereby hee might make the new preaching of the gospel maruellous for ever. Therefore, though we grant never so much, that anointing was a sacrament of those powers which were then ministrated by the hands of the Apostles, it now nothing pertaining to vs to whom the ministration of such powers is not committed.

19. And by what greater reason do they make a sacrament of this anointing?
Cap. 19. Of the outwarde meanes ting, than of all other signes that are rehearsed to vs in the Scripture: Why doe they not appoint some Sytnah to swim in, whereunto at certain ordina-tie recourses of times sick me may plunge themselfes? That (say they) should be done in vaine. Truly no more in vaine than anointing. Why doe they not lie along vpon dead men, because Paul raised vp a dead child with lying vpon him? Why is not clay made of spittle & dust, a Sacrament? But the other were but singular examples: but this is giuen of James for a commandment. Verily James spake for the same time, when the Church yet stil enjoi-ed such blessing of God. They affirme in deed that there is yet still the same force in their anointing: but we finde it otherwise by experience. Let no man now maruell how they haue with such boldnes mocked soules, which they know to be senflifie and blinde when they are spoiled of the worde of God, that is, of their life & light: sith they are nothing ashamed to go about to mocke the liuing and feeling senses of the body. Therefore they make themselfes worthy to bee scorned, while they boast that they are endued with the grace of healinges. The Lord verily is present with his in all ages, & so oft as neede is he helpeth their sicknesse no lesse than in old time: but he doth not so vter those manifest powers, nor distributeth miracles by the handes of the Apostles: because this gift both was but for a time, and also was partly fallen away by the vnthankfulness of men.

20 Therefore as not without cause the Apostles haue by the signe of oule openly testified, that the grace of healinges committet to them was not their own power, but the power of the holy ghost: so on the other side they are wrongdoers to the holy ghost, which make a stinging oule and of no force, to be his power. This is altogether like as if one would say that aoule is the power of the holy ghost, because it is called by that name in Scripture: that every doue is the holy ghost, because he appeared in that forme.
But these things, let them looke to. So much as for this present is enough for vs, he do most certainly perceive that their anointing is no Sacramet which is neither a Ceremonie ordained of God, nor hath any promise. For when we require these two things in a Sacrament, that it be a ceremonie ordained of God, and that it haue a promise of God: we do therewithall require that the same ceromonie be giuen to vs, and that the promise belong vnto vs. For no man doth affirm that Circumcision is now a Sacrament of the Christian Church, although it both was an ordinance of God, and had a promise knipt vnto it: because it was neither commanded to vs, nor the promise which was adyoned to it was giuen to vs with the same condition.
That the promise which they prouedlie boast of in their anointing, is not giuen to vs, we haue euydently shewed, and they themselfes declare by experience. The Ceremonie ought not to have been vfed, but of them that were endued with the grace of healinges, not of these butchers that can more skill of slaying and murthering than of healing.

21 Howbeit although they obteine this, that that which James com-mandeth concerning anointing, agreeeth with this age (which they are most farre from) yet euen so they shall not haue much prowess in prouing of their vocation wherewith they haue hitherto anointed vs. James willeth that all sicke men be annointed: these men infect with their fatte liquor, not sicke men, but corpses halfe dead, when the life lieth already laboring at the tope of their lippes, or (as they themselves terme it) in extremes. If they haue in their Sacraments a present medicine, whereby they may either ease the sharpeness of diseases, or at least may bring some comfort to the soule, they are too cruel that doe never heale in time.

Iames willet that the sicke man be annointed of the Elders of the Church; these men alowe no annointer but the pettie sacrificing Priest. Whenas they expound in Iames prefbyters the Elders to bee Priests, and fondly say that the plurall number is there set for comelinesse sake, that is but trifling: as though the Churches at that time abounded with swarries of sacrificing Priests, y they might goe in a long pompous shew to carrie a pageante of holy oyle. When Iames simplicly bidde they sicke men be annointed, I understand by it none othe-er annointing but of common oyle: and none other is found in Markes re-heatfall. Thele men vouchsafe to haue none other oyle, but which is hallowed of the Bishop, that is to say, warmed with much breathing on it, en-chaunted with much mumbling, and with the knee bowed nine times salu- ted in this maner: thrice haile holy oyle: thrice haile holy christine: thrice haile holy balme. Out of whom haue they sucked such coniurations? Iames faith: that when the sicke man is annointed with oyle, and prayer hath beene pronoucilled over him, if he be in sinnes they shalbe forgiven himnamely, that the guiltinesse being taken away, they may obteine release of paine: not meaning that sinnes are put away with fat liquor, but that the praiers of the faithfull whereby the afflicted brother is commended to God, shall not be vaine. Thele men do wickedly lye, that by their holy, that is to say, abomi-nable annointing, sinnes are forgiven. Loc howe gaily they shalpreaulae, when they haue bin at large suffred to abuse the testimonie of Iames at their pleasure. And least we should not neede to travaile long in prooфе hercacf, their owne chronicles do dischardge vs of this hardnes. For they report that Pope Inucentius which in Auguines time governed the Church of Rome, or-deined that not onely priests, but also all Christians should vs oyle to an-noint for their necesssitie and others. Autor hereof is Siuegeb in his Chroni-cles.

Of Ecclesiastical Orders.

22. The fourth place in their register hath the Sacrament of Order but the same is so fruitful, that it breedeeth out of it seuen little Sacraments. But this is verie worthie to be laughed at, that whereas they affirme they are seven.Sacramentes, when they goe about to rehearse them, they re-ken vp thirteene. Neither can they allege for themselves, that they are but one Sacrament, because they tende all to one priesthood, and are as it were certaine degrees vnto in, For sixt it is evident that in euery one of them are seuerall Ceremonies, and they theselemes saye that there be diverse graces: no man can doubt but that they ought to be called seue Sacraments if their opinions be receiued. And why strue we about it as though it were a thing doubtfull, forasmuch as they themselues doe plainly and seuerally de-clare seuen? But first we will brieuely knit vp the way, how many & howe unsaureie absurdities they thrust in vnto vs, when they go about to comend

In their sacra-ment of orders se-uen petite sacra-ments conteined or as some of them do think moe.
Cap. 19. Of the outwarde meanes
to vs their Orders in stead of Sacraments: and then we will see whether the Ceremonie which Churches use in ordering of minsters, ought to be called a Sacrament at all. They make therefore seuen ecclesiastical orders or degrees, which they garnish with the name of a Sacrament. Those bee, dorekeepers, Readers, Exorcistes, Acoluthes or followers, Suddeacones, Deacons, Priestes. And will they say that they bee, for the seuenfoole grace of the Holy Ghost, wherewith they ought to be endued that are promoted vs to them. But it is increased more largely heaped to them in their promotion. Nowe the number it selfe is hallowed with a wrongfull expounding of scripture, when they think that they have red in Esay vii. verses of the holy Ghost, whereas both in deede Esay there rehearse but nine, and also the Prophete meant not to comprehend them all in that place: for hee is else where as well called the spirite of life, sanctification, of adoption of the children, as he is in that place called the spirite of sinnedome, of understanding of counsel, of strength, of knowledge, and of the fear of the Lord. Howbeit some suttler men make not seuen orders, but nine, after the like nesse (as they say) of the Church triumphing. But among them also there is strife; because some would have the hauing of the clearpie to bee the first order of all, and Bishopprickes the last: others some excluding hauing altogether, reckon Archbiprucke among the orders.
Ibidore otherwise diudeth them. For hee maketh psalmists and Readers to be divers: hee apoin-teth the psalmists for songs, & the Readers to the reading of the Scriptures, wherewith the people may be instructed. And this distinction is kept by the Canons. In so great diversitie what will they have vs to follow or face? Shall we say that there bee seuen orders? So teacheth the maister of the schoole: but the most illuminate doctors doe otherwise determine. Againe they also disagree among themselfes. Moreover the most sacred Canons call vs an other way. Thus forsooth doe men agree, when they dispute of godly matters without the word of God.
23 But this exceedeth all folly, that in euery one of these they make Christ fellowe with them. First (say they) hee executed the office of dore-keeper, when hee did with a whip made of cordes, drive the buiers and sellers out of the temple He signifieth himselfe to bee a dorekeeper, when he faith, I am the dore. Hee tooke upon him the office of Reader, when hee red Esay in the Synagogue. He did the office of an Exorcist, when touching the tongue and eares of the deafe and dumme man, hee restored to him his hearing. Hee testified himselfe to bee an Acoluth or follower in these wordes. Hee that followeth mee, walketh not in darkenesse. He executed the office of Suddeacon, when wearing with a linnen cloth hee washed the disciples feete. Hee did beare the person of a Deacon, when hee distributed his boide and bloode in the supper. He fulfilled the office of Priestes, when he offered himselfe upon the crossesse sacrifice to his Father. These things cannot so bee heard without laughing, that I maruell that they were written without laughing, if yet they were men that wrote them. But most notable is that suttletie wherewith they play the Philosophers about the name of Acoluth, calling him a Cerostar, a taper bearer with a worde (as I think) of sorcerie, truelie such a one as was never heard of in all nationa.
To Salvation. Lib. 4. 492

nations and languages, whereas Acolumus in Grecke simply signifieth a follower. Howbeit if I shoude earnestly carrie in confuting these men, I should my fide alfo worthily bee laugh'd at, they are lo trifling and verie mockeries.

24 But that they may not bee able yet fiel with false colours to deceive euen very sille women, their vanitie is by the way to be vttred. They create with great pompe and solemnitie their Readers, Psalmists, Dorekepers Acolumus, to execute those offices, whereunto they appoint very children, or those where they call lay men. For who for the moft part lighteth the Candles, who poureth wine & water into the cruft, but a child or some base fellow of the Kittle, ly maketh his gaine thereof. Doe not the fame men sing Doe they not shut and open the Church dores? For who euer saw in their temples an Acolumus, or a Dorekeeper executing his office? But rather bee that when he was a boy did the office of an Acolumus, when he is once admitted into the order of Acolumus, causeth to bee, which he beginneth to bee called, that they may seeme to will of purpose to cast of the office when they take upon them the title. Behold why they have neede to be consecrate by Sacraments, and to receive the holy ghoste, namely, that they may doe nothing. If they allege for excufe, that this is the frowardnesse of times, that they forfake and neglect their ministries: let them therewithal confesse that there is at this day in the church no vide nor fruit of their holie orders, which they meruellously advance, and that their whole Church is full of curse: because it suffereth tapers and cruets to be handled of children & prophanen men, which none are worthy to touch but they that are consecrat Acolumus: and because it committeth the fonges to children, which ought not to be hard but of a hallowed mouth. As for their Exorcists, to what end do they consecrate them? I heare the Iewes had their exorcists: but I see that they were so called of the exorcistes or coniurations which they vfed, Of these counterfaiit exorcistes who euer heard it spoken, that they shewed any example of their profession? It is fained that they have power gien them to lay their hands upon mad men, them that are to bee catechized, and men possessed with diuels: but they can not perswade the diuelles that they have such power, because the diuelles do not one like not yeeld to their commandements, but also vse comandings authoritie ouer the. For a man can scarce finde every tenth of them, that is not led with an euill Spirtue.
Therefore whatsoever things they babble concerning their pettie Orders, they are patched together of foolish & vnfaueurie lies. Of the old Acolumus, and Dorekepers, and Readers, we haue spoken in another place, when we declared the order of the church. Our purpose here is onlie to fight against that new found invention of the sevenfold Sacrament in ecclesiastical orders. Of which there is no where any thing red, but among these foolish praters the Sorbonifts and Canonifts.

25 Now let vs confider of the ceremonies which they vfe about it. First whomsoever they receive into their order of soldier, they do with one comon signe enter the into Clergie. For they shue them in the crown, y the crowne may be token kingly dignify, because Clerkes ought to be kings: y they may rule themselves and other. For Peter speaketh thus of them, Yee are Men consecrated in the Church of Romc to execute certaine maxims duties, as if they conde not carefullie bee done but by bal-
lowed men, and yes men unbal-
lowed & uncosacrased suffere
to do them.

Cap. 19. Of the outwarde meanes

1. Peter 2:9. are a chosen kinde, a kinglie priesthood, a holy nation, a people of purchase. But it was sacrilege to take to themselves alone that which is given to the whole Church, and proudly to glory of the title which they had taken from the faithfull. Peter speaketh to the whole Church: these fellowe's wrest it to a few shauen men: as though it were said to them alone: be ye holy: as though they alone were purchased by the bloud of Christ: as though they alone were by Christ made a kingdom and priesthood to God. Then they affigne also other reasons: the top of their head is made bare, that their minde may be declared to be free vnto the Lorde, which with open face may beholde the glorie of God. Or that they may bee taught that the faultes of their mouth & their eyes must be cut off. Or the shauing of their head is the putting away of temporall things, and the haires compass about the crowne are the remnants of goods that are retained for their sustenaunce. All in signes: because forsooth the veile of the temple is not yet cut in sunder. Therefore being perswaded that they haue gaily discharged their duties, because they have figured such things by their crowne, of the verie things in deed they perforeme nothing at all. How long will they mocke vs with such false colours and deceitis? The cleargy by shearing of a few haires do dignifie that they have cast away the abondance of temporall goods, that they behold the glorie of God, that they have mortified the lust of the cares and eyes: but there is no kinde of men more ruining, more sensibly dul, more lustful. Why do they not rather truly perfoure holiness, than with false & lying signes counterfeit a shew of it?

26 Moreover when they say that the crown of the Clergy hath the beginning and reason from the Nazarites: what other thing doe they allege than their mysteries are strong out of the Jewish ceremonies, or rather they are meete Jewishe: But whereas they further saie, Prisilla, Acila, & Paul himselfe, taking a vowe vpon them did sheare their heads, that they might be purified: they bewray their grosse ignorance. For it is no where red of Prisilla: & of Acila also it is doubtful: for vaine shearing may as well be referred to Paul as to Acila. But, that we may not leaue to them that which they require, that they have an example of Paul: the simpler must note, that Paul did never sheare his head for any sanctification, but onely to shew the weaknesse of his brethren. I am wont to call such vvoes the vowes of charitie not of godlines: that is to say, not taken in hand for any service of God, but to beare with the rudenes of the weake: as he himselfe saith, that he was made a weue to the Jewes, &c. Therefore he did this, & the same but once, & for a short time, he being might for a time fashion himselue to the Jewes. These men when they will without any vs counterfeit the purifying of the Nazarites, what do they else but raise vp another Jewishnesse, when they wrongfully couet to follow the olde Jewishnesse? With the same religiuose was that decreasall Epistle made, which according to the Apostle, forbiddeneth cleakes that they should not suffer their haires to growe, but sheare it round like a bowle. As though the Apostle, when he teacheth what is comely for all men, were carefull for the rounde shearing of the Clergy. Hereby let the readers consider, of what force and worthinesse are those other mysteries that follow, into which there is such an entrie.

27. Whence
17 Whence the shearing of Clerkes took beginning, appeareth sufficiently even by Augustine alone. Whereas at that time none suffered their haire to growe, but nice men, and such as coveted a smothness & trimmynesse not meece enough for men, if it seemed to be a point of no good example, if they were permitted to the clergie. Therefore Clerkes were commanded either to sheare their head or to shave it, that they should not beeke any shewe of womanly trimming. But this was so common, that certaine Monkes, that they might the more set out their holiness with notable & severall attire from other men, did let their haire growe long. But afterward when the fashion turned to wearing of haire, and certaine nations were added to Christiandom, which alwayes was to weare long haire, as France, Germany, and England: it is likely that clerkes did euerie where sheare their heads, least they should seeme to covet the gaines of haire. At the last in a corrupter age, when all olde ordinances were either perverted or gone out of kind into superstition, because they felt no cause in the shearing of the clergie (for they had receiued nothing but a foolish controversie) they fled to a mysterie, which now they superstitiously thrust in vnto vs for the approouing of their Sacrament. The dorekeepers at their consecration receive the keyes of the Church, whereby they may understand that the keeping of it is committed to them. The readers receive the holy Bible. The exorcisers receive the forms of exorcismes, which they should use over mad and them that are to be cærophiled. The Acoluthes receive their tapers & cuncta. These are ye ceremonies wherein (if God will) there is so much secret power, if they may be not onlye signes & tokens, but also causes of invincible grace. For this they require by their definition, when they will have them taken among the Sacraments. But to make an end in few words, I say it is an absurdist that in their schooles & canons they make these lesser orders Sacraments; whereas even by their owne confession that teach this, they were unknowne to the primitive Church, & declar'd many yeres after. For Sacraments, fith they contain the promise of God, can not be ordained of Angels, nor of men, but of God alone, whose office alone it is to give promise.

28 There remaine three orders, which they call the greater. Of the which, Subdeaconry (as they call it) was remotted into that number since the rest of the smaller ones beganne to growe. But because they seeme to have a testimonie for these out of the word of God, they doe peculiarly for honors faine, call them holy orders. But nowe it is to be seene, howes crookedly they abuse the ordinances of God to their pretence. We will beginne at the order of Priesthood or the sacrificers office. For by these two names they signifies one thing, and so they call them to whom they say that it pertayneth to offer upon the altar the sacrifice of the body and blood of Christe, to pronounce prayers, and to blessed the gifts of God. Therefore at their consecration they receive the patine with the hostes, for tokens of power giuen to them, to offer acceptable sacrifices to God. And their hands are annointed; by which signe they are taught, that they haue power giuen the to consecrate. But of the Ceremonies we shall speake hereafter. Of the thing it selfe I say: it hath no title of the word of God which they pretende, that they could not more wickedly corrupt the order for

set by God. First verily this ought to stande for a thing confessed (which we have affirmed in entreaty of the Popish masse) that they are all wrong doers to Christe, which call themselves sacrificing priests, or offer a sacrifice of appeasement. Hee was appointed and consecrate of the Father a priest with an oth, according to the order of Melchisedech, without any end, without any successour. Hee once offered a sacrifice of eternal satisfactorie cleansing, and reconciliation; and now also being entred into the Sanctuary of heaven, he maketh intercession for vs. In him we are all sacrificing priests, but to praises and giuinges of thankes, finally to offer vs and ours to God. It was his singular office alone, with his offering to appease God, and to purge sinnes. When these men take that upon them, what remaineth but that their sacrificing Priesthood is vngodly and full of sacriledge? Truly they are too wicked, when they dare garnish it with the name of a Sacrament. As touching the true office of Priesthood, which is commended to vs by the mouth of Christ, I willingly account it in that degree. For therein is a ceremonie, first taken out of the Scriptures, then such a one as Paul testifieth not to bee vaine nor superfluous, but a faithfull signe of spiritual grace. But whereas I have not set it for a thirde in the number of Sacraments, I did it because it is not ordinarie and common among all the faithfull, but a speciall rite for one certaine office. But such this honour is given to the Christian ministerie, there is no cause therefore why the Popish sacrificers should be proude.

For Christ commandd distributors of his Gospell and mysteries to be ordained, not sacrificers to be consecrate, Hee gaue them commandement to preach the Gospell and to feede the flocke not to offer sacrificies. He promised them the grace of the holy Ghost, not to make satisfactorie purging of sinnes, but rightly to execute and to maintaine the government of the Church.

29 The ceremonies agree verie well with the thing it selfe. Our Lorde when he sent forth the Apostles to preach the Gospell, did blowe uppon them. By which signe he represented the power of the holy Ghost which he gave unto them. This blowing these good men have retaine, and as though they did forthe the holy Ghost out at their throte, they whisper over their silly priestes that they make, Receive the holy Ghost. So leave they nothing which they do not ouerwarily counterfayt: wil not say like plaiers (which we their gesturings neither without art nor without significatio) but like a pes, which counterfayt every thing wantely & without any choice. We keepe (say they) the example of the Lorde. But the Lorde did many things which he willde not to be examples to vs. The Lord said to the disciples, Receive the holy Ghost. He layd also to Lazarus, Lazarus come forth, He layd to the man sick of the palse, Rize and walke. Why do not they say the same to all dead men and sick of the palse? He chewed a profe of his divine power, when in blowing vpone the Apostles, he filled the with the grace of the holy Ghost. If they goe about to doe the same thing, they enuiously counterfayt God; and doe in a maner chalenge him to trie with them: but they are farre from the effect, and do nothing with this foolish gesturing but mocke Christ. Verily they be so shamelesse that they dare affirm that they giue the holy Ghost. But how true that is, experience teacheth, which crieth out that so many as be consecrated priests are of horse, made attics, of foole, made mad men. Neither yet doe I trieue with them for that; onely I condemne the cerimonie it selfe, which ought not to have beene drawn to be an example, forasmuch as it was vse of Christ for a singular signe of one miracle: so farre is it off, that the excuse of following his example ought to defend them.

30 But of whom receiued they the anointing? They aunswere that they received it of the sonnes of Aaron, from whose their order also took beginning. Therefore they had rather alway to defende themselves with wrongfull examples, than to confesse that their felues have devised that which they vs without cause. But in the mean time they consider not, that while they professe themselves the successors of the sonnes of Aaron, they are wrong doers of the priesthood of Christ, which alone was shadowed & figured by all the old sacrificing priestlihoodes. In him therefore they were all conteined and fulfilled, in him they ceassd, as we haue sometimes already repeated, & the epistle to the Hebrue without help of anie glosses tellieth. But if they be so much delited with the ceremonies of Moses, why doe they not hastilie take oxen, calues, & lambes to make sacrifices? They haue in deed a good part of the old tabernacle & of the whole Jewish manner of worshipping: but yet this wanteth in their religion, that they doe not sacrifice calues and oxen. Who cannot see, that this obseruation of anointing is much more hurtfull than Circumcision, specially when there is ajoining superstition and Pharisaical opinion of the worthiness of the worke? For the Jewes did set in Circumcision, trust of righteousness: these men doe set in anointing, spiritual graces. Therefore while they couet to be counterfa- ters of the Levites, they are made Apostataes from Christ, and doe put themselves from the office of pastors.

31 This is (if God will) the holy yole that printeth the marke that can not be erased out. As though yole could not be wiped away with dust & salt, or if it sticke faster, with sope. But this marke is spiritual. What hath yole to do with the soule: Have they forgotten that which they oft chant to vs out of Augustine, that if the worde be taken from the water, it shall bee nothing but water, and that it hath this from the worde that it is a sacrament? What word wil they shew in their fat liquor? Will they shew the commandement that was given to Moses, concerning the anointing of the sonnes of Aaron? But there is also commandement given, of the coate, the ephod, the har, the crowne of holinesse, with which Aaron was to be garnished, and of the coats, girdles, and mitres, wherewith the sonnes of Aaron were to be clothed. There is commandement given to kill a calf, and burn the fat of him for incense, to cut rammes and burne them, to sanctifie their ears and garments with the bloud of another ram, and innumerable other obserua- tions, which being passed over, I maruaile why the onely anointing of yole pleaseth them. But if they love to bee sprinkleed, why are they rather sprinkleed with yole than with bloude? Forfooth they goe about a wittie thing, to make one religion of Christianitie, Jewihsnesse, and paganisme, as it were of parches sowed together. Therefore their anointing stinketh which is without the salt, that is, the worde of God. There remaineth laying on of hands, handes, which as I grant in true and lawfull Orderings to be a Sacrament, so I deny that it hath anie part in this plaine, where they neither obie the commandement of Christ, nor have respect to the ends whereunto the promife ought to lead us. If they will not have the signe denied them, they must apply it to the thing it selfe, whereunto it is appointed.

32 About the order also of Deaconrie I would not shewe with them, if that same ministerie which was in the Apostles time & in the purer church, were restored to the uncorrupted state thereof. But what like thing have they whose those men saine to be deacons? I speake not of the men (least they should complaine that the doctrine is wrongfullie weighed by faults of the men) but I affirme that for those whom they deliver vs by their doctrine, they unworthilie fetch testimonie from the example of them whom the Apostolike Church ordained Deacons. They say that it pertaineth to their deacons to stand by the priestes, to minister in all things that are done in the Sacraments, namele in baptisme, in the chrisme, in the patine, in the chalice to bring in the offerings & lay them upon the altar, to make ready the Lorde's table, and to couer it, to carry the croffe, to pronounce & sing the Gospel and epistle to the people. Is here any one worde of the true ministerie of Deacons? Now let vs heare the instituting of them. Vpon the Deacon that is ordered, the bishop alone bith his hande. Hee laieth a prayer booke and a Stoale upon his left shoulder, that he may understand that he hath receiued the light yoke of the Lorde, whereby hee may subdue to the feare of God those things that pertaine to the left side. He giueth him the text of the Gospel, that he may perceive himselfe to be a publisher of it. And what belong thefe things to Deacons? They do even like as if a man would say that he ordained them Apostles whome hee appointed onelie to burne frankincense, to trimme the images, to swepe the Churches, to catche mice, to driue awaye dogges. Who could suffer such kind of men to be called Apostles, and to bee compared with the verie Apostles of Christ? Therefore let them not henceafter lyinglie saie that those be Deacons, whom they institute onelie for their enterlaidlike plaies. Yea & by the verie name it selfe they sufficienctly declare what manner of office they haue. For they call the Levites, and will have their order & beginning referred to the children of Levi. Which I give them leave to do, so that they do not afterward garnish them with the fethers of other.

33 Of Subdeacons to what purpose is it to speake? For wheras indee they were in old time appointed for care of the poore, they affigne to them I wot not what trifling businesse, as to bring the chalice and the patine, the little cruci with water, and the towel to the altar, to powre water to waie hands, &c. Now whereas they speake of receiuing & bringing in of offerings, they meane those which they deuoure as abandooned to their holiest use. With this office verie well agree the forme of their consecrering. That he receive of the bishop, the patine and the chalice: of the Archdeacon, the cruci with water, the manuale, and such other bagage. Within these trifles they require to haue vs confesse that the holiest Ghoste is enclosed. What godlie man can abide to graunt this? But, to make once an end, wee may determine the same of them: we do of the rest. Neither neede wee to

repete for her these things that are above declared. This may be enough to teach the sober & willing to learn (whom I have taken in hand to instruct) that there is no Sacrament of God but where is shewed a Ceremonie joined with a promise, or rather verily but where is a promise scene in a Ceremony. Here is not found one syllable of any certaine promises therefore it were in vain to seeke a Ceremonie to confirm the promise. Againe of those Ceremonies that they use, it is not read that any one is institute of God. Therefore here can be no Sacrament.

Of Matrimony.

34 The last is Matrimony, which as all men confesse to be ordeined of God, so no man vntill the time of Gregorie cersaweth it was given for a Sacrament. And what sober man would ever have thought it? It is a good and a holy ordinance of God, so tillage, carpentrie, shoemakers craft, barbers craft, are lawfull ordinances of God, and yet they are no Sacramentes. For there is not onely this required in a Sacrament, that it be the worke of God, but that it be an outwarde Ceremonie appointed of God to confirm a promise. That there is no such thing in Matrimony, very children also can judge. But (say they) it is a signe of the holy thing, that is, of the spiritual conjoynnge of Christ with the Church. If by this word Signe, they understand a Toyfe or before vs of God to this end to raise vp assurednesse of our faith, they are far beside truth. If they simpley take a signe for which is brought to express a similitude, I will shew how wittily they reason. Paul faith, As one star differeth from another starre in brightness, so shalle the resurrection of the dead. Lo, here is one Sacrament. Christ faith, The kingdom of heaven is like a graine of mustard seede. Lo, here is another. Againe, The kingdom of heaven is like vnto leaué. Lo, here is the third. Esay faith, Behold, the Lord shalle seede his flocke as a shepheard. Lo, here is the fourth. In an other place, The Lord shalle goe forth as a Giant. Lo, here is the fifth. Finally what end or measure shal there be? There is nothing but by this meanesse it shal be a Sacrament. How many parables and similitudes are in the Scripture, so many Sacramentes there shalbe. Yea & thes shall be a Sacrament because it is written, the day of the Lord is like a thief. Who can abide these sophisters prating so foolishly? I grant in deed, y so oft as we see a vine, it is very good to call to remembrance that which Christ saith, I am a vine, ye be branches, my Father is the vinedresser. So oft as a shepherde with his flocke commeth toward vs, it is good also that this come to our minde, I am a good shepherde, my sheepe hearne my voice. But if any man addeth much similitudes to the number of Sacramentes, he is meete to be sent to Antycira.

35 But they still lay forth the words of Paul, in which he giueth to matrimony the name of a Sacrament: hee that loueth his wife, loueth himselfe. No man ever hated his owne fleshe, but nourished it and cherished it, even as Christ doth the Church; because we are members of his body, of his flesh and of his bones. For this a man shall leaue his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and they shall be two into one fleth. This is a great Sacrament but I say in Christ and in the Church. But so to handle the Scriptures, is to mingle heauen and earth together. Paul, to there to married men, what singular love they ought to bear to their wives, setteth forth Christ to them for an example. For as he poured forth the bowels of his kindnesse vp to the Church which he had espoused to himselfe: so ought every man to be affectioned towards his owne wife. It followeth after, that he that loveth his wife loveth himselfe: as Christ loved the Church. Nowe to teach howe Christ loved the Church as himselfe, yea: howe he made himselfe one with his spouse the Church, he applieth to him those things which Moses reporteth that Adam spake of himselfe. For when Eve was brought into his sight, whom he knewe to have beene shapen out of his side: This woman (saith hee) is a bone of my bones, and fleche of my fleche. Paul testifieth that all this was spiritually fulfilled in Christ and vs, when he faith that we are members of his bodie of his flech, and of his bones, yea and one fleche with him. At length he addeth a concluding sentence, This is a great mysterie. And least any man should be deceived with the double signifying of these words, he expresseth that he speaketh not of the fleshly conyoning of man and woman, but of the spiritual mariaige of Christ and the Church. And truly it is in deede a great mysterie, that Christ suffered a ribbe to be taken from himselfe, whereof we might be shapen: that is to say, when he was strong, he willed to be weake, that we might be strengthened with his strength: that nowe we may not our selues lie, but hee may live in vs.

36 The name of Sacrament deceuied them. But was it rightfull that the whole Church should suffer the punishment of their ignorance? Paul layde Mysterie: which word when the translator might haue left being not vsued with Latin cares, or might haue translated it a Secret: he chose rather to put in the word Sacramett, yet in no other sense than Paul had in Greeke called it mysterie. Nowe let them goe and with crying out raile against the skille of tongues, by ignorance whereof they haue so long frstly beene blinde in an easie matter, & such as ostred it selue to be perceived of euery man. But why do they in this one place so earnestly sticke upon this little word Sacrament, and some other times do passe it oute unregarded? For as in the Epistle to Timothee the Translator hath vsed it, and in the selue Epistle to the Ephesians: in every place for mysterie. But let this slipping be pardoned them: at least the lyes ought to have had a good remembrance. For, when they haue once set our Matrimonie with title of a Sacrament, afterwarde to call it vnleaneffe, deseling, and fleshly filthinesse, how giody lightenesse is this: howe great an absurdiitie is it to debarre priests from a Sacrament? If they denie that they debarre them from the Sacrament, but from the lust of copulation: they escape not so away from me. For they teach that the copulation selue is a part of the Sacrament, and that by it alone is figured the uniting that we have with Christ in conformitie of nature: because man and woman are not made one but by carnall copulation. Howbeit some of them haue here founde two Sacraments: the one of God and the soule, in the betrothed man & woman: the other of Christ and the Church, in the husband and the wife. Howfoeter it be, yet copulation is a Sacrament, from which it is vallawfull that any Christian should be debarred: vnliefe peraduenture the Sacramentes of Christians doe so ill agree, that they can not stande

And together. There is also an other absurditie in their doctrines. They affirm that in the sacrament is given the grace of the holy ghost: they teach that copulation is a sacrament: and they deny that at copulation the holy Ghost is at any time present.

37 And, because they would not simply mock the Church, how long a waste of errors, lies, deceites, and wickednes ses have they knit to one error? so that a man may say, that they did nothing but secke a Denne of abominations, when they made of matrimony a Sacrament. For when they once obtained this, they drew to themselves the hearing of causes of matrimonic: for it was a spirituall matter, which prophane judges might not meddle with. Then they made lawes, whereby they stablished their tyranny, but those partly manifestly wicked against God, and partly most vnjust toward men. As are these: That marriages made betweene yong persons without consent of their parents, should remaine of force and stablished, that the marriages be not lawfull betweene the kinsfolkes to the fourth degree: and if any such bee made, that they be divorced. And the vertic degrees, they saie against the lawes of all nations, and against the civill government of Moses. That it bee not lawfull for a man that hath put away an adulteresse, to marry an other. That spiritual kinsfolkes may not be coupled in marriage. That there be no marriages celebrate, from Septuagesime to the ves of Easter, in three weekes before Midsummer, nor from Advent, to Twelfe-tide. And innumerable other like, which it were long to rehearse. At length we must creepe out of their mine, wherein our talke hath now car- ried longer than I would. Yet I thinke I haue somewhat profited, that I have partly plucked the lyons skinneres from these afferes.

The xx. Chapter.

Of Civill government.

Nowe whereas we haue above set two kindes of government in man, and whereas we haue spoken enough of the one kind which consisteth in the soule or in the inwarde man, and hath respect to eternal life: this place requireth that we speake somewhat also of the other, which pertaineth only to the civill and outwarde righteousness of manners. For the cause of this matter seemeth to be seuered from the spiritual doctrine of faith, which I rooke in hande to entreate of: yet the proceeding shalowe that I do rightly join them together, yea that I am of necesseitie compelled to doe it especially sithen on the one side, madde and barbarous men doe furiously go about to overthrow this order stablished by God D: and on the other side the flaterrers of princes, advancing their power without measure, stike not to set it against the empire of God himselfe. Vnlesse both these mistiches be met withal, the pureness of faith shall be lost. Besides that it is not smallie for our behoofe, to know how lovingly God hath in this behalfe provided for mankinde, that there may flourish in vs a greater desire of godlinessse to witness our thankfulnessse. First, ere we enter into the thing it selfe, we must holde falt that distinction which wee haue above.
Cap. 20. Of the outwarde meanes

For, least (as it commonly happeneth to many) we unwisely mingle these two things together, which have altogether divers consideration. For when they heare that libertie is promised by the Gospel, which acknowledgeth among men no king and no magistrate, but hath regard to Christ alone: they think that they can take no fruite of their libertie, so long as they see any power to have preeminence over them. Therefore they think that nothing shall be safe, vnlesse the whole world be reformed into a newe fashion: where may neither be judgement, nor lawes, nor magistrates, nor any such thing which they thinke to withstande their libertie. But whosoever can put difference betwene the body and the soule, between this present & transitory life, and that life to come and eternall: he shall not hardly understand that the spiritual kingdom of Christ, and the civill governement are things farre a funder, Sith therefore that is a Jewishe vanity, to secte & inclose the kingdom of Christ under the elementes of this world: let vs rather thinke, as the scripture plainly teacheth, that it is a spiritual fruite, which is gathered of y beneftie of Christ, remember to keep within the bonds there of this whole libertie which is promised and offered vs in him. For what is y cause why the same Apostle which biddeth vs to stand, and not to be made subject to the ycke of bondage, in an other place forbideth bondes, to be carfull of their state: But because spiritual libertie may very well agree with civill bondage? In which sense also thes his sayings are to be taken: In the kingdom of God there is no lewe, nor Grecian, no male, nor female, no bondman, nor freeman. Againe, There is no lewe nor Grecian, Circumcision, Uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, Bondman, Freeman: but Christ is all in all. Whereby he signifieth, that it maketh no matter in what estate thou be among men, nor under the lawes of what nation thou liest: forasmuch as in these things consisteth not the kingdom of Christ.

Yet doeth not this distinction tende henceunto, that we shoulde thinke that the whole order of policie is an vnclene thing, nor pertaining at all to Christian men. So indeed doth the phrenitike men, that are delighted with unbridled licentiousnesse, crie out and boast. For Sith we be dead by Christ to the elementes of the worlde, and being removed into the kingdom of God doe sit among the heavenly ones: they thinke that it is vnworthie for vs, & farre beneath our excellence, to bee occupiied with these prophane and vnclene cares that are busie about affairs not pertaining to a Christian man. To what purpose (say they) are lawes without judgements and judgementes? But what hath a Christian man to do with judgementes themselves? yea if it be not lawfull to kill, whereto servce lawes and judgementes among vs: But as we have euene nowe giuen warning, that this kind of governement is feuerall from that spiritual and inward kingdom of Christ: so it is also to be known that they nothing disagree together. For the civill governement doth now beginne in vs upon earth certaine beginnings of the heavenly kingdom, and in this mortall and vanishing life, doth as it were enter vpon an immortal and incorruptible blessednesse: but the intent of his spiritual governement is, so long as wee shall live among men, to cherish and maintaine the outward worshippinge of God, to defend the founde doctrine of Godlinessse and the state of the Church, to frame our life to the felfellowship of men, to fashion our manners to civil righteousness, to procure vs into friendship one with another, to nourish common peace and quietness; all which I grant to be superfluous, if the kingdom of God, such as it is now among vs doe destroy this present life. But if the will of God be so, that we while we long toward the heavenly country, should bee wayfaring from home upon the earth: and such the vs of such wayfaring needeth such helpes: they which take them from man, doe take from him his vertic nature of man. For whereas they allledge that there is so great perfection in the Church of God, that her owne moderate government sufficeth it for a law: they themselves doe foolishly imagine that perfection which can never bee founde in the common fellowship of men. For if of naughtie men the pride is so great, and the wickednesse so obstinate, as cannot bee restrained with great sharpnes of lawes: what thinke we that they will doe, if they fee vnpunished libertie lyce open to their lewdnesse, which cannot euen with force be sufficiently compelled not to doe cuill.

3 But of the order of policie, there shall be an other fitter place to entreat. Nowe our meaning is to have this onely understood, that to this vs to drive it away, is outrageous barbarousnes, the vs whereof is no lesse among men, than of breade, water, the sunne, and aire, but the dignitie much more excellent. For it tendeth not onely hereunto (which is the only commoditie of all those things) that men may breath, eate, drinke and bee cherished (although in deede it comprehendeth all these things, while it maketh that they live together) yet I say, it tendeth not hereunto onely: but also that idolatrie, sacrileges against the name of God, blasphemies against his truth, and other offences of religion may not rife vp and be scattered among the people, that common quiet be not troubled, that every man may keepe his owne safe and vnappiered, that men may vse their affaires together without hurt, that honestie and modestie be kept among them: finally that among Christians may be a common sheewe of religion, and among men may be manlike ciuilitie. Neither let any man bee moued, for that I doe nowe referre the care of establishing of religion to the policie of men, which I seeme before to have let without the judgment of men. For I do no more here, than I did before, gave men leave after their owne will to make lawes concerning religion and the worshipping of God, when I allow the ordinance of policie, which endeavoureth hereunto, that the true religion which is contained in the lawes of GOD be not openly and with publique sacrileges freely brake and defiled. But the readers being holpen by the verie plainnesse of order, shall better understand what is to bee thought of the whole kinde of ciuill government, if we seuerallie entreat of the partes thereof. There be three partes of it: the magistrature which is the governour and keeper of the lawes, the lawes according to which hee governeth the people, which are governed by the lawes, and obey the Magistrate. Therefore let vs first consider of the office of the Magistrate, whether it bee a lawfull vocation and allowed of God, what manner of office hee hath, and howe great is his power, then with what lawes a Christian ciuill state is to be ordered: then last of all, what profite of the lawes commeth to the people, what reverence is due to the magistrate.
Cap. 20. Of the outward means.

4. The Lord hath not only testified that the office of magistrates is allowed and acceptable to him, but also setting out the dignity thereof with most honourable titles, he hath marvellously commended it unto vs. That I may rehearse a fewe of them. Whereas whosoever be in place of magistrates are named Gods, let no man thinke that in that naming is small importance. For therby is signified that they have commandement from God, that they are furnished with the authoritie of God and doe altogether beare the person of God, whose stede they do after a certaine maner supplie. This is not my caullion, but the exposition of Christ. If the scripture (faith here) called them Gods to whom the word of God was given: What is this else, but that God hath committed his business to them, that they shoulde serve in his office, and (as Moses and Josaphat laide to their Judges whom they appointed in every feueral citie of Juda) that they shoulde sit in judgement, not for man but for God? To the same purpose maketh this that the wife of God affirmeth by the mouth of Solomon, that it is his worke, that Kings reigne, and counsellors decree righteous things, that princes beare principalitie, and all the judges of the earth execute judgement. For this is all one in effect as if it had been said, that it commeth not to passe by the persons of men, that the government of all things in earth is in the hand of kings and other rulers, but by the prouidence & holy ordinance of God, to whom it so seemed good to order the matters of men: forasmuch as he is both present and presidents among them in making of laws & in executing yprightnes of judgementeres. Which Paul also plainly teacheth, when he reckeneth governments among the gifts of God, which being diversely distributed according to the diuerstie of grace, ought to be imploied of the feruants of Christ to the edificatio of the Church. For although he there properly speakeeth of a counsell of graue men, which in the Primitive Church were appointed, they should have the rule of ordening the publike discipline (which office in the Epistle to the Corinthians he calleth Government) yet forasmuch as we see that the end of all power commeth to the same point, it is no doubt but that he commendeth vs a kind of just government. But he speakeoth more plainly, where he purposely maketh a full discourse of that matter. For he both sheweth that power is the ordinance of God, and that there are no powers, but they are ordained of God: & that the Princes themselves are the ministers of God, to the well doers vs to praise; to the euill, reuengers vs to wrath. Hereunto may be added also the examples of holy men: of which some have possessed kingdoms, as David, Josias, Exehias: other some, Lords and ships, as Joseph and Daniel: other some, Cuilli governmentes in a free people, as Moses, Josue, and the Judges: whose offices the Lord hath declared that he alloweth. Wherefore none ought nowe to doubte that the cuilli power is a vocation not onely holy and lawfull before GOD, but also the most holy, and the most honest of all other in the whole life of men.

5. They which couet to bring in a state without Rulers, take exception and say that although in olde time there were kings and judges over rude people, yet at this day ye seruile kind of governing agreeth not with the perfection which Christ hath brought with his Gospel. Wherein they bewray not not only their ignorance, but also their diueltih pride, while they take upon themselves perfection, of which not so much as the hundredth part is seen in them. But what manner of mensoever they be, it is easie to confute it: because where David exhorteeth all kings and Rulers to strive the sonne of God, he doth not bid them, giving over their authoritie, to take themselves to a private life, but to submit the power that they beare to Christ, that he alone may have preeminence above all. Likewise Eay, when he promiseth that kings shall be fathers of the Church, and Queenes shall be noutes, he doth not depose them from their honour; but rather doth by an honourable title make them defenders to the godlie worshippers of God. For, that prophecie pertaineth to the coming of Christ, I do wittingly passe over many testimonies which do eche where offer themselves, and specially in the Psalme wherein all governours have their right maintained. But most cleare of all is the place of Paul, where admonishing Timothee that in the common assembly prayers must be made for kinges, he by and by addeth a reason. That we may under them lead a quiet life with all godlinesse and honestie: in which words he committeeth the state of the Church to their defence and safeguarding.

6 Which consideration ought continually to busie the magistrates themselves, forasmuch as it may put a great spurre to them whereby they may be pricked forward to their duty, and bring them a singular comfort whereby they may mitigate the harshnesse of their office, which truly are both many and great. For with how great an endeue of vprightenesse, wisdome, mildnes, continence, & innocencie, ought they to charge themselves, which know themselves to be appointed ministers of the righteousnes of God? By what affiance shall they admit unjustice to their judgement seat, which they heare to bee the throne of the living God? By what boldnes shall they pronounce a wrongfull sentence with that mouth, which they understand to be appointed an instrument for the truth of God? With what conscience shall they subscribe to wicked decrees with the hand which they know to be ordained to write the acts of God? In a summe, if they remember that they bee the vicegerents of God, they must watch with all care, earnestnes; & diligence, that they may reprent in themselves vnto men a certaine image of the providence, prefervation, goodnes, good will, and righteousnesse of God. And they must continually set this before their eyes, that if all they be accursed, they doe execute in decete the worke of the vengeance of God, they aie much more grievously accursed, that sие themselves deceitfully in a rightfull vocation. Therefore when Moses and Josaphat minded to exhort their judges to their dutie, they had nothing more effectuall to move their minde withall, than that which we have before rehearsed, Looke what ye do. For yet sett in judgement not for man but for God: namely he which is nere to you in cause of judgement. Now therefore let the feare of the Lorde bee vpon you. Looke & be diligent: because there is no persuer with the Lord our God. And in another place it is said, the God stood in the assembly of the Gods & sitteth judge in the middef of the gods, y they may bee encouraged to their dutie when they heare that they be the deputies of God, to whose they must one day yeld eacomp of the government of their charge. And wort-
Cap. 20. Of the outward means

thely this admonition ought to be of great force with them. For if they make any default, they are not only wrong doers to men, who they wickedly vex, but also slanderers to God himself, whose holy judgements they defile. Againe they have also whereupon they may singularly comfort themselves, when they consider with themselves that they are not busied in prophane affairs and such as are not fit for the servant of God, but in a most holy office, namely forasmuch as they are the deputies of God.

7 As for them that are not moved with so many testimonies of Scripture from being bolde to raile at this holy ministerie, as a thing disagreeing with Christian religio and godlinesse: what do they else but raile at GOD himselfe, the dishonour of whom can not but be joyned with the reproche of his minister? And surely they do not refuse the magistrates, but do cast away God, that he should not reigne ouer them. For if the Lorde sayde this truly of the people of Israel: because they had refused the government of Samuel: Why shall it be lesse truly saide at this day of them that give themselves leave to rage against all governementes ordained of God? But sift the Lorde sayde to the disciples, that the kings of nations bear rule ouer them, but that among them it is not so, where he that is the first must be made the last: by this saying it is forbidden to all Christians that they should not take kingdoms or governementes upon them. O handsome expostors! There rofe a strife among the disciples, which of them excelled other: the Lorde, to suppress this vaine ambition, taught them that their ministerie is not like unto kingdoms, in which one man hath preeminence above the rest. I beseech you, what doeth this comparison make to the dishonour of kinglie dignity? can what doeth it prove at all, but that the ministerie of an Apostle is not the office of a king? Moreover although among the magistrates themselves there be diversie forms, yet there is no difference in this behalf, but that we ought to take them all for the ordinances of God. For Paul also doeth comprehendeth them altogether, when hee sayth that there is no power but of God: and that which beft liked him of all, is commended with notable testimonie above the other, namely the power of one: which because it bringeth with it a common bondage of all (except that one man to whose will it maketh all things subject) in old time could lesse be allowed of noble and the excellent sort of natures. But the Scripture to meet with their vniust judgementes, expressly by name affirmeth, that it is the providence of Gods wifedome that kinges do reigne, and peculiarly commandeth the king to be honored.

8 And truly it were very vaine that it should be disputed of private men which should bee the beft state or policy in the place where they live: for whom it is not lawfull to consult of the framing of any common weale. And also the same could not be simply determined without rashnesse, forasmuch as a great parte of the order of this question consisteth in circumstances. And if thou consider also the states themselves together without circumstances, it shall not be easie to discern which of them overweigh the other in profablENCESSE, they match so equally together. There is an easie way to fall from kingdom into tyranny: but not much harder is it to fall from the rule of the chiefeft men to the faction of a seue: but most easie of all from the peoles government, to sedition. Truely, if those three forms of governments which the Philosophers set out, to be considered in these clues I will not deny that either the government of the cheefeest men, or a state tempered of it and common government fare excellet as all other not of it selfe, but because it most feldome chaunceth that kings so temper themselves that their will never swarath from that which is just & right, again, that they be furnished with so great sharpness of judgement and wisdome that every one of them seeth so much as is sufficient. Therefore the fault or default of men makeeth, that it is safer and more tolerable that many should have the government, that they may mutually one help another, one teach and admonish another, and if any advance himself higher than is meet, there may be overseers and masters to restrain his wilfulness. This both hath always bin approved by experience, and the Lord also hath confirmed it with his authoritie, when he ordered among the Israelites a government of the best men very neere vnto common government, at such time as hee mind-ded to have them in best estate, till he brought forth an image of Christ in David. And as I willingly grant that no kind of government is more blessed than this, where liberty is framed to such moderation as it ought to be, and is orderly established to continuance; so I comte them also most blessed, y may enjoy this estate: & if they stoutly and constantly travell in preferring and retaining it, I grant that they do nothing against their dutie. Yea & the magistrates ought with most great diligence to bend themselves hereunto, that they suffer not the libertie of the people, of which they are appointed governours, to be in any part minished, much leefe to be dissolue: if they be negligent and little carefull therein, they are false faithbreakers in their office, and betrayers of their country. But if they would bring this kinde to themselves, to whom the Lord hath appointed an other forme of government, so that thereby they be moved to desire a change, the very thinking thereof shall not only bee foolishie and superfluous, but also hurtfull.
But if thou bend not thine eyes onely to one citie, but looke about or behold the whole world together, or at least spreade abroad thy sight into further distances of countreys, without doubt thou shalt finde that this is not unprofitably appointed by the providence of God, that diuerse countreys should be ruled by diuerse kindes of government. For as the elementes hang together but by an vngeall temperature, so countreys also are with their certaine in equality very well kept in order. Howbeit all these things also are spoken in vaine to them whom the will of the Lorde shall satisfye, for if it be his pleasure to set kings over kingdomes, Senates, or officers over free citie, whoseuer he maketh rulers in the places where we are owners, it is our dutie to shew our selves yeelding and obedient vnto them.

Now the office of Magistrates is in this place to be declared by the way, of what sort it is described by the worde of God, and in what things it consisteth. If the scripture did not teach, yit extendeth to both the tables of lawe we might learne it out of the prophane writers. For none hath in-treasted of the dutie of Magistrates, of making of lawes and of publike weale, that hath nor begon at religion and the worshipping of God. And to haue they all confessed, that no policie can be happily framed, vnlesse the first care be of godlinesse, and that those lawes be preposterous which neglecting right or God, doe provide only for men, Sith therefore with all the Philosophers religion hath the first place, & Sith the same hath alway bin observed by the univerall consent of all nations, let Christian princes and magistrates bee ashamed of their slothfulness, if they endeavour not themselves to this care. And we have already shewed, that this duty is specially enjoyned them of God: as it is meete, that they should imperie their trauen to defende and maintain his honour, whose vicegerentes they bee, and by whose benefite they gouerne. For this cause also cheefly are the holy kings praised in scripture, for that they retorcd y worship of God being corrupted or overthrown, or toke care of religion, that it might flourish pure and safe vnder them. But contrariwise y holy historicke reckeneth states without gouernors, among faultes, saying that there was nothing in Israel, and that therefore euerie man did what pleased himselfe. Whereby their follie is confuted, which would have them neglecting the care of God, one to apply themselves to bee judges of law among me. As though God appointed gouernours in his name to decide controversiies, and omitted that which was of much weightier importance, that he himselfe should be worshipped according to the prescribed rule of his lawe. But a desire to innovate all things without punishment moueth troublesome men to this point, that they with all reuengers of the breach of peace to be taken away. As for so much as pertaineth to the second table, Ieremia warmeth kings, to do judgment and righteousnes, to deliver the forceable oppresse fro the hand of the false accuser, not to grieve the stranger and widow, not to do wrong, and not to shed innocens blood. To the same purport maketh the exhortation which is read in the 42. Psalme, that they should render right to the poore and needy, acquite the poore and needy, deliver the poore and needy from the hand of the oppressor. And Moses giveth charge to the Princes whom he had set in his stead, let them heare the cause of their brethren, and judge betweene a man and his brother & stra- gger, and not know faces in judgement, let them heare as well the little as the great, and be not afraid of any man, because it is the judgement of God. But I speake not of these things: that kings should not get to themselves multitudes of horses, not cast their minds to covetousnesse, not to be lifted above their brethren: that they may be continually busied in studying upon the lawe of the Lorde all the days of their life: that Judges sworne not to the one side, nor receiue gifts: because in declaring here the office of magis- trates, my purpose is not so much to instruct the magistrates themselfes, as to teach other what Magistrates bee, and to what ende they are set of God. Wee see therefore that they be ordained, defenders and reuengers of innocence, modestie, honestie, and quietnesse, whose only end you shoulde bee to provide for the common safety and peace of all men. Of which vertues Da- vid professeth he will be an examplar, when he shall be advanced to the roy- all seat: that is, that hee will not consent to any euill doinges, but at horre- wicked men, fraudlers, and proude men, and get to himselfe from ech where honest and faithfull men. But Sith they cannot perfome this, yni- sely they defend good men from the wrongs of the euill, let them helpe the good with succour and defence, let them also be armed with power whereby they may may severally suppress open evil doers and wicked men by whose lewdnes the common quiet is troubled or vexed. For we thoroughly find this by experience which Solon said, that common weakes consist of reward & punishment, & that when those be taken away, the whole discipline of cities faileth & is dissolved. For the care of equity, justice waxeth cold in the minds of many unless there be due honor ready for verteue; neither can the wilful effe of wicked men be restrained but by severitie and chasteiment of paines.

And these two partes the prophet comprehended, when he biddeth kings and other governours to do judgement and righteousness. Righteousnes is, to take into charge of tuition, to embrace, to defend, to revenge, to deliver the innocent. Judgement is, to with.fand the boldnes of wicked men, to re-press their violence, to punish their offences.

10 But here, as it seemeth, doth arise a high and hard question. If by the law of God all Christians are forbidden to kill, and the Prophet prophesieth of the holy mount of God, that is, the Church, that in it they shall not afflict nor hurt: how many magistrates be together both godly & blood shedders? But if we understand, that the Magistrate in executing of punishments, doth nothing of himself, but execute the verie felse judgements of God, wee shall be nothing concerned with this dour. The lawe of the Lord forbiddeth to kill. But in man slaughter should be unpunished, the lawe maker him self giueth to the ministers the swordes in their hande, which they should drawe forth against all man slayers. To affliet and to hurt is not the doing of the godly; but this is not to hurt, not to affliet, by the Lorde's commandement to revenge the afflications of the godly. I would to God this were alway present before our minde, that nothing is here done by the railleness of man, but all things by the authoritie of God that commandeth, which going before vs, we never swarce out of the right way. Unlesse perhaps there be a bridle put upon the righteousnes of God, that it may not punish wicked doings. But if it be not lawfull to appoint any law to it, why shall we call against the ministers of it? They beare not the swordes in vayne, sayeth Paul; for they be the ministers of God to wrath, revengers to euill doers. Therefore if Princes & other rulers know that nothing shall be more acceptable to God than their obedience, let them applie this ministerie, if they desire to shew their godlinesse, righteousness, & vn corruption allowable to God. With this affection was Moses led, when knowing himself appointed by the power of the Lorde to bee the deliverer of his people, he layde his handes upon the Aegyptian. Again, when by slaying of three thousand men in one day, he rooke vengeance of the sacrilege of the people. David also when ye to the ende of his life he gave commandement to Salomon his sonne to slay Ioad & Semei, Whereupon he also rehearsed this among the vertues of a king, to slay the wicked of the lande, that all workers of wickednes, may be driven out of the city of God. To which purpose also pertaineth the prai.se that is given to Salomon, Thou haft loved righteousness and haft hared wickednesse. How doth that milde and gentle nature of Moses burne out into so great cruellie, that being sprinkled and embrued with the blood of his brothen, he runneth throughout the campe to newe slaughters? How doth David, a man of so great gentlenes in all his life, among his last brea-things make that bloody testament, that his sonne should not bring habe of Joab and Semiramis in peace to the grave: But they both, when they executed the vengeance committed to them of God, so sanctified with cruel dealing their handes which they had defiled with sparing. It is an abomination with kings; six Salomon, to doe iniquitie, because his throne is stablisbed in righteousness. Againe, The king which sitteth in the throne of judgement spreadeth his eyes upon every cuill man. Againe, A wise king scattereth the wicked and turneth them upon the wheel. Againe, Take away the droffe from the furer, and there shall come forth a vessell to the makere take away the wicked man from the sight of the king, and his throne shall be fast set in righteousnes. Againe, he that justifieth the wicked, and he that condemneth the righteous, both are abomination to the Lord. Againe: A rebellious man purchaseth cuill to himselfe, and a cruel messenger is sent unto him. Againe, who so layeth to the wicked man, thou art righteous, him peoples and nations do curse. Now if their true righteousnes be, with drawn swords to pursuie guilty and wicked men: let them put vp their swords, and holde their handes pure from blood, while in the mean time desperate men do range with murthers and slauthers: then they shall make themselves guilty of most great wickednesse, so much lesse shall they get thereby the praise of goodnesse and righteousnesse. Onelie let there be no precifie and cruel rigoroufnesse, and that judgement seare which may worthily be called the rocke of accursed men. For I am not hee that either fauour extreme crueltie, or do thinke that righteous judgement can be pronounced, but while clemencie the best and surest counsellor of kings, as Salomon affirmeth, the prouerbe of the kings throne is assiuent, which a certaine man in old time cruelly layd to be the principall gift of Princes. Yet a magistrate must take heed to both, that he do neither with rigoroufnesse of minde wound rather than heale, or by superstitious afsestation of clemencie fall into a most cruel gentlenesse, if with soft and loose tendernesse he bee dissolute to the destruction of many men. For this was in old time not without cause commonly spoken under the empire of Nerua, that it is in deede cuill to liue under a prince vnder whom nothing is lawfull, but much worse vnder whom all things are lawfull.

11 But whith sometime kings and peoples must of necessitie take swordes in hande to execute such publique vengeance, by this reason we may also judge that the warres are lawfull which are so taken in hand. For if there be power deliered them, whereby they may maintaine quiet to their dominion, whereby they may keepe downe the seditious stirres of vnquiet men, whereby they may helpe the forceable oppressed, whereby they may punish euill doing, can they at fitter laces vter it, that to suppress his rage which troubleth both privately the rest of every man, and the common quiet of all men, which sediously maketh vprores, which committeth violent oppressions and hayme euill doings? If they ought to bee prouerbers and defenders of the lawes, they must also overthrowe the enterprizes of all them by whose wicked doing the discipline of lawes is corrupted. Yet if they worthily punish those theeuers whose injuries have extended onelie to a fewe; shall they suffer a whole country, to bee without punishment vexed and wasted with-

with robberies? For it maketh no difference whether he be a king or one of the baseft of the commonALtie, that invade an others country Into which he hath no right, & spoileth it like an enemy: all are alike to be taken & punished for robbers. This therefore both naturally equitie, & the rule of duty teacheth that Princes are armed not only to restrain private duties with indigntal punishments, but also to defend with war the dominions committed to their charge, at any time they be enimilale affailed. And such wars the holy ghost by manie testimonies of scripture declareth to be lawfull.

12 If it be objected against me, that in the newe Testament is neither witneffe nor example which teacheth that war is a thing lawful for Christians: first I answere, that the same rule of making war which was in old time remained also at this day, and on the contrary side there is no cause that may debar magistrates from defending of their subjectes. Secondhe that an express declaration of these matters is not to be sought in the writings of the Apostles, where their purpose is not to frame a civil state, but to establish the spiritual kingdom of Christ. Last of all I say that in them also is shewed by the way, that Christ hath by his coming changed nothing in this behalf. For if Christian doctrine (fy I may speak in Augustines own words) condemned all warses, this should rather have bin said to soldiery when they asked counsel of salvation, that they should cast away their weapons, and vertely withdraw themselves from the warre. But it was said to them: Strike no man do no man wrong, let your wages suffice you. Whome he taught y their wages ought to suffice them, he did verily not forbid them to be warriers. But al magistrates ought here to take great heed, that they nothing at all follow their own desires: but rather, if they must punish, let them not be born away with a headlong angerinesse, let them not be violently carried with hatred, let them not broil with unappealable tigor, yea, let them (as Augustine faith) pity the common nature in him in whom they punish his private fault. Or if they must put on armor against the enemie, that is, the armed robber, let them not lightly seek occasion thereof, nor take it being offered vnlesse they bee driven to it by extreme necessity. For if we ought to performe much more than that heathen man required, which would have warre to seem a seeking of peace: trulie we ought first to attempt all things ere we ought to trie the matter by warre. Finallie in both kindes let them not suffer them selves to be caried with any private affection, but be led solely with common feeling. Otherwise they do verie ill abuse their power, which is given them, not for their own commoditie, but for others benefit and ministrerie. Moreover of the same rightfull rule of making warre hangeth the order both of garrisons, & leagues and other civill fortifications. Garrisons I call those that are placed in townes to defend the borders of the coutrie: Leagues, which are made with Princes adjoyning for this covenant, if any trouble happen in their landes they may mutually help them, and joyn their forces in common together to suppress the common enemies of mankind: Civil fortifications, whose vce is in the arte of warre.

13 This also I will latt of all addde, that tributes & taxes are the lawfull revenues of princes, which they may chiefly employ to sustaine common charges of their office, which yet they may likewise vce to their private royaltie which.
which is after a certain manner conjoined with honor of the princely state that they bear. As we see that David, Ezekiel, Josias, Joseph, and other holy kings, and Joseph also and Daniel, according to the state of the persons that they did bear, were without offence of godliness sumptuous of the common charge, and wee read in Ezekiel there was a very large portion of land assigned to the kings. Where although bee paint out the spiritual kingdom of Christ, yet he set forth the example of his similitude from the lawfull kingdom of men. But yet so that Princes againe on their behalves should remember, that their treasure chambers are not so much their owne private costers, as the treasuries of the whole people (for so Paul testifieth) which they may not without manifest wrong prodigally waft or spoyle: or rather that it is the vertie blood of the people, which not to spare, is most cruelly unnatural necessity: and let them thinke, that their impositions, and subsidies and other kindes of tributes, are nothing but the supports of publique necessitie, whereby to wearie the poore commonwealth without cause, is tyrannical extortion. These things do not encourage Princes to wastfull expense and riot, (as verily there is no neede to adde a firebrande to their lustes that are of themselves too much alreadie kindled) but fith it much behooveth that they shoulde with pure conscience before God be bold to do all that they are bold to do, least with wicked boulndes they come into defying of God, they must be taught how much is lawfull for them. Neither is this doctrine superfluous for private men, that they should not rashly and stubbornly give them free leaue to grudge at any expenses of princes, although they exceede common and cuill meaure.

14 Next to the magistrate in civil states are lawes, the most strong newes of common wealthes, or (as Cicero calleth them according to Plato) the foules, without which the Magistrate cannot stande, as they againe without the Magistrate have no lawfull force. Therefore nothing could be more truelie saide, than that the lawe is a dumbe Magistrate, and that the Magistrat is a living law. But whereas I promised to speake, with what lawes a Christian cuill state ought to be ordered, there is no cause why any man should look for a long discourse of the best kind of lawes, which both should be infinite, and pertained not this present purpose and place: yet in a fewe words, and as it were by the way, I will touch what lawes it may vse godlyly before God, and be rightlie governed by them among men. Which vse thing I had rather to have vitrely passed over with silence, if I did not understand that many do herein in perilously err. For there be some that deny that a common weale is well ordered, which neglecting the cuill lawes of Moses is governed by the common lawes of nations. Howe dangerous and troublesome this sentence is, let other men consider, it shall bee enough for me to haue shewed that it is false and foolish. That common diuision is to be kept, which diuideth the whole lawe of God published into moral, ceremonial, and judicall lawes: and all the partes are to be fucially considered, that we may knowe what of them pertaineth to vs, \\n& what not. Neither in the meanse time let any man be confounded with this doubt, that judiciales and ceremonials also pertaine to the moral lawes. For although the olde writers which haue taught this diuision, were not ignorant that these two latter partes had their use about maners, yet because they might be changed and abrogated, the morals remaining safe they did not call them morals. They called that first part peculiarly by that name, without which cannot stand the true holinesse of manners, and the unchangeable rule of living rightlie.

15 Therefore the moral lawe (that I may first begin thereat) fith it is contained in two chiefe points, of which the one commandeth simply to worship God with pure faith and godlinesse, and the other to imbarme men with unsaine love, is the true and eternall rule of righteousness preferred to the men of all ages & times that will be willing to frame their life to the will of God. For this is his eternall and unchangeable will, that he himselfe should be worshipped of vs al, & that we should mutually love one another. The ceremoniall lawe was the schooling of the Iewes, where with it pleased the Lord to exercise the certaine childhood of that people, till that time of fulnesse come, wherein he would to the full manifestly show his wisdome to the earth, & deliver the truth of those things which then were shadowed with figures. The judicial lawe given to them for an order of civil state, gave certaine rules of equitie and righteousness, by which they might behaue themselves harmlesly & quietly together. And as that exercise of ceremonies properly pertained in deed to the doctrine of godlinesse namely which kept the Church of the Iewes in the worshippe and religion of God) yet it might be distinguishted from godlinesse it selfe: so this form of judicial orders (although it tended to no other end, but how the selfe same charitie might best be kept which is commandaed by the eternall lawe of God) yet had a certaine thing differing from the verie commandement of loving. As therefore the Ceremonies might be abrogate, godlinesse remaining safe and undestroyed: so these judiciall ordinances allo being taken away, the perpetuall duties and commandementes of charitie may continue. If this be true, verily there is libertie left to euery nation to make such lawes as they shall foresee to bee profitable for them: which yet must bee framed after the perpetuall rule of charitie, that they may in deede varie in forme, but haue the same reason. For I think that those barbarous and saufe lawes, as were those that gave honor to thecues, that allowed common copulation, & other both much more filthy and more against reason, are not to be taken for lawes: forasmuch as they are not onelie against all righteousness, but also against natural gentlenes & kindnesse of men.

16 This which I have said shall be plain, if in all lawes we behold these two things as wee ought, the making and the equitie of the law, upon the reason whereof the making it selfe is founded and staith. Equitie, because it is naturall, can be but one of all lawes: and therefore one lawe, according to the kinde of matter, ought to be the propounded end to all lawes. As for making of lawes, because they have certaine circumstances appended which they partly hang, if so that they tend all together to one market of equitie, though they be divers in make: thendo matter. Now sith it is ceryne that the law of God which we call morall is nothing else but a testimonie of the natural law, and of that conscience which is engraven of God in the minde of men, the whole rule of this equitie whereof we now spake is set forth therein.
Cap. 20. Of the outward means.

Therefore it alone also must be both the mark and rule and end of all lawes. Whatsoever laws shall be framed after that rule, directed to that mark, and limited in that end, there is no cause why we should disallow them, howsoever they otherwise differ from the Jewish lawe or one from another. The lawe of God forbidden to steal. What peine was appointed for thes in the civile state of the Jewes, is to be scene in Exodus. The most ancient lawes of other nations punished theft with recompence of double; the lawes that followed afterward, made difference betweene manifest theft and not manifest. Some proceeded to banishment, some to whipping, some at last to the punishment of death. False witnesse was amongst Jewes punished with recompence of egall paine, in some places only with greater thumes, in some places with hanging, in other some with the Croffe. Man-slaughter all lawes vniversallie doe reuenge with bloude, yet with diuers kindes of death. Against adulterers in some places were ordained seuerer paines, in some places lighter. Yet we see how with such diuersitie all tende to the same ende. For with one mouth they altogether pronounce punishment against all the offfences which have bin condemned by the eternall law of God, as manslaughter, thefts, adulterie, false witnesse: but in the manner of punishment they agree not. Neither is the same needful, nor yet expedient. There is some countrey, which vnlesse it be the we rigour with horribile examples against man-slayers, should be immediately bee destroyed with murders and robberies. There is some time that requireth the sharpe of paines to be increased. If there arise any trouble in a common weale, the evils that are wont to grow thereof must be amended with newe ordinances. In time of warre all humanitie would in the noyse of armes fall away, vnlesse there were cast into men an vnwonted fear of punishmentes. In barenesse, in pestilence, vnlesse greater seueritie be vsed, all things will come to ruine. Some nation is more bent to some certaine vice, vnlesse it be most sharply suppressed. Howe malicious and envious shall he bee against the publicke profite, that shall be offended with such diuersitie which is most fit to holde faft the observing of the lawe of God. For, that which some say, that the lawe of God given by Moses is dis honoured, when it being abrogate, newe are preferred above it, is most vaine. For neither are other preferred above it, when they are more allowed, not in simple comparison, but in respect of the estate of the times, place, and nation: neither is that abrogate which was never made for vs. For the Lord gave not that law by the hand of Moses, which should be published into all nations, & flourished elsewhere; but when hee had received the nature of the Jewes into his faith, defence, and protection, he willed to bee a lawmaker peculiarlie to them, and like a wise lawmaker, hee had in making of his lawes a certain singular consideration of them.

17 Now remaineth that we consider that which we have set in the last place, what profit of lawes, judicial orders, and magistrates, commeth to the common fellowship of Christians. Wherewith also is coupled another question, how much private men ought to yeeld to magistrates, & how far their obedience ought to proceede. Many thought the office of Magistrate to bee superfluous among Christians, because forsooth they cannot godly craue
craue their ayde, namely fith they are forbidden to reuenge, to sue in the lawe, and to have any controverfie. But whereas Paul contrariwise plainly refueth, that he is the minister of God to vs for good: wee thereby underv stand, that he is fo ordered of God, that we being defended by his hande & succours against the malicousnes and injuries of mischeuus men, may have a quiet & ailured life. If he be in vain given vs of the Lord for defence, vnlye it be lawfull for vs to vfe such beneficent sufficiently appeareth that he may also without vngodlines be called vpon & sued vnto. But here I must have to do with two kindes of men. For there be many men that boile with so great rage of quarrelling at the law, that they never have quiet with them selues vnto they have strife with other. And their controverfies they exercife with deadl, sharpeffe of hatred, and with mad greedines to reuenge & hurt, & do pursue them with vnappesable stiffenesse euuen to the very destruccion of their auersarie. In the meane time, that they may not bee thought to doe any thing but rightfully, they defend such peruerfines with, colour of law. But though it be granted theee to go to law with thy brother, yet thou maift not by and by hate him, nor bee caried against him with furious defire to hurt him, nor stubbornly to pursuie him.

18 Let this therefore be said to fuch men, that the vfe of lawes is lawfull, if a man do rightly vfe it. And that the right vfe both for the pleintife to sue, & for the defendant to defend, as if the defendant being summoned do appeare at an appointed day, & doth with such exception as he can, defend his caufe without bitterness, but onely with this affection to defende that which is his owne by law: and if the pleintife being vnworthily oppressed either in his person or his goods, do referre to the defence of the magistrate, make his complaint, and require that which is euerie and conscience, but farre from all greedy will to hurt or reuenge, farre from sharpenesse and hatred, farre from burning heate of contention, but rather ready to yeeld of his owne and to suffer any thing, than to be carried with an enemilike mind against his auersarie. Contrariwise when being filled with malice of mind, corrupted with enui, kindled with wrath, breathing out reuenge, or finally so enflamed with the heate of the contention, they giue over any parte of charitie, the whole proceeding euuen of a most just caufe can not but be wicked. For this ought to be a determined principle to all Christians, that a controverfie though it be never fo righteous, can never be rightly pursuied of any man, vnlesse hee beare as good will and loue to his auersarie, as if the matter which is in the controverfie were already concluded and ended by composition. Some man will heere peraduenture say, that such moderation is so never vfid in going to law, that it should be like a miracle if any such were founde. I graunt in deed, as the manners of these times bee, that there is seldom fene an example of a good contenfer in law, yet the thing it selfe being defiled with addition of no euill, receveth not to bee good and pure. But when wee heare that the helpe of the Magistrate is a holie gift of God: we must so much the more diligently take beeide, that it be not defiled by our fault.

19 As for them that pricely condemne all contending at law, let the understand that they do theer withal despite the holy ordinance of God, and a gift denied.
Cap. 20 Of the outward means gift of that kind of gifts which may bee cleane to the cleane: vnlesse peradventure they will accuse Paul of wicked doing, which did both put away from himselfe the flanders of his accusers with declaring also their deceit and maliciousnesse, and in judgement claimed for himselfe the prerogative of the citie of Rome, and when neede was he appealed from an vnrighteous governour to the Emperours judgement seat. Neither withstande it, ye all Christians are forbidden to desire revenges, which we also do drive farre away from Christian judgement seats. For, if the contention bee about a common cause, he goeth not the right way that doth not with innocent simplicitie, commit his cause to the judge as to a common defender, thinking nothing else than to render mutualy recompence of euill, which is the affection of revenges, or if any matter of life and death, or any great criminal action be commenced, wee require that the accuser bee such a one, as commeth in to the court being taken with no boiling heat of revenge, and touched with no displeasure of private injurie, but onely having in minde to withstand the enterprizes of a mischevous man, they may not hurt the common weale. But if thou take away a revenging minde, there is no offence done against that commandement whereby revenges is forbidden to Christians. But they are not onely forbidden to desire revenges, but they are also commanded to waife for the hande of the Lorde, which promiseth that he will be a present revenger for the oppressed & afficted: but they doe present all revenges of the heavenly defender, which require help at the magistrates hand either for themselves or other. Not so. For wee must thinke that the Magistrates revenges is not the revenge of man but of God, which, as Paul faith he extendeth and exerciseth by the ministerie of man for our good.

20 And no more do we disagree with the wordes of Christ, by which he forbiddeth to resist euill, and commandeth to turne the right cheeke to him that hath giuen a blowe on the left, and to suffer him to take away thy croke that taketh away thy coate. He willeth in deede there that the minds of his should be so much abhorre from desire of recompensing like for like, that they should sooner suffer double injurie to be done to themselues, than desire to reacquite it from which patience neither do we also lead them away. For Christians truly ought to bee a kinde of men made to beare reproches and injuries, open to the malice, deceits, and mockages of naughty men: and not that onely but also they must be bearers of all these euilles, that is to say so framed with all their hearts, that haing receiued one displeasure they make the euilles ready for another, promising to themseules nothing in their whole life but bearing of a continual eross. In the mean time alio they must doe good to them that do the wrong, and wish well to those that curse them, and (which is their onely victorie) strive to overcome euill with good. Being so minded they will not fecke eye for eye tooth for tooth, as the Pharisees taught their disciples to desire revenges, but (as we are taught of Christ) they will suffre their body to bee mangled, and their goods to bee maliciously taken from them, that they will forgive, and of their own accord pardon those euils so soon as they are done to them. Yet this euennyfie and moderation of mindes shall not withstande, but but that the friendship toward their enemies, remaining safe, they may vie help of the magistrate to the preserving of their goods, or for zeal of public like commodity may sue a titlic and pestilent man to be punished, whom they know that he cannot be amended but by death. For Augustine truly expoundeth that all these commandments tend to this end, that a righteous and godly man should be ready to bear patiently the malice of them whom he seeketh to have made good men, that rather many number of good men may encrease, not that he should with like malice add himselfe also to the number of the evil: then, that they more pertain to the preparation of the heart, which is inwardly, than to the work which is done openly: that in secrect may be kept patience of mind with good will, but openly that may be done which we see may be profitable to them to whom we ought to bear good will.

21 But this which is wont to be objected, that contendings in lawe are altogether condemn'd of Paul, is also falsely: It may easily be perceived by his words, that there was an innumerable rage of striving at lawe in the Church of the Corinthians: so farre forth that they did make the Gospel of Christ and the whole religion which they professed, open to the caullations & evil speaking of the wicked. This is the first thing that Paul blameth in them, that by their intemperance of contentions they brought the gospel in danger among the unbelievers. And then this point also, that in such sort they strived among themselves brethren with brethren. For they were so farre from bearing of wrongs, that they greedily gape on for an others goods, provoked one another, & being unjustly did hurt. Therefore he condemneth against that rage of contending, and not simply against all controversie. But he pronounceth that it is a fault or a weakenesse, that they did not rather suffer loss of their goods than to travel even to contentions for the preserving of them: namely when they were so easily moued with euerie damage, and for most small causes did runne to the court of lawe and to controversie, he faith that this is a proofe that they were of a mind too ready to anger & not well framed to patience. Christians verily ought to do this, that they had alway rather to yeeld of their owne right than to go to law, from whence they cæsarcely get out again but with a mind too much moued and kindled to hatred of their brother. But when a man seeth that without losse of charitie he may defend his owne, the losse whereof should be a sore hindrance unto him: if he do so he offendeth nothing against this saying of Paul: (as wee have taught in the beginning) charitie shall give euerie man best counsell, without which whatsoever controversie are taken in hand, and beyond which whatsoever doe proceede, we hold it out of controversie that they be vniust and wicked.

22 The first duty of subjects toward their magistrates is to think most honourable of their office, namely which they acknowledge to be a jurisdiction committed of God, and therefore to esteeme them and reverence them as the minifters & deputies of God. For a man may finde some, which yeeld themselves very obedient to their magistrates, and would not that there were not some whom they should obey, because they so know it to be expedient for the common benefit: but the magistrates themselves they thinke think no otherwise than of certaine necessarie evils. But Peter requirith somewhat more of vs, when he commandeth that the king be honored, & Salomon, when he commandeth God and the king to bee feared. For Peter under the word of honoring containeth a sincere and well deeming estimation and Salomon joyning the king with God, sheweth that he is full of a certaine holy reverence & dignitie. This is also a notable commendation in Paul, that we obey not only for wrath but for conscience. Whereas he meaneth that subjectes ought to be led not onely with fear of princes & rulers to bee helden in their subjection (as they are wont to yeeld to their armed enimie, which see that vengeance shall readily be taken upon them if they resiit) but because the obediences that are shewed to them are shewed to God himselfe, forasmuch as their power is of God. I speake not of the men, as if the visor of dignitie did couer foolishnesse, or sluggishnesse, or cruelties, or wicked manners and full of mischievous doing: but I say that the decree itself is worthie of honour & reverence: that howsoever bee rulers may be esteemed with, & have reverence, in respect of their being rulers.

23 Of this then also followeth another thing: that with minds bent to the honoring of them, they declare their obedience in profe to them: whether it be to obey their proclamations, or to pay tribute, or to take in hand publike offices and charges that serve for common defence, or to do any other of their commandements. Let evry soule (faith Paul) bee subject to the higher powers. For he that resiiteth the power, resiiteth the ordinance of God. The fame Paul writeth to Timo: Warn them that they be subject to rulers and powers, that they obey the Magistrates, y that they be ready to evry good workes. And Peter faith, Be ye subject to euery humane creature (or rather as I translate it, Ordinance) for the Lordes sake, either to the king as moste excellent, or to the rulers that are sent by him, to the punishment in deede of euill doers, but to the praisse of well doers. Moreover, they should testify that they do not saine subjection, but are sincerely and heartily subject, Paul addeth that they should commend to God the safety and prosperity of them under whom they liue. I exhort (faith he) that there bee made prayers: beseechings, intercessions, thanksgivings for all men, for kings: and for all that be set in superiorities, that we may liue a peaceable and quiet life with all godlineesse and honestie. Neither let any man here deceive himselfe. For ifh the Magistrate can not be resiiteth, but that GOD himselfe must also bee resiiteth; although it may bee thought that an unarmed magistrater may freelie be despiseth, yet God is armed which will strongly take vengeance on the despiseth of himselfe. Moreover vnder the obedience I conteine moderation, which private men ought to binde themselves to keep in coves touching the publike state, that they do not of their owne head entermedle in publike businesesses, or rashly breake into the office of the Magistrate, and enterprize nothing publike. If any thing shall in a publike ordinance be housethfull to bee amended, let not themselues raise vprores, nor put their handes to the doing of it, which they all ought to have fast bounde in this behalfe: but lette them commit it to the judgement of the magistrate, whose hande alone is herein at libertie. I meaneth, that they presume to doe nothing vncommanded. For when the commandement of the ruler is adjoined, then are they also furnished with publike authority. For as they are wont to call the counsellors of a king, his cares and eyes: so not un fitly a man may call them the hands of the prince, whom by his commandement he seteth in authoritie for the doing of things.

24. Now forasmuch as we have hither to descried a magistrate such as is indeed the same that he is called, namely the father of the courtey, and (as the poet calleth him) the pastor of the people, the keeper of peace, the protector of righteousnesse, the reveuenger of innocencie: he is worthily to be judged a mad man, that alloweth not such a government. But whereas this is in a manner the experience of all ages, that of princes some being careless of all things to the foreseeing whereof they ought to have beeone heedfully bent, do without all care flouthfully wallowe in delites: other some addicted to their gaine, doe set out to sole all lawes, privileges, judgements, and grauantes: other some spoile the poore communaltie of monie which they may after waste upon mad prodigall expendings: other some exercise meere robberies, in pilling of houses, defiling of virgins and matrones, murdering of innocentes: many cannot be persuaded that such should bee acknowledged for princes, whose authoritie they ought to obey so far as they may. For in so great hainous vnworthinesse among doings so much contrarie to the duetie not only for a magistrate, but also of a man, they beholde no forme of the image of God which ought to shine in a magistrate: when they see no token of that minister of God, which was given for praise to the good & for vengeance to the euill: so neither doe they also acknowledge such a governour, whose dignitie and authoritie the scripture commendeth unto vs.

And truely this feeling of affection hath alway beene naturally plated in the minds of men, no lesse to hate and abhorre tyrants, than to love and honour lawfull kinges.

25 But if wee looke to the worde of God, it will lead vs further, that wee be subject not only to the government of those princes which execute their office towards vs well and with such faithfulnesse as they ought, but also of all them, which by what meane soever it be, have the dominion in possession although they performe nothing lesse than that which pertaineth to the duetie of princes. For though the Lord testifieth that the magistrate is a speciall great gift of his liberalitie for presuerving of the safetie of men, and appointeth to magistrates themselves their bounds: yet he doth therewith-all declare, that of what sort soever they bee, they have not their authoritie but from him: that those in deede, which rule for benefite of the common weale, are true examplars and patrones of his bountifulnesse: that they that rule vnjustly and wilfully, are raisfed vp by him to punishe the wickednes of the people: that all eactly haue that ministrie wherewith hee hath furnished a lawfull power, I will proceece no further, till I have added some certaine testimonies of that point. Yet wee neede not much to labor to proue that a wicked king is the wrath of God vpon the earth, forasmuch as I thinke that no man will lay the contrarie, and otherwise there should bee no more said of a king than of a commod robber that violently taketh away thy goods, and of an adulterer that defileth thy bed, of a murderer that seeketh to kill thee, whereas the scripture reckeneth all such calamities among the curses.

Deut. 28. 19
Curset of God. But let us rather tarie upon prouing that which doeth not so easily settle in the minde of mens that in a most naughtie man.

26 First I wold have the reader to perceiue and diligently make that providence and singular doings of God, which is in the Scripture, not without cause to oft rehearsed unto vs, in distributing of kingdomes and making Kinges whome it pleaseth him. In Daniel, it is saide: The Lorde changeth times and courses of times, he casteth away and maketh kings. Again: That y thinge may know y the Highest is mightie in the kingdom of me, & he shall giue it to who he will. With which manner of sentences whereas y whole Scripture aboundeth, yet y same prophecies of Daniel specially warmeth full. Now what manner of king was Nabuchadonezar, he that conquered Hierusalem, it is sufficiently known, namely a strong inuader and destroyer of other. Yet in Ezekiel the Lorde affirmeth that he gave him the lande of Egypte for the seruice that he had done to him in waiting it. And Daniel laid to him, Thou king art the king of kings, to whome the king of heauens hath giue a mightie, and strong, and glorious kingdome: to thee, I say, he hath giuen it, and all the landes where dwel the children of men, the beafts of the wood, and foules of the aire: hee hath deliuere them into thy hand, and hath made thee to beare rule over them. Again hee saide to his sonne Belshazzar: the highest God hath giuen to Nabuchadonezar thy Father kingdome and royalitie, honour and glorie: and by reason of the royalitie that he gave him, all peoples, tribes, and languages were trembling and searefull at his sighte. When we heare that a king is ordaind of God, let vs there of call to remembrance those heavenly warnings concerning the honor and seare of a king: then we shall not doubt to accomplie, a most wicked tyrant in the same place wherein the Lorde hath vouchsafed to set him. Samuell when he gaue warning to the people of Israel, what manner of thinges they shoulde suffer at the handes of their kinges, saide: This shall be the right of the king that shall reigne over you: he shall take your sonnes and put them to his service, to make them his horsemen, and to plowe his land, and to reape his crop, and to make instruments of warre. He shall take your daughters, that they may be his dressers of ointmentes, his cookes and bakers. Your lands, your vineyards, and your best Olive plantes he shall take away and give to his bonde seruauntes. Hee shall take tithes of your vigne and vineyarde, and shall giue them to his eunuches and bonde seruauntes. Hee shall take away your bonde men, your bonde women and your assesse, and let them to his worke. Yea and hee shall take tithes of your flockes, and ye shal be his bonde seruauntes. Verily kinges shoulde not haue done this of right, when the lawe did very well instruct to al continence, but it was called a right ouer the people which it behooved them of necessitie to obey, and they might not resit in as if Samuell had saide. The wilfulness of kings should runne to such such licentiousnesse, which it shall not be your part to resist, to whome this only thing shall be left, to obey their commandements and hearken to their worte.
27 But chiefly there is in Jeremiah a notable place and worthy to be re-membred, which although it be somewhat long, yet I will be content to rehearse, because it most plainly determineth this whole question. I have made the earth and men, saith the Lord, and the living creatures that are on the ouer face of the earth, in my great strength and stretched out my arme, and I will deliver it to him whome it pleaseth in mine eyes. And now therefore I have given all these lands into the hands of Nabuchadnezar my servant, and all nations and great kings shall serve him, till the time that come of that land, and it shall be a nation and a kingdom that hath not serued the king of Babel, I will visit that nation in worde, famine, and pestilence. Wherefore serve ye the king of Babel and live. We see with howe great obedience the Lorde willed that cruel and proud tyrant to be honored, for no other reason but because he possessest the kingdome. And the same was by the heavenly decree, that he was sette in the throne of the kingdome, and taken up into kingly majestie, which it was vnlawefull to violate. If wee have this continually before our mindees and eyes, that even the worste kings are ordained by the same decree by which the authoritie of kinges is stablished these seditious thoughtes shall never come into our minde, that a king is to be handled according to his defeutions, & that it is not meet that we should shewe our slues subjectes to him that doeth not on his behalfe shew him selfe a king to vs.
28 In vaine shall any man object that this was a peculiar commandemedent to the Israelites. For it is to be noted with what reason the Lord commeth it. I have given (saith he) the kingdome to Nabuchadnezar. Wherefore serue ye him and live. To whomsoever therefore it shall be certain that the kingdome is given, let vs not doubt that he is to be obeyed. And so soone as the Lord aduanceth any man to the royall estate, hee therein declareth his will to vs that he will haue him reigne. For thereof are generall testimonies of the Scripture, Salomon in the xxviii. Chapter, Many Princes are because of the wickednesse of the people. Againe Iob in the xii. chap.
He taketh away subjection from kings, and girdeth them again with the girddle. But this being confessed, there remaineth nothing but that we must serue and liue. There is also in Jeremiah the Prophete an other commandement of the Lorde wherein he commaunded his people to seeke the peace of Babylon, whither they had beene ledde away captive, and to pray to him for it, because in the peace of it should be their peace. Behold the Israelites being spoiled of all their goods, plucked out of their houses, led away into exile, and cast into miserable bondage, are commaunded to pray for the safetie of the Conqueror; not as in other places we are commaunded to pray for our persecutors: but that the kingdome may be preferred to him selfe and quiet, that they themselves may also liue prosperously under him. So David being already appointed king by the ordinance of God, and annoymted with his holy oyle, where he was without any his defeuting vnworthily persectuted of Saul, yet the head of him that layed waite for his life, he esteeme holy Tet 2

which the Lord hath hallowed before the honour of kingdom. Farre be it from me (saith he) that I should before the Lord do this thing to my Lord the appointed of the Lord, that I should lay my hand upon him; because he is the appointed of the Lord. Againe, My soul haveth spared thee, and I have saith, I will not lay my hand upon my Lord, because he is the appointed of the Lord. Againe, Who shall lay his hand upon the appointed of the Lord and shall bee innocent? So sure as the Lord liveth, vnto the Lord strike him, or his day come, that he die, or he goe downe into battell: farre be it from me that I should lay my hand upon the appointed of the Lord.

29 Finally we owe this affection of reverence yea and devotion to all our rulers, of what sort soever they be, which I do therefore the oftener repeate, that we may learne not to search what the men themselves bee, but take this for sufficient, that by the will of the Lord they beare that personage in which the Lord himself hath imprinted and ingraued an inuioable matiere. But (thou wilt say) Rulers owe mutuall duties to their subiectes. That I have alreadie confessed. But if thou thereupon conclude, that obediences are to be rendered to none but to just governours, thou art a foolish reasoner. For, husbandes also are bounde to their wives and parentes to their children with mutuall duties. Let parentes and husbands depart from their duete: let parents shewe themselves so hard and unpleasaible to their children, whom they are forbidden to prouoke to anger, that with their peculihnes they do vnmeasurable weare them; let the husbandes most despitely vs their wives, whom they are commanued to love, and to spare them as weake vessel shall yet therefore either children be lesse obedient to their parents or wives to their husbands but they are subiect both to euill parentes and husbands and such as do not their duete. Yea, where as all owght rathar to endeavour them selves not to looke behind them to the bagge hanging at their backe, that is, not to enquire one of anothers duties, but every man set before him that which is his owne dutie: this owght chiefly to have place among those that are vnder the power of other. Wherfore if we be vnmercifullly tormented of a cruell prince, if we be raenonously spoild of a couetous or riotous Prince, if we be neglected of a slothfull prince, finally if we be vexed for godlinesse sake of a wicked and vngodly Prince: let vs first call to minde the remembrance of our finnes, which vndoubtedly are chaftised with such scourges of the Lord. Thereby humilitie shall bridle our impatience. Let vs then also call to minde this thought, that it perteineth not to vs to remedie such euils: but this onely is lefte for vs, that we eare the helpe of the Lord in whose hande are the hearts of kin ges, and the bowings of kingdoms. He is the God that shall stande in the assembale of gods, and shall in the middest judge the gods, from whose face all kings shall fall, and be broken, and all the judges of the earth that shall have not kissed his anointed, that have written vnjust lawes to oppresse the poore in judgement, and do violence to the cause of the humble, to make widowes a pray, and robbe the fatherlesse.

30 And here both his maruellous goodnes, and power, and prouidence sheweth it selfe: for sometime of hisフェntans he raiseth vp open encouters, & furnisheth them with his commandemets, to take vengeance of their vnjust government, and to deliver his people many ways oppressed out of miserable distress; sometime he directed to the same ende the rage of men that contend and go about another thing. So he delivered the people of Israel out of the tyranny of Pharaoh by Moses: and out of the violence of Chusam, king of Syria, by Othoniel: and out of other thraldomes, by other kings or judges. So he tamed the pride of Typhus, by the Egyptians: the insolence of the Egyptians, by the Assyrians: the fierceness of the Assyrians, by the Chaldees: the boldness of Babylon, by the Medians, and by the Persians when Cyrus had subdued the Medians. And the unthankfulness of the kings of Juda and Israel, and their wicked obstinacy towards his so many benefits, he did beat down and bring to distress sometime by the Assyrians, sometime by the Babylonians, albeit notal after one manner. For the first sort of me when they were by the lawful calling of God sent to doe such acts: in taking armour against kings, they did not violate that majesty which is planted in kings by the ordinance of God: but being armed from heaué they subdued the lesser power with the greater: like as it is lawful for kings to punishe their Lords under them. But these latter sort, although they were directed by the hande of God whither it pleased him, and they unwittingly did his worke, yet purposèd in their minde nothing but mischeefe.

31 But howsoever the vrie doings of men be judged, yet the Lord did as well execute his worke by them, when he did breake the bloodie scepters of proude kings, and overthrew their intolerable governementes. Let Princes heare and be afraid: But we in the meanie time must take great heed, that we do not despise or offend that authoritie of Magistrates full of reuerende majesty, which God hath stablished with most weightie decrees, although it remaine with most vnworthie men, and which do with their wickednesse, so much as in them is, defile it. For though the correcting of unbridled governement be the reuengement of the Lord, let vs not by & by thinke that it is committed to vs, to whome there is given no other commandement but to obey and suffer. I spake alway of private men. For if there be at this time any Magistrates for the behalfe of the people, (such as in olde time were the Ephori, that were set against the kings of Lacedemonie, or the Tribunes of the people, against y Romane Consuls, or the Demarchi, against the Senate of Athens; and the same power also which peradventure, as things are now, the three estates haue in euerie realme, when they hold their principall assemblies,) I doe so not forbid them according to their office to withstand the outraging licentiousnesse of kings: that I affirme that if they winke at kings willfully raging ouer and treading downe the poore communaltie, their difsembling is not without wicked breach of faith, because they deceitfullly betray the libertie of the people, whereof they know themselves to bee appointed protectors by the ordinaunce of God.

32 But in that obedience which we have determined to bee due to the authorities of Gouvernors, this is alway to be excepted, yea chiefly to bee obserued, that it doe not lead vs away from obeying of him, to whose will the desires of all kings ought to bee subiect, to whose decrees all their com-

mandements ought to yeilde, to whose maiestie their maces ought to bee submitted. And truely howe vnorderly were it, for the satisfying of men to runne into his displeasure for whom men themselves are obeyed? The Lord therefore is the king of kings, who when he hath opened his holy mouth, is to be heard alone for altogether and above all next to him wee bee subject to those men that are set over vs: but no otherwise than in him. If they commande any thing against him, let it have no place and let no accompt be made of: neither let vs wherein any thing stay vp all that dignitie whereby Magistrats excel to which there is no wrong done, where it is brought into order of subjection in comparision of that singular and truly soueraigne power of God. After this replé Danieell denieth that he had any thing offend ded against the king, when he obeyed not his wicked proclamation: because the king had passed his boundes, and had not onely beene a wrong doer to men, but in lifting vp his horns against God he had taken away power from himselfe, On the other side the Israelites are condemned because they were too much obedient to the wicked commandement of the king. For when Ierobeam had made golden calves, they for taking the Temple of God, did for his pleasure turne to newe superstitions. With like lightnesse the posteritie inclined the selves to the ordinances of their kings. With this the Prophet sharply reprocheth them, that they embraced the commandements of the king, so farre is it of, that the pretence of humility may deforge praise where with the flatteringes of the court doe cover themselves and deceive the simple, while they say that it is not lawfull for them to refuse any thing that is commended them of their Princes: as though God had resigned his right to mortall men, giving them the rule of mankind: or as though the earthly power were ministered, when it is made subject to the author of it, before whom even the heauenly powers doe humble tremble for feare. I know how great and howe present peril hangeth over this constancie, because kings doe most displeasantly suffer themselves to be despised, whole displeasure (saith Salomon) is the messenger of death. But sith this decree is proclaimed by the heauenly harald Peter: That we ought to obey God rather than men, let vs comfort our selves with this thought, that we then performe that obedience which the Lord requireth, when we suffer any thing rather whatsoever it be, than swaine from godlies. And that our courages shoulde not faint. Paul putteth also an other spurre to vs: That we were therefore redeemed of Christ with so great a price as our redemption cost him, y we should not yeelde our selves in thraldome to obey the peruerse desire of men, but much lesse should be bound to vngodlinesse.

Prayse be to God. T.N.

Adams fall.

The fall of Adam proceeded not of intemperance of gluttonie, but of in-fi-delitie, for he despising the worde and truth of God, turned out of the way to the eyes of Sathan, which insidelity opened the gate to ambition & pride whereunto was adioyned vnhankfulnesse: and ambition was the mother do obedience. 2.1.4.

By the fall of Adam, some other creatures have been after a sort deformed, it is no maruell, that all mankind was corrupted, that is to say: swarued out of kind from his first original, & made subject to curse. This the old Doctors called Originall sinne, but yet did not so plainly let forth this point of Doctrine as was convenient. In the mean time it is prooued by reasons and testimonies of scripture, y Pelagius foully erred when he sayd that by imitation only, not by propagation, sinne passed from the first man into all his posterity.2.1.5.6.

And though the pestilence of sinne doe principally abide in the soule, yet it doeth not therefore pertaine to the discussing of this Doctrine, to dispute whether the soule of the childe commeth of the engendring substance of the father: forasmuch as the cause of the infection is not in the substance of the flesh or of the soule, but because it was ordained of God, that those gifts which he at the first had giuen to man should haue and loose them for him and his. Finally it maketh not against this doctrine, that the children of the faithfull are sanctified. 2.1.7.

That by the fall of Adam the natural gifts in man were corrupted and the supernaturall were taken away, is a saying that many haue vnde, but few haue vnderstoode. 2.2.4.16, which saying is expounded. 2.2.12, that is to say that the supernaturall gifts, faith, the love of God, charity toward our neighbours, deituous endeour of holinesse and righteousnesse were taken away, but are restored by Christ: & that the natural gifts, namely the understanding mind, and the heart are corrupted, because the soundnesse of understanding and the vprightnesse of heart were both taken away: Also that rea-on in man was not vterly blotred out, but partly weakened and partly corrupted: & so wil, because it can not bee seuered from the nature of man, was not vterly destroied, but made thrall to corrupt desires. 2.2.12.

It is prooued by the testimonies of Augustines
Angels &c. of the Scripture, that God not only foretold or suffered, but also by his will disposed the fall of the first man, and in him the vaine of his posterity, 3.23.7.8.

Angels.

Angels are creatures of God although Moses do not express them in the historic of the creation. 1.14.3.

Of the time or order wherein they were created, it is not expedient to enquire, forasmuch as Scripture (which we ought to followe for our rule) declareth nothing thereof. 1.14.4.

Why the heavenly spirits are called Angels, Armies, Virtues, principalities, powers, Dominions, Thrones, Goddes. 1.14.5.

Concerning Angels the Scripture teacheth so much as is available for our comfort and for the confirming of our faith, namely that they are distributers & ministers of God's bountifullness toward vs, and the same by divers ways. 1.14.6.9.

Not only one Angel hath seuerall care of seuerie one of vs, but they all with one consent doe watch for our safety: and therefore it is superfluous to enquire whether seuerie one have his seuerall angell assigned to bee his keeper. 1.14.7.

Of the number and degrees of Angels, it is curiousnes to require, & rashnes to determine: And why, whereas they be spirits, the Scripture painteth them with wings under Cherubin & Shaphin. 1.14.8.

Against the Sadduces & such other fantastical men, it is proved by sundry testimonies of the Scripture, that Angels are not qualities or inspirations without substance, but very spirits in deede. 1.14.9.

That superstition is herein to be avoided, and that we give not to Angels those things that belong only to God and Christ. 1.14.10.

For avoiding of this peril, we must consider that whereas God veth their service, hee doeth it not of neede, as though he could not be without them but for the comfort of our weakness; 1.14.11. And therefore whatsoever is sayd of the ministerie of angels, ought to be referred to this ende, that overcoming all distrust, our trust in God should bee thereby the more strongly established, & not that they should lead us away from God. 1.14.12.

That the Angels also were created after the likeness of God. 1.15.3.

Of the Ascending of Christ into heauen.

Although Christ in his Rising again beganne more fully to shew forth his glorie and power; yet in his ascending into heauen he first truely began his kingdom, because he then powred out greater abundance of his spirit, more royally advanced his reign, & shewed greater power both in helping thee that are his, and in overthrowing his enemies. And yet that he is so absent according to the presence of his flesh, that he is alway seuerie where according to the presence of his majestie and with the faithfull according to his vnspeakable and ineffable grace. 2.16.14.

Of Christes sitting at the right hand of his Father, and of the manifolde suit which our faith gathereth there of. 2.16.15.16.

B.

Baptisme.

The definition of Baptisme. The first ende thereof is to serve our faith before God, the other ende, to serve our confession before men. It brin-
The Table.

bringeth to our faith three things, first y it is a signe of our cleansing, assuring us that all our sinnes are done away 4. 15.1, which is prooued by testimonies of the scripture, and that it is not the water that cleanseth vs, but the blood of Christ. Sect.2.

The force of baptisme is not restrai ned to the time past: but we are by it washed and cleansed once for all our life: and yet that we may not hereof take a libertie to sinne from thence forward. 4.15.3.

The power of the keyes (as they call it) that is to say, the ministerie of the Church, by which the forgiuennes of sinnes is daily preached vnto vs, is not to be seuered from baptisme. 4.15.4.

The second fruite of faith by baptisme, is that it sheweth to vs our mortifying in Christ, & a new life in him. 4.15.5.

The thirde fruite is, that it testifieth that we are xvi: at Christ, that we are partakers of all his good things. For which cause Christ is called the proper object of baptisme, and the Apostles baptised into the name of Christ, in whome wee do so obtaine the matter both of our cleansing & of our regeneration, as wee obtaine the cause thereof in the father, & the effect in the holy Ghost. 4.15.6.

It is proued that the baptisme was all one which was ministered of John and of the Apostles, although some of the olde Doctors thought otherwise. 4.15.7, and that it maketh no to the contrary, that more aboundant graces of the Spirit are poured out, since the resurrection of Christ. But yet there is in baptisme a difference to be made of the person of Christ from John, and from the Apostles and other ministers. 4.15.8.

Both our mortifying & our cleansing were as by shadowe signified among the people of Israel, by the passage through the sea, and the comfortable calling of the cloud. 4.15.9.

It is false which some haue taught, that by Baptisme we are restored to the same rightrueuse & pureness of nature which Adam had at the beginning. And here is shewed that in the children of God doe remain ye stome leaunings of sinne, although the same reignge not in them: which doth wher their endeavours, and doth not give them occasion to flatter themselves. 4.15.10,11, the same is proued by Paul. Sect.12.

How baptisme serveth our confession before men. 4.15.13.

What is the order to use Baptisme, both for confirmation of our faith, & for a confession before men. Where it is shewed that the graces of God are not enclosed in the Sacrament, so as they be giue to vs by the vertue therto. 4.15.14,15.

Baptisme is nothing encreased by the worthinesse of him that doth minister it, nor diminished by his unworthinesse: against the Donatiles, and our Catabaftics which require a rebaptising, because wee have been baptised in the kingdom of the Pope. 4.15.16. their arguments are confuted Sect.17,18.

Baptisme is a continual Sacrament of repentance for all our life, so that we neede no other Sacrament of penance. 4.19.17.

Of the coniuring of the water, the waxe candell, the Chrisme, the blowing, the spittle, and such other trifles added to the simple ceremonie of Christ: and the order of purely ministirg it in the Church is shewed 4.15.19.

It is shewed that to minifter Baptisme pertaineth to the ministers of the Church.
The Table.

Baptifme of infants.

The baptifing of infants doth very well agree with Christes instituition, and with the nature of the signe. 4.16.8.e.

Baptifme succeeded in the place of Circumciſion, wherein they be like, & wherein they be unlike. 4.16.3.4.

Infants are not to be debarred from baptifme, fiche the Lorde doth make them partakers of the thing signified in baptifme. 4.16.5. and that the Lord doeth regenerate infants. Sect. 17.18.19.

Sith it is certain that the same couenant, which it pleased God to make with Abraham, is failed in infants with the outward Sacrament, therefore ought baptifme also to have place among them. 4.16.6.

Baptifmg of infants is well proved by this that Christ embraced children and laid his hands upon them. 4.16.7.

A confutation of the adversaries arguments, saying, that other be other things signified in baptifme than there are in Circumciſion; that our couenant differeth from the olde couenant; that other are called children at this day than were at that time. 4.16.10.11.12.13.14.15.

A confutation of their other fained differences between Circumciſion and baptifme, Sect. 16. Also of this objection, that baptifme is a Sacrament of repentance and of faith; neither of which can be in tender infancy. 4.16.20.21.

In them of ripe age, faith and understanding ought to go before baptifme: but in infants, the baptifme of the faithfull goes before understanding. 4.16.14.

A confutation of their error, which confude to eternal death all that are not baptifed. 4.16.26.

Bearing of the Croffe.

It behoueth that wee deny our selues, that we may beare the croffe, becaufe it is Gods will to exercises all his vnder the croffe, beginning at Christ his first begotten Sonne. Which fellowship with Christ doth already give vs great ground of patience and comfort. 3.8.1.

It is for many causes necessarie for vs to leade our life vnder a continually croffe: first to beare downe our arrogancy and trust of our owne strength. And this remedie even the most holy doneede, as is proved by the example of David. 3.8.2. Heereby our trust in God is confirmed, and our hope encreased. Sect. 3.

Secondly, that our patience may be tried, and wee may be framed to obedience.

C.

Calling.

Of the effectuall or inward calling, which is a sure testimonie of election, and hangeth vpon the only free-mercic of God. 3. 24. 1. 2.

Against them, which in predestination doe make man a worker with God. Also against them that hang election vpon that which followeth election. 3. 24. 3.

The certainie of our election is to be knowne by the worde and calling of God, & we ought not to peace into the eternall counsel of God. 3. 24. 4.

The father hath choisen vs only in Christ, in him therefore let vs hold the steadfast ground of our election. 3. 24. 5. and so, that thereof also wee may conceive a sure confidence of perseverance to the end. 3. 24. 6. 7. 8. 9.

Two
Two kindes of calling vniuersall, & speciall 3.24.8.

It is proved by divers examples and testimonies of Scripture, that the elect before their Calling doe differ nothing from other men, and that it is false which some men doe dreame, that there is a certaine seede of election planted in their hearts euon from their natuie 2.34.10.11.

It is shewed at large that as God doth by the effectual grace of his Calling towards the elect, make perfect the saluation to which hee had by his eternall counsell appointed them: so he hath his judgementes against the reprobates, whereby hee putteth his purpose concerning them in execution, & maketh away for his predestination 3.24.12.13.14. &c.

Cardinals.

When the name of Cardinals first began, & howe they have so suddenly start vp to so great honour 4.7.30.

Ceremonies.

The olde Ceremonies are taken away, as touching their use onely, but not as touching their effect, for wee have the same effect at this day most evidently and effectually in Christ. And this doth nothing diminish their holinesse, as it is proved 2.7.16. & being weighed by them selves & without Christ, they are worthily called of Paul handwritings against vs 2.7.17.

The ordinaunces concerning Ceremonies in the Popes lawe, do commande observation for the most part vnprofitable, and sometyme also foottish although they have a great seeming of wisdom: moreover they oppose confiunces with their infinite multitude 4.10.11.12.13.

The popish Ceremonies can not be executed by this colour, that they be ordained for the instruction of the ignorant, as the ceremonies of lawe were: because there appeareth in this point a manifest difference between vs & ye people before Christ 4.10.14.

The popish ceremonies are beleued to bee Sacrifices cleansing sins, & deferring eternall life: they are without doctrine, and are inanes to catch mony 4.10.15.

Charitie toward our neighbour.

It is proved against the Sorbonists that Charitie is the love of our neighbour & not of our selves 2.8.54.

Vnder the name of neighbour is contained every man, bee he never so much a stranger to vs, and our enemy 2.8.55, and therefore the Schoolmen are condemned of ignorance, which of the commandement of God, not to desire reuenge, & to love our enimies, have made counsell, to the necessarie keeping whereof Monkes alone do bind them selves: & it is proved that the old doctors of ye church, yea & Gregoric him selfe, thought otherwise 2.8.56.57.

We have need of patience, that we be not weariest of doing good to other. And wee ought not to have respect to the vnworthinesse or other qualities of men which might withdrawe vs, but to God which so commandeth vs 3.7.6.

To the fulfilling of all the partes of Charitie, it is not enough if wee performe all the dutifull deeds of Charitie, but we must doe it with a sincere affection of heart. Wherein the chief point is, that we take upon our selves the person of him whom we see to neede our help, so shall we avoid disdainfull pride & other corruptings of Charitie 3.7.7.

Christ & the apostles in rehearsing the summe of the lawe do sometime leave out the first table: not for that it is more availeth to the summe of righteousnes to live innocently with men, than than to honour God with Godliness, but because in slain Charitie is the proof of true Godliness. 2.8.5.5.

A confutation of the Pharisees of our time, which hold that we are justified by charity, because Paul saith that Charitie is greater than faith & hope. 3.18.3.

The holiness of the Church is not yet perfected. 4.8.12.

Of the invisible Church: and of the visible Church, the signes whereof are the pure preaching of the worde and ministration of Sacramentes. 4.8.7.3.9 10.11.

Wherefore those signes are, we ought not to depart from that fellowship. 4.8.12.

There may some fault crepe in, either in doctrine or in ministration of sacraments, for which yet we ought not to cast of the communion of that Church, & much lesse for the imperfect of life and corruptnesse of manners: And herein the Anabaptists are reproved. 4.1.12.13.14.15.16.

The Church is none otherwise holy, but that it alway hath many faults, & yet it caeth not to be the church, as is proved by testimonies of Scripture and the experience of all ages. 1.17.18.19.

See Ministration of the Church.

Churches power as touching Articles of faith.

It is proved by the example of the Apostles and Prophets, and of Christ himselfe, that whatsoever authoritie the Church hath, is properly not given to men, but to the word, the ministration whereof is committed to them: And therefore it was never lawful for the Church, to teach any other thing, than that which shee received of the Lorde. 4.8.1.2.3.4.8.9.

Christ hath euuer taught his church: and yet he hath vised divers manners of teaching according to diversity of times, ere the lawe was written, in the time of the lawe and the Prophets, & last of all since that he himselfe was openly shewed in the flesh. 4.8.5.6.7.

False Church.

Where lying and falshood hath gotten the upperhand & reigneth, there is not the Church: And this is proved to bee in the papacie, although they there boast of a perpetuall succession of bishops. 4.2.1.2.3.4.

They are not heretikes or schismatikes that depart from the papacie. 4.2.5.6.

It is proved by many & most strong testimonies of Scripture, that Christe tooke upon him a true substance of mans flesh, & not a ghost or counter-fait shape of man, as the Marcionites fained, nor yet a heavenly body as the Manichees lyingly affirmed 2.13.1.

Confession Auricular.

Concerning Confession, the whole divines do fight against the Canonists, affirming that it is not by the commandement of God. A confutation of their second argument, for that the Lord commanded his discipiles to loose & vnwind Lazarus when he was raised from death. 3.4.5.

A true expostion of two places by which they travel to uphold their confesision: that is to say, that they which came to the Baptisme of John did confesse their sinnes, & James will eth vs to confesse our sins one to another. 3.4.6.

The use of confessing to a priest was very ancient, but yet none as a politike order, nor as a law set by Christ or his Apostles; and afterward the same was abrogated by Nestarius Bishop of the Church of Constantinople, because of a Deacon which had vnder that pre- tence abused a woman. This tyrannous lawe was not laide upon Churches before the time of Innocens the thirde, about three hundred yeares past, & the fooleishnefe & barbarousnelle of that ordinance is declared. 3.4.7.

By a similitude is described howe a great part of the worlde hath hitherto obeyed such illusions. That it is an impossible law, & maketh men hypocrits. And this is shewed a most certaine rule of confession according to the example of the publicane. 3.4.18.

A confutation of this article, by sins are not forgiv, & that the gate of paradise is shut, &c. where there be first firmly conceived a vow of confessing, where also their obisiation is confuted that judgement cannot be pronounced till the cause be heard, that is to say, that absolution cannot be gien till all the sins be rehearsed. 3.4.18.

It is no martelly we condemne and abolish auricular confession, & our adversaries do falsely assign to great profit unto it, forasmuch as ony otherwise it arneth mē to boldnes of sinning. 3.4.19.

They do falsely pretend they have the power of the keyes, & that they are not the successors of the Apostles, or have the holy ghost, forasmuch as they doe daily without consideration loose those things which the Lord hath commanded to be bound, & bind what he hath commanded to be loosed. 3.4.20.

It is proude falsely that they lay the power of the keyes may sometime be vfed without knowledge, forasmuch as by one mean the absolution should be uncertaine. Where also is spoken of the absolution or condemnation which the ministers of the gospel or church do pronounce according to the word, & of the certainties thereof. 3.4.21.

The absolution of the Priestes in the papacie is uncertaine, as well on the behalfe of him that assoileth as on the behalfe of him that confesseth: but contrariwise it is in the absolution of the Gospel, which hange thou this only condition, if the sinner seek his purging in the True Confession.

What kinde of confession is taught vs by the worde of God, namely to confeffe to God the knowy of our heartes and of all our thoughts.3.4.9.

Out of this secret confession made to God, followeth a voluntarie confession before men, so oft as it is behowefull for the glory of God or the humbling of our selues. And of this second kinde there was an ordinarie vse in the old Church, & is also in the Church at this day. But yet extraordinarily it ought after a speciall manner to be vse, whensoever it shall happen that the people bee guiltie in any general offence, or to be punished with any calamity. Of the profit of such confession, 3.4.10.11.

Of two other sortes of private confession: of which the first is vse for our owne cause, when we require comfort of our brethren, because the feeling of sins doeth vex & trouble vs: in which cafe we must chiefly refer to our pastors: and this remedy is warily & moderately to be vse, that no bondage be brought in. The other sort is to appease and reconcile our neighbour, if he bee in any thing offended by our faults, vnder which kinde is contained their Confession which have sinned so farre as to the offence of the whole Church 3.4.12.13.

The power of the keyes hath place in the three kindes of Confession. Of the fruit which they that confess do receive thereby, because they knowe that forgiveness of sinnes is declared to them by the messenger of Christ, 3.4.14.

Of Councils.

We must keepe a meane in honouring of Councils, that we take nothing away from Christ, and our doctrine for the most part is confirmed by ancien Councils. 4. 9. 1.

By the Scripture the Councils haue no authoritie vnlesse they bee assembled in the name of Christ: and what that is. 4. 9. 2.

It is false which the Papists affirm: that truth remaineth not in the Church vnlesse it be among the Pastors, and the Church it selfe is not vnlesse it remaine to be seene in general Councils. 4. 9. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7.

Creation of the world.

Although God ought to bee known by the Creation of things, yet least the faithfull should fall away to the saine inventions of the heathen, his will was that the historie of the Creation should remain wrote, & the time thereof expressed in the Scripture. 1. 14. 1.

For the same purpose it is rehearsed that God ended his worke, not in a moment, but in sixe daies: and likewise the order is set forth, namely that Adam was not created till God had first furnished the world with a plentie of good things. 1. 14. 2. 22.

A confusion of the error of Manichaeism concerning two original beginnings. 1. 14. 3.

It is proved by the Scriptures y the knowledge of God which appeareth in the workmanship of the world can not by it selfe alone bring vs into the right way. 1. 5. 13. and yet are we rightfully without all excuse. Sect. 14.

Although the beholding of heauen and earth and the consideration of the ordering of things pertaining to men, doe move vs to worshippe God, yet all these things past away without profite, even from the wicke Philosophers. 1. 5. 10.

Hereupon came the infinite number of gods, and the contrarities of opinion among the sectes of Philosophers concerning God. 1. 5. 11.

The substance of God is incomprehensible: but in his worke, by engraving certain points of his glorie therein he hath after a certaine maner presented himselfe to bee seen. 1. 5. 1.

The Wisdom of God is testified, not only by these things which philosophers & learned men do find by speculation in heauen and earth, but also which common men do perceiue by the onely helpe of their eyes. 1. 5. 2.

That we may with true faith conceiue so much as behoueth vs to know concerning God, it is good to learne of the kingdom of Christ which the holy prophete\textsuperscript{s} spoke of before. 4. 5. 17.

Death of Christ.

Although Christ hath by the whole course of his obedience, that is to saye, by his whole life & al the parts thereof, redeemed vs, yet the Scripture to set forth more plainly the manner of our salvation, doth ascribe the same as peculi\textsuperscript{r} & proper to the death of Christ.

In which the voluntary yeelding of Christ hath the first place, which yet was so voluntarie as he gaue over his owne affection not without strife. Also his condemnation is to be considered: Wherein two things are to be noted, namely that Christ was reputed among the wicked, and yet that his innocency was oftentimes testified even by the judges owne mouth. 2.1.5.

The maner of his Death is to be marked, that is to saie, the accursed crosse.

And it is declared by manie testimonies of Esaie & the Apostles, that this behaue\textsuperscript{d} so to be, that the curse which was due to vs being cast upon him and so overcome & taken away, we should be delivered. And this was figurative\textsuperscript{ly} represented in the sacrifices of Mo\textsuperscript{s}e\textsuperscript{s} lawe, which at the last was performed in Christ the original truth of all figures. 2.1.6.

Both in the Death and burial of Christ, a double benefite is set before vs, that is to say, deliverance from Death wherunto we were in bondage and the mortifying of our flesh. 2.1.6.

Descending of Christ to hell.

The Descending of Christ to Hell containeth the mysterie of a great thing, and is of no small importance to the effect of our redemption. Diverse expositions of this article are rehear\textsuperscript{sed} and confuted. 2.16.8.9.

A true, godlie, holy and comforta\textsuperscript{ble} exposition thereof out of the word of
of God, which is also confirmed by the testimonie of the old doctours, y Christ did not onely suffer a bodily death, but also did feel the rigor of Gods vengeance, whereby hee might both appease his wrath and satisfy his just judgement: and therefore it behooved that he should, as it were hand to hand wrestle with the power of hell & with y horror of everlasting death, yet was not God nor at any time either his enemie, or angry with him. But hee did suffer the greatestnesse of Gods severitie, in respect that he being striken & beaten with the hand of God, did feel all the tokens of Gods wrath & punishment.

A confusion of certayne wicked and unlearned men, which at this day doe find fault with this exposition crying out that the sonne of God hath wrong done to him, and that hee is charged with desperatio, which is certaine to faith. Therefore it is proved against the with manifest testimonies, that these two things do very well stand together, that Christ feared, was troubled in spirit, was afraid, was tempted in every point as we are, & yet that he is without sinne. 2.16.12.

Diuels.

Those things that the scripture teacheth concerning diuels, tend commonly to this end, that we should be careful to beware of their deceits, & furnish our selves with those weapons which may be able to beat backe the most mightie enemies. 1.14.13.

That we should be the more stirred vp to do so, it sheweth vs that there is not one or two diuels, but great armies of evil spirits y make war against vs: & in what sense it sometime speaketh of the diuel in the singular number. 1.14.14.

This ought to enflame vs to a continual war with the diuel, for that hee is euer where called enemie to God and vs. 1.14.15.

The Diuel is naturally wicked, a murderer, a lyer, and forger of all malitiousnes. 1.14.15. But this euilnesse of nature is not by creation, but by corruption. 1.14.16.

It is curious to enquire of vs cause, manner, time & fashion of the fall of the euil Angels, forasmuch as the scripture teacheth it unspoken. 1.14.16.

This the Diuel hath of himselfe & of his owne naughtinesse, detestably and purposely to striue against God, but hee can doe and perfomme nothing unlesse God be willing & grant it 1.14.17.

God so tempereth this governement, that hee giueth Satan no reigne over the soules of the faithfull, forasmuch as in the ende they euer obtaine the victorie, although in some particular doinges they bee wounded and beaten downe: but hee onely giueth the wicked to him to governe, and to use his power vpon their soules and bodies. 1.14.18.

A confusion of them which sayeth that Diuels are nothing else but euill affections or perturbations: and it is proved by testimonies of scripture, that they are mindes or spirites endued with sense and understanding. 1.14.19.

Faith.

The name of Faith otherwise taken among holy writers than it is among the pharosees. 4.12.13.

Hower it is to bee vnderwood that God is the object of Faith. 2.6.4.

Of faith. And here the Sophisters are reprooued, which vnderstand nothing else by this word faith, but a common assent to the historie of the Gospell, and doe simply call God the object of faith, in the meanes time leaueing out Christ, without where there is no Faith, nor any access to God. 3.2.1.

A confusion of the Schoolmen's doctrin concerning vnexpressed faith, whereas faith requireth an expresse knowledging of the goodnes of God, in which standeth our righteousness. 3.2.20.
The Table.

Our faith, so long as we are wavering in the world, is enwrapped with many remnantes of ignorance, and in all things infidelic is ever mingled with faith, whereas of many examples are seen in the disciples of Christ before that they came to perfecte light, yet this is still most true, that understanding is ever ioyned with faith.

There is a certaine obedience to Christ, and aptnesse to learne, with a desire to profite, which is called by the name of faith, whereas it is but a preparation to faith, and that same may be called an unexpressed faith; yet it farre differeth from the papists invention.

The true faith or knowledge of Christ, is when we cooeie him in such sort as he is offered of the Father, that to say, clothed with his Gospel. And faith hath a mutual relation to the word & the word to faith, because the worde is the fountain of faith, the grounde of faith, and the mirrour in which faith beholdeth God.

Faith, although it assent to all the partes of the worde of God, yet most properly it hath regard therein to the good will and mercie of God, that is to say, the promises of grace grounded upon Christ, for the understanding & certeinie whereof, the holy ghost lighteneth our minde and strengtheneth our hearts: Hereupon is gathered the definition of faith.

A confusion of the Sophisters distinction of faith, formed and formeless: whereby it appeareth that they never thought of the singular gift of the holy Ghost, for as much as faith can in no wise be feuered from a godly affection.

This worde faith hath diverse significations, and is sometime taken for the power to doe miracles, with which gift of God, sometime the wicked are endued: Somtime it is figuratively taken for that knowledge of God which is in some wicked men, which is rather a shadowe and image of faith, of which faith there are diverse fortes in them.

The reprobate have also sometime such a like feeling as the elect have, yet they do not fully cooeie the force of spiritual grace, but onely confusely. Neuertheless the same is a certain inferior working of the holie Ghost. But this feeling differeth farre from the peculiar testimonie which he giveth to the elect.

Yet is not the Spirite deceitfull, which lightly sprinketh the reprobate sometime with such a knowledge of the Gospell, and feeling of the love of God as afterward doth vanish away. Somtime also there is stirred vp in their hearts a certaine desire of mutuall loue towards God but such a love as is a hyred and not a hartie loue. At length it is concluded that there be some which do not faine a faith, & yet doe lacke the true faith, which is also proued by testimonies.

Faith is sometime taken for the sounde doctrine of religion, and the whole summe thereof; contrariwise sometime it is restrained to some particular obiect, & sometime it signifieth the ministrice of the church.

Faith is most rightfulluy called knowledge and science, and yea is such a knowledge as rather consisteth of certaine persuasion than of understanding, forasmuch as that which our minde conceueth by faith is most infinite.

Faith is not content with a doubtful opinion or a darke conceuing, but requireth a full & settled assuredness: & hereunto are to be referred all those titles of commendation wherewith the holy Ghost setteth forth the authority of the word of God. 3.2.15.

Many doe so conceive the mercy of God, that they receive wee little comfort thereof, because they doubt whether he will be mercifull to themselves or no: but there is a farre other feeling of the abundant store of Faith, the chiefest ground whereof is that wee doe not thinke the promises to be true without our selves only but rather that by inwardly embracing them wee may make them our owne. Hereupon is gathered, who may truly be called faithfull. 3.2.15.16.

Though the faithful in acknowledging the goodness of God toward them are not onely oftentimes tempted with vnquietness, but also are sometime shaken with most grievous terrors: yet this withstandeth not but that faith bringeth assuredness with it, because howsoever they bee troubled, yet they neuer fall & depart from that sure assurance which they have conceived of the mercie of God, but striving with their owne weaknesse they alway get the upper hand at last: which is proouched by manie examples in David. 3.2.17.

A description of the battell of the faire and the spirite within a faithfull soule. 3.2.18.

The assuredness of Gods good wil. 3.2.18.

A confutation of the most pestilent sullte reasoning of certaine halfe papists, which although they confesse that so oft as we looke upon Christ, we finde plentiful matter to hope well, yet will needes haue vs to wauer and doubt in consideration of our owne unworthinesse. And it is prooved that wee ought neverthelesse to looke for assured salvation, forasmuch as Christ by a certaine marvelous communion doth daily grow together more & more into one bodie with vs. 3.2.24.

So soone as wee haue anie one drop of faith we begin to behold God mercifull vnto vs, although a farre off in decidet, yet with so assured sight, as wee knowe we are not deceived: both these points are proouched by testimonies of Paul. 3.2.19.20.

It is shewed by examples, howe Faith armeth and fortifieth it selfe with the word of God to beare the violent assaults of tentations, and how the godlie minde never suffereth the assurance of Gods mercie to bee plucked away from it, although it be assailed with many remains of vnbeliefe and distrust. 3.2.21.

In the good will of God, which faith is said to haue respect vnto, although faith doe Chiefely looke vnto the assured expectation of eternall life, yet there are also contained promises of this present life and a perfect fruition of all good thinges, but the same such as may be gathered of the wordes: both these pointes are confirmed by testimonies of Scripture. 3.2.28.

Faith although it embrace the word of God in certein point, that is to saie, in the commandements also and in the prohibitions and threatnings, yet hath her foundation and proper marke whereunto it is directed, in the free promise of mercie: and for this reason the Gospell is called the word of faith, and is set as contrarie to the law. 3.2.29.

Yet doe we not by this distinction teare faith in sunder as Pygbius shamefully caulleth. 3.2.30.

Faith doth no lese neede the word of God, than the fruites doth neede the liuely roote of the tree, and with the word must be ioyned a consideration. of the power of God, without which mens cares will either not willingly, heare the word, or not esteeme it worthy. His power is to be considered in that that it is effectuall, that is to saye, by the workes of God, and by his benefits either particular or auncient, and such as hee hath bestowed upon the whole Church. 3.2.31.

The faithfull oftentimes so behauve themselves, that some errors are mingled with their faith, and they seeme to pattle the boundes of the word, but yet so faith hath alway the upper hande: This is proved by the examples of Sara and Rebecca, whome in the crooked turnings of their minde, God did by a secrete bridle hold fast in the obedience of his word. 3.2.31.

By reason of our blindnes & stiffneckednes, the wordes suffizeth not to make vs haue faith. vnlesse the Spirit of God do Enlighten our minde, and strengthen our heart with his power: & the same Spirit is not onely the beginer of our faith, but also doeth encrease it by degrees. 3.2.33.

Although it seeme to the mooste parte of men a most strange doctrine, that no man can beleue in Christe, but he to whom it is given, yet it is provoed to bee most true by reasons, testimonies of Scripture, and examples. 3.2.34.

Therefore faith is called the Spiri of Faith, the worke and good pleasure of God: and it is a singular gift, which hee giueth by singular pricelde to whom hee will, as it is provoed by notable sentences taken out of Augustine. 3.2.35.

It is not enough that the minde bee enlightened with understanding of the worde, vnlesse also the assurednes of the worde be poured into the verie heart, both which thinges the Spiri worke, which is therefore called the seale the pledge, & the Spiri of promise. 3.2.36.

Although faith bece rossed with divers e dourings, yet it alway at the last, escapeth out of the gulf of tentations, and reccieth most sweete quietnesse. 3.2.37.

A confutation of the damnable doctrine of the Scoolemen, which saye that we can none otherwise determine of the grace of God toward vs, than by morall coniectur. 3.2.38.

They are provoed to bee miserablye blinde, in sayinge that it is ratheesse for vs to conceiue an undoubted knowledge of the will of God: A good comparison of them and Paul in this poynt of doctrine. 3.2.39.

A confutation of their trifling shift that although we may take uppon vs to judge of the grace of God according to the present state of righteousnes, yet the knowledge of persevering to the ende abideth in sufpense. 3.2.40.

It is provoed that the definition of faith taught in this chapter, Se&.7.agreeth with the Apostles definition: Heb.cap.1. And the error of the scoolemen, that charitie is before faith and hope, is confuted by the testimonie of Bernard. 3.2.41.

Hope is alway engendered of faith, & is the undiuided companion of faith, so that whosoeuer lacketh hope, is provoed also to haue no faith. Also faith is nourished & strengthened by hope, & howe necessarie are the helps of hope to stablifie the faith, which is affailed with so manie forces of tentations. 3.2.42.

By reason of this conoiyning and alliance of faith & hope, the scripture doth many times vseth those two worde without difference, and sometime joyne them together. A confutation of the errore of Peter Lombarde, whiche maketh two foundations of faith, that is.

Feare.

The faithfull are oftentimes troubled with feare and distrust by reason of the feeling of their owne weaknesses. 3.2.17.

Another kinde of feare conceived in a godly heart, either by examples of Gods vengeance against the wicked, or by consideration of his owne miserie:Such feare is so much not contrary to faith, that the faithfull are much exhorted to have it. Neither is it any maruell if there be in a faithful soule both feare & faith, first on the other side in the wicked there are both dul negligence and carefulnes. 3.2 22.23.

The feare of God proceedeth out of a double feeling, namely when wee honor God as our father, & feare him as our Lorde: Neither is it any maruell if one mind have both those affections 3.2.26.

This feare differeth from the feare of the vnfaithfull, which they commonly call a servile feare. 3.2.27.

Of forsaking of our selves.

The first beginning of framing our life after the rule set forth in the lawe, is to consider that wee are not at our owne libertie, but hallowed & dedicate to God. And therefore wee ought to forsake our selves, & our owne reason (which as the Philosophers thinke, ought alone to be obeyed) to the ende that we may be governed by the word & Spirite of the Lorde. 3.7.1.

Also that wee ought not to seke those things that are our owne, but those things that are according to the will of the Lorde, and doe serve to advance his glorie. And that this is the forsaking of our selves, without the which there is a worlde of vices enclosed in the soule of man, and if there be any seeming of vertue at all, the same is corrupted with wicked desire of glorie. 3.7.2.

The forsaking or mortifying of our selves, is partly in respect of men, and partly, yea, and chiefly in respect of God. Toward other men, the scripture comandeth vs to do two things: namely to preferre them in honour before our selves, & with vnfaide trueh to employ our selves wholly to procure their commodities. Howe vers first of these points is to be performed, is taught in the 3.7.4. & also how the Scripture leade vs by the hande to the seconde point is shewed in the 3.7.5.

Free will.

Man was endued with Free will in the first estate of his creation. 1.15.8, which he lost by his fall. Of this the Phi-Philosophers were ignoraunt, & so all such as follow them, giving freewill to man, are utterly deceived. t.15.8.

The pliablenesse or weake power of freewill, which was in the first man, doth not excuse his fall. t. 15.8.

It is as well for our profit, as for the glory of God, to acknowledge all our strength to bee but a straffe made of a reed, yea, but a smoke. In the mean while we must beware, that while we take all self-righteousnesse from man, we do not therof take occasion of slothfulnesse. But rather we ought thereby to be stirred vp to seeke in God all the goodnesse whereof wee ourselves are voide. The defenders of freewill doe rather throw it downe headlong than stablishe it. 2.2.1.

The Philosophers determine three powers of the soule, Vnderstanding, Senfe, and Will or Appetite: and they thinke that the reason of mans understanding sufficeth for his good governnance: that will is by senfe moved to euill, so that it doth hardly yeeld it self to reason, and sometime is diversifie drawn from the one to the other, but yet that it hath a free election & can not be stopped, that it may follow reason her guide in all things: finally that vertues & vices are in our powers. 2.2.2.3.

The Ecclesiastical writers, although they acknowledged the soundnesse of understanding, & the freedome of will to have bene fore wounded by sinne, yet have spoken too much Philosophically of this matter. The olde writers did it for this purpose, first bicause they were loth to teach a thing that should be an absurdity in the common judgement of men, and also specially least they should give a new occasion of slothfulnes to the flesh being already to much due to goodnes, as appeareth by many sayings of Chrysostome & Hierome. The Grecke doctours above all other, & specially Chrysostome, doe exceede measure in aduaunting freewill, But all the olde writers generally, except Augustine, doe so variue and water in this point of doctrine, y there can almost no certaintie be gathered of their writings. They which came after the fell one after another to worse & worfe. The definitions of freewill cut of Origen, Augustine, Bernard, Ansfelme, Peter Lombard, & Thomas 2.2.4.

Also of the common distinction of the three sorts of liberie. 2.2.5.

Whether man be whole deprivaed of power to doe good, or whether hee haue yet some power though it bee weake: where it is spoken of the common distinction of grace working and grace working together, & what is a mistake in the same distinction. 2.2.6.

Forasmuch as it cannot otherwise be faide that man hath freewill, but because he doth euill of his own will, and not by compulsion, it had beene very good for the church, y this word freewill had never beene vscd, which had raised vp men to a damnable truthe of themselues. The old writers also do oft declare what they meane by y worde, specially Augustine, out of whom there are many places alleged, where hee weakeneth & mocketh the strength thereof, both when he calleth it Bond-will, & when he expoundeth the thing itselfe as it is at large. 2.2.7.8.

Although y olde Ecclesiastical writers doe sometime to much aduaunce freewill, and have spoken doutfully & diversifie in y matter: yet it appeareth by very many of their sayinges, y they hide or nothing esteeming mans power, gaue the whole praise of all goodnes to the holy Ghost. Many such sentences.
The power of man's will is not to be weighed by the success of things, but by the choice of judgment & the affection of will. 2.4.8.

It is proved against the defenders of freewill that sinne is of necessity, & yet nevertheless ought to be imputed: alfo that it is voluntarie, & yet cannot be avoided. 2.5.1.

A solution of an other objection of theirs, when they say that vice & vice proceed of Free election of will, it were no reason that man should either bee punished or rewarded. 2.5.2.

Alfo another objection, where they say that if this were not the power of our will, to choose good or evil, then of necessity either all men should be good, or all men evil. 2.5.3.

Against the same men alfo it is proved that exhortations, admonitions & rebukings are not in vain, although it be not in the power of the sinner to obey; and there is shewed what effect the same doe work both in the wicked & in the faithful. 2.5.4.5.

It is not to be gathered by the commandments and lawe of God, that man hath freewill & strength to performe them, for God doth not only command what ought to be done, but also promiseth grace to obeye. 2.5.6.7.9.

This is proved as well in the commandments which require the first conversion to God, as alfo in those which speake simply of the observing of the lawe, and those which command men to continue in the received grace of God. For the same God which requireth those things, doth testify that by conversion of a sinner, holinesse of life, steadfastnes of continuance, are his free gifts, and the praise thereof is not to be parted betweene God & man. 2.5.8.9.11.

The conditionall promises, as, if ye will, if ye heare, and such like, do not prove that there is in man a free power of willing or hearing; yet it is proved that God doth not mocke men in so bargaining with them. Alfo what is the vse of such protestations, both toward the godly & toward the ungodly. 2.5.10.

The reprochings, wherein God faith to his people that they were the cause that they received not all kinds of good things at his hande, do not prove that it was mans power to escape the euils wherewith they were afflicted. And there is spoken of the vse of such reprochings as well towards them obstinately go forward in their faults, as toward the conformable that are converted to repentance. Alfo whereas the Scripture doth sometime give to vs the office of doing, it doeth so for no other reason but to awaken the slownessness of the flesh. 2.5.11.

The saying of Moses, The commandement is neere to thee, in thy mouth & in thy heart &c. maketh nothing for the defenders of free will, foral much as he there speaketh not of the bare commandements, but of the evangelical promises of the law. 2.5.12.

No more do those places make for them, where it is said that the Lord looketh and watcheth to see what men will do. 2.5.13.

Christ, although hee were known to the Jews in time of the law, was yet shewed in deede only by the Gospel: & the holy fathers taught of that grace, which is now offered to vs with full abundance, they faw the day of Christ albeit with a dim sight, the glory wher of now shineth in the Gospel, without any veile betwenee vs and it.2.9.1.2.

In the same place alio is shewed, that the Gospel is properly & specially called the publishing of the grace giuen in Christ, and not the promises that are written by the Prophets concerning the remission of sinnes. Against the doctrin of Servetus, which taketh away the promises under this pretence y by the faith of the Gospel wee haue the fulfilling of all the promises, it is proved that though Christ offer vs in the Gospel present fulnesse of spiritual good things, yet the enjoying thereof lyeth hidden under the custody of hope so long as wee live in this world and therefore wee must yet rest upon the promises.2.9.3.

That we may place to the calling of Christ, both presumption and carelesnes must be far away from vs. 3.18.

There is no danger least man should take too much from himself, so that he learne that which wanteth in himself is to be recovered in God. The knowledge of God ought to tend to this ende, first to frame vs to feare and reverence, and then that by it guiding & teaching vs we may learn to aske all good things of him, & to account the same receiued at his hande. 1.2.2. & 1.5.8.

Lawe.

The lawe, that is to say the forme of religion set forth by Moses, was not giuen to holde the olde people still in it, but to nourish in their hearts the hope of salvation in Christ vntill his coming: which is proved by this that Moses repreareth the mention of the co-venant: and by the order of the ceremonies appointed as well in sacrifices as in washings, also by the office of priesthood of the tribe of Levi and the honor of kingdom in David's & his posteritie. The law also of the ten commandements was giuen to prepare men to
The Table.

By the ten commandements of the Law we learne the same things which we but slenderly taue by instructiue of the lawe of nature: First that we owe to God reverence, loue, & feare, that righteousnesse pleaseth him, and wickednesse displeaseth him; finally, that examining our life by the rule of the Lawe, wee are vnworthie to bee accounted among the creatures of God, and that our power is vn sufficient, yea no power at all to encountre the lawe. Both these points engender in vs humilitie & abacing of our selues, which teacheth vs to flee to the mercie of God, & to craue the help of his grace. 2.8.1, 23.

Forasmuch as God the Lawmaker is spirituall, that is to say, speake for wel to the soule as to the bodie, therefore the lawe likewiue requireth not only an outwardly honestie, but also an inwarde & spirituall righteousnesse and a verie angelike purenesse. 1.8.6. which is proued by Christies owne exposition, when he confuted the Pharisees wrong interpretation, which required only a certaine outward observation of the Law. 2.8.7.

There is alway more in the commandements and prohibitions of the Lawe, than is expressed. Therefore for the right & true expounding of them, it behooueth to wey what is the entent or end of euerie of them: Then from that which is commanded or forbidden, wee must draw an argument to the contrarie, that wee may understand that not onely an euil is forbidden, but also the good is commanded which is contrarie to that euil. 2.8.8,9.

Why God spake by way of emplied comprehending, in setting forth the forme of his commandementes. 2. 8.10.

seeke Christ. 2.7.1,1. and that is done, when it maketh vs vnexecutable being on every side consiisted of our sinnes, to moue vs to seek for pardon of our guiltines. 2.7.3,4.

It is proued by the Scripture and declared that the obseruing of the lawe is impossible. 2.7.5.

There are three vses and offices of the morall lawe. The first is, that shewing vs the righteousnesse which onely is acceptable vnto God, it may be as a glasse for vs, wherein wee may behold our weakness, and by it our wickednesse, and finally by them both our accursednesse. Neither turneth this to any dishonour of the lawe, but maketh for the glorie of the bountifullnes of God, which both with help of grace aideth vs to doe that which we are commaundd, and by mercie putteth away our offences. Neither yet doeth this office altogether cease in the revprobate. 2.7.6,7,8,9.

The seconde office, is to restraine the revprobate with feare of punishiment least they vnbridledly committte the wickednesse which inwardly they alway nourish and loue: and also to draw back the children of God before their regeneration from outwarde licentiouenesse. 2.7.10,11.

The thirde office, concerneth the faithfull: for the lawe although it bee alreadie written with the finger of God in their hearts, yet profiseth the two wayes: For by studying vpon it they are more confirmed in the vnderstanding of the will of the Lord, and are stirred vp & strengthened to obedience, that they go not out of kinde by the flugifhnesse of the flesh. 2.7.12,13. For as touching the curfe of the Lawe, it is taken away from the faithfull, that it can no more extende it selfe against them in damning and destroying them. 2.7.14.
two tables: and howe therein wee are taught that the first foundation & the very soule of righteousness is the worshipping of God. 2.8.11.

Of the division of the ten commandements, and how many commandements are to be appointed to the first table, and howe manie to the seconde. 2.8.12 50.

An exposition of the commandements of God: Where is declared that the Lorde is the beginning of the law, to stablishe his owne majestie, vieth three arguments: First by challenging to himselfe the soueraigne power and right of dominion over vs, he doth as it were by necessitie drawe vs to obey him: secondly hee allureth vs with the sweetnes of the promise of grace: thirdly he moueth vs to obedience with rehearsal of the benefit that we have received. 2.8.13.14.15.

The Law teacheth not only certain introductions and principles of righteousness, but the very accomplishment thereof, the expressing of the image of God, and the perfection of holinesse: which law is al contained in two points that is to say, the loue of God & of our neighbour. 2.8.51.

The Law of Nature. 2.2.22.

Laws Politikc.

Neither can Lawes be without the Magistrate, nor the Magistrate without Lawes. A confutatation of them which say that a common weale is not well ordered, vntil ey it be governed by the politike lawes of Moses. For this purpose is rehearsed a divisio of the Lawes of Moses into morall Lawes, ceremonies, and judicall Lawes, and the end of every one of them being discusued, it is proved that it is lawfull for every seuerall nation to make politike Lawes, 20.14.15. so that they agree with that naturall equitie, the reason whereof is set forth in the morall Lawe of Moses. Therefore it is shewed by examples that they may alter the ordinances of penalties according to the diuerstie of the countrey, time, and other circumstances. 4.20.16.

Liberie.

See Christian Liberie.

Lying.

An exposition of the nineth commandement, wherein the Lord forbideth falsity, wherewith we by Lying, or backbying, doe hurt ane mans good name, or hinder his comoditie. 2.8.47.

We many times sinne against this commandement, although we do not Lye. But in this point there must be a difference wisely made betwixt the slauntring which is here condemned, and judicall acculation or rebuking, which is vset upon desire to bring to amendment. 2.8.48.

Life of a Christian man.

The Lawe containeth a rule how to frame a mans Life, and divers places also of the Scripture do here and there declare it, and not without an orderly manner of teachinge, although not so exquisitly and curious as the Philosophers doe. 3.6.1.

Herein the Scripture doeth two things: it stirreth vs vp to the loue of righteousness & teacheth a rule how to follow the same. The first point it worketh by divers argumentes & reasons. 3.6.2, and herein the Scripture layeth much better foundations, than can be founde in all the bookes of the Philosophers. 3.6.3.

Against them that pretend a knowledge of Christ, when their life & manners resembe not the doctrine of Christ. 3.6.4.

Though perfection were to be wishede in al men, yet we must also acknowledge for christian the most part of me which have not yet proceeded so farre.
The Table.

We must alwaye endeavoure forward, and not despare for the smallnesse of our profiting 3.6.5.

Out of a place of Paul these are gathered to be the parts of a well framed Life: consideration of the grace of God, forsaking of wickednes and of worldly lustes, sobernesse, rightouenes, godlienesse (which signifieth true holinesse) and the blessed hope of immortalitie.

3.7.8. Life present, and the helpes thereof.

The Scripture teacheth the best way how to vie the goods of this Life. 3.10.4.5.

Two faults must be avoyded: that we doe neither binde our consciences with too much rigoroufnesse nor giue lose reignes to the intemperance of men. 3.10.1.2.

God both in clothing and in food provided not onely for our necessitie, but also for our delight. 3.10.2.

It is most necessarie, that euery one of vs in all the doings of his life do look upon his vocation, that we attempt nothing rashly or with doubtfull confidence. 3.10.6.

God didaine not to provide also for the necessitie of our earthly body, and in what sense we aske of him our daily bread. 3.20.44.

Life to come.

God dore by divers mysteries teach vs the contempt of this present Life, that we may earnestly desire Life to come. 3.9.1.2.4.

Such a contemp of this Life is required of vs, that we neither hate it nor be vnthankfull to God, of whose clemency it is a testimony to the faithful. 3.9.3.

An admonition to them which are holde with too much feare of death, that Christians ought rather to desire that day which shall make an ende of their continual miferies, and fill them with true ioy. 3.9.5.6.

Of the incomprehensible excellency of the eternall felicitie (which is the ende of the resurrection) the taste of the sweetenesse whereof we ought here continually to take, but yet to avoid curiosity wherupon do arise tripling and noyse questions, yea and hurtfull speculations. And there shalbe an equal measure of glorye to all the children of God in heauen. 3.25.10.11.

In which place also is an answer to the questions which some men doe mowe concerning the state of the children of God after the resurrection.

In what sense eternal Life is sometime called the reward of works. 3.18.2.4.

M.

Magistrates.

The office of Magistrates is not onely holy and lawfull before God, but also the most holy and honourable degree in all the life of men, and this is proued by divers titles wherewith the Scripture doth set it forth, and by the examples of holy men, which haue borne ciuill power. 4.20.4.

This consideration is a pricked to godly Magistrates to move the to the doing of their dutie, and also it is a comfort to ease the hard travaillers of their office. 4.20.6.

A confutacion of them, which faye that though in the old time under the lawe Kings & Judges ruled over Gods people, yet this scruple kind of government doth not agree with the perfection which Christ hath brought with his gospel. 4.20.5.7.

They erre which exclude the Magistrates from the charge of religion, forasmuch as their office extendeth to both the tables of the law. It is proued by Scripture, that they are ordened profeftors and defenders as well of the worshippinge of God as of common peace and honestie, which they can not thorowly performe without the power power of the sword.

A declaration of this question by Scripture, how the magistrates may be godly, and also drawe their swords, and shed the bloud of men, and it is proved, that they are so farre from sinning in punishing offenders, that this is one of the vertues of a King, & a proofe of their godlineffe. Herein the Magistrates must beware of two faults namely extreme rigoroufnes, & superflitious desire of pite. 4.20.10.

It is the dutie of subiects towards Magistrates, to thinke honourably of them as of the ministers & deputies of God, forasmuch as concerneth their degree, but not that they should esteeme the vices of men for vertues. 4.20.22.

It is also their dutie with minde heartily bent to the honoring of them to declare their obedience towarde them, whether it be in following their decrees or in paying of tributes, &c. to pray to God for their safetie & prosperity, to raise no tumults and not to thrust themselves into the office of the Magistrate. 4.20.23.

Even wicked princes of euill life, and which rule tyrannously (for for-much as pertaineth to publike obedience) ought to bee had in as great reuerence and honour as we woulde giue to the best king that might bee, 4.20.24. 25. because euen they also hate the publike power not without the providence and singular power of God. Which is prooved by diverse testimonies and examples of Scripture: and there is shewed with what considerations those subiectes ought to bridle their own impatience who live under such vngodly and wicked tyrantcs. 4. 20. 26, 27, 28, 29, 31.

It is not lawfull for private men to rie vp against tyrantcs, but onely for them which by the lawes of the king-dome or of the countrie, are the defenders of the libertie of the people. 4.20.31.

The Lord by his maruellous good-nesse and providence, doeth sometime raise vp some of his servants to punish tyrantcs, and sometime also hee directeth thereunto the rage of wicked men while they intende an other thing. 4.20.30.

In the obedience which is due to the commandements of kinges and rulers this is alway to bee excepted, that it draw vs not away from the obedience of God: Neither is any wrong done to them when we refuse to obey them in such things as they command against God: And this is our duty, how great and present perilsoeuer do hang upon such constancie. 4.20.32.

Man.

Man is by knowledge of himselfe not onely moued to seeke God, but also led as it were by the hand to finde him. 1.1.1.

The creation of man is a notable shewe of the power, wisdom, dome, & goodness of God: wherefore Man is by some of the Philosophers called a little world. 1.5.3.

The thankfulness of men, which feeling tokens of the providence of God both in their soule and bodye, yet doe not giue GOD prays. 1.5.4.

Two sortes of knowledge of our felues, the one in our firste originall estate, the other after Adam: fal, & by latter is not to be receiued without considering the first, lest we should seeme to impute corruption to God the author of nature. 1.15.1.

The knowledge of himselfe is most necessarie for Man, which consisteth in this (as the truth of God prescribeth) that first considering to what ende he is created and endued with excellent

XXX 3 gifts,
giftes, he should hang altogether upon God, of whom he hath all things by gift: then, that weying his own miserable estate after the fall of Adam, he should truly both himselfe and conceiue a new desire to seeke God, that in him he may recouer those good things of which he himselfe is founde utterly voide and emptie. Wherefore we must beware that in this point we hearken not to the judgement of the fleshe and to the booke of Philosophers, while they withhould vs in considering onely our good things, would carrie vs away into a most wicked ignorance of our felues. 2.1.1, 2.2.

Man can never come to the treue knowledge of himselfe, vnlesse he haue first behelde the face of God, that is to say, till hee haue begun to knowe and weigh by the word of God what and how exact is the perfection of his righteousnesse, wisedome, and power, to the which wee ought to bee made of like forme.1.1.3.

Euen the most holy men were stricken with feare & astonishment, when God did extraordinarily shew his presence and glorie vnto them.1.1.3.

That whole man is corrupted in both partes of him (that is to say both in understanding minde, and in heart or will) is prooued by divers titles wherewith the scripture describeth him, specially when it saith that he is flesh: And there is declared that this wold flesh is not referred onlie to the sensuall part but also to the superiour part of the soule.2.3.1.

That men doe in vaine seek every good thing in their owne nature, is prooued by Paul, which intreating of the vniversall kindred of the children of Adam, and not rebuking the corrupted maners of some one age alone but accusing the perpetuall corrupt.
The Table.

Continence is a singular gift of God, which he giueth not to all men, but to some, yea and that some time for a season: As for them to whom it is not granted, let them alway flee to Marriague, which is ordained of the Lord for the remedie of mans necessitie. 2. 8. 41. 42. 43.

Maried persons must beware that they commit nothing vnbecoming the honestie & temperance of Marriage: Otherwife they seeme to be adulterers of their owne wiuers, and not husbands. 2. 8. 44.

The Papistes doe wrongfully call marriage a Sacrament: And their reasons are confuted 4. 19. 14. It is proved that the place of Paul, wherwith they secke to cloke theirmelves, maketh nothing for them 4. 19. 35.

In the meane they disagree with themselves when they exclude priests from this Sacrament, & do say that it is vnclennesse and defiling of the flethe. 4. 19. 36.

By this false colour of Sacrament, the Pope with his clearlie haue drawn to themselves the hearing of causes of Matrimonie, and haue made lawes of marriage, which partly are manifestly wicked against God, & partly most vnuiuie toward men, which lawes are rehearsed. 4. 19. 37.

Mediator Christ.

It behoued that Christ, to the ende that he might performe the office of Mediator, should be made man, forasmuch as God had so ordeyned, because it was best for vs, Sith none other could bee the means for restoring of peace betweene God and vs, none other could make vs the children of God, none other could assure vs to the inheritance of the heauenlie kingdom, none other could for remedie set mans obedience against mans disobedience. 2. 12. 1. 2. 3.

A confutation of their fantastical conceit, which affirm that Christ should haue become man, although there had needed no remedie for the redeeming of mankind. And it is proved by manie reasons and textes, that forasmuch as the whole Scripture crieth out that he was cloathed with fleshe, to the ende that he might be the redeemer, therefore it is too great rashnesse to imagine any other cause or purpose. 2. 12. 4.

Neither is it lawfull to searche further concerning Christ: and those that do search further, do with wicked boldnesse runne forwarde to the faining of a new Christ: And herein Osander is reproved, which hath at this time renewed this question, & affirmeth that this error is confuted by no testimonie of Scripture. 2. 12. 5.

And the principle is overthrown which he buildeth on, that man was create after the image of God, because he was formed after the likenesse of Christ to come, that he might resemble him whom the father had alreadie decreed to cloth with fleshe: And there was shewed that the image of God in Adam, was the markes of excellencie wherewith God had garnished him, which doeth also shine in the Angels. 2. 12. 6. 7.

A solution of other objections or absurdities which the same Osander feareth: namely, that then Christ was borne & creat after the image of Adam but as it were by chaunce: & that the Angels should haue lacked their head, and men shoulde have lacked Christ their king: 2. 12. 6. 7.

How the two natures do make one person of the mediatur in Christe: Which is shewed by a similitude taken of the joyning of the soule and bodie in one man: And then it is proved by divers places that the scripture doeth.

manic times give vnto Chriſt thofe things which properly belogeth to the godhead, and sometime thofe things which must bee referred onely to the manneſties and sometime giueth to Chriſt thofe things which doe comprehend both natures together, but doe severally well agree with neither of them. Which laſt point the most part of the olde writers have not sufficiently marked: Yet it is good to bee noted, for the dissolving of manic doubtes, and for avoyding of the errors of Nefborius and Euniches. 2.14. 3.4.

A confutation of the error of Ser-νεττας, which had put in the stead of the fonne of God, an imagined thing made of the substance of God's spirit, flesh, & three elements named: His futtetie is dissolved, and there is proved (which thing hee denyeth) that Chriſt was the fonne of God, euen before that he was borne in the flesh, be-cause he is that worde begotten of the father before all worldes 2.14.5.

Also it is proved that he is truely & properly the fonne of God in fleshe, that is to faye in the nature of Man, but yet in reſpect of his godhead, and, not of his fleshe, as Serνεττας babbleth. 2.14.6.

An exposition of certaine places which Serνεττας and his disciples doe enforce for defence of their error: There is also another cauillation of his disseolved, that Chriſt before that he appeared in the fleshe, is in no place calleth the fonne of God but vnder a figure 2.14.7.

Also there is opened the error of all them which doe not acknowledge Chriſt the Sonne of God but in the fleshe: and there are briefly rehearced the grosse suttetieles of Serνεττας, wherewith he hath bewitched himself and other, overthrowing that which pure faith beleueth concerning the person of the fonne of God: And ther-upon is gathered that with the craftie darkes suttetiones of that filthie dog, the hope of faluation is vterly extinguisched 2.14.8.

Merit of Chriſt.

It is truely and properly sayde that Chriſt merited for vs the grace of God and faluation. Where it is proved that Chriſt was not onely the instrument or minifter of faluation, but also the author and principall doer thereof: And in saying, the grace of God is not defaced, because the merite of Chriſt is not fet against mercy, but hangeth vpon it. And those things which are Subalturna, fayd not as contraries 2.17.1.

The distillation of the Merite of Chriſt and of the grace of God is pro-ved by manic places of Scripture 2.17.2.

There are alledged many testimonies of Scripture, out of which it is cer-tainely and soundly gathered, that Chriſt by his obedience hath truelie purchased and deferved faviour for vs with his father 2.17.3.4.5.

It is a foolifhe curiositie to enquire, whether Chriſt hath deferved anye thing for himselfe: and it is rathnes to affirme it 2.17.6.

Merites of worke.

The boastings that are made of the Merites of worke, doe ouerthrowe as well the praise of God in giuing righ-teousnes, as also the certaintie of faluation 3.15.

Whoſeuer first applied the name of Merit to good worke in the sight of Gods judgement, hee did against the purenes of faith, And though the olde fathers fathers used that name, yet they so v ised it that they have in many places shewed that they attribute nothing to works.3.15.2.

It is proved by authoritie of the Apostles & Augustine, that the rewardes of righteousness doe hang vpon the meere liberalitie of God.2.5.2.

ing,that Christ Merited for vs onely-the first grace; and that afterward we do merite by our owne worke.3.15.6.

Patience.
A Part of forfaking of our felues, in respect of God, is contention of minde and sufferance: Which we shall performe, if in seeking the commodite or quietnesse of this present life wee yealde our selues wholly to the Lorde, and do not desire, hope for, or thinke vpon any other meane of prospering than by his blessing. 3.7.8.
So shall it come to passe that we shall never seeke our owne commodities by vnlawfull meanes or with wronging of our neighbours: also that wee shall not burne with vnmeasurable desyre of riches or of honours: finally if things prosper well with vs, wee shall yet be holden from pride, & if they happen ill, we shall yet be restrained from impatience. 3.7.9. Which extendeth to all chaunces whereunto our present life is subject, of the faithfull doth always acknowledge the hand of God their father, and not fortune, to be the governor. 3.7.10.
The Patience of the faithfull is not such as is without aall feeling of sorrow, but such as beeing vpholden by godly comfort, fighteth against the naturall feeling of sorrow. Therefore the Patience of the Stoikes is to bee reiected: neither is it in it, felt any fault to weep or feare. 3.8.8.9.

There is great difference between Philosophical & Christian patience: Forasmuch as by philosophers do teach vs to obey because wee do most of necessities: but Christ teacheth it, because it is righteous, and also because it is profitable for vs. 3.8.11.

Pardons.
The so long continuing of pardons declareth in howe deepene darkenesse of errors men have been drowned these certaine ages past. 3.5.1.

What Pardons are by the Papistes doctrine: Whereby is proved they are a dishonoring of y blood of Christ: A comparison of Christ & popish pardons. 3.5.1.

A confutation of the wicked doctrine of pardons, by the notable sayings of Leo Bishop of Rome, & of Augustine. And there is shewed that the blood of martyrs is not vnlawfull, although it have no place in forgiveuens of sinnes. 3.5.3.4.

Either the Gospel of God must ly, or pardons must be lying deceits. And there is shewed what seemeth to haue beene the beginning of them. 3.5.5.

Penance, the Popish Sacrament.
Of the vflge of the olde Church in publike penance: and of the laying on of handes at reconciliation. Also howe in proccesse of time the laying on of hands was vfed in priuate abolutions. 4.19.14.

The diverse opinions of the scholemen howe penance is a Sacrament: And there is shewed that the definition of a Sacrament doth not agree with it. 4.19.15.16.

It is a lye, and a deceitfull error which they have inucted concerning the Sacrament of Penance: and it is a wicked and blasphemous title wherewith they have garnished it, a second boorde after shipwracke from Baptisme. 4.19.17.

Perseuerance.
See booke 2. Chap. 5. Sec. 3.
A confusion of the mooste wicked error, that Perseuerance is gien of God according to the Merit of men, so as every man hath shewed him selfe not vnthankful for the first grace: and in this opinion is shewed a double error. Of the common definition of grace working, & working together: & howe Augustine vfed it, qualifying it with an apt definition. 3.3.11.

Politike gouernement.
There is a difference to bee made betweene policie, and the inwarde gouernment of the soule. Their doctrine is to be rejected which gое aboute to ouerthrowe policie as a thing not necessarye for Christianis, or as a thing ouerthroweth the spirituall libertie of the soule. Also those flatterers are to be rejected, which doe giue too much vnto it, & do set it in comparison against the authoritie of God. 4.20.1.2.

Policie is the gift of God, which bringeth great commodities to mankind & no small helpe to the defence of the state of religio. Politike gouernment hath three partes, the magistrat, the Lawes and the people. 4.20.3.

Of three formes of Civile gouernement, Aristocracie the gouernment of the beft choen men, Democracie the gouernment of the people, Monar- chie the gouernment of one: it can not simply bee determined which of these is the best: yet it commeth to passe by the faule of men, that it is safer & more tolerable to haue many to gouerne than one to reigne. But all these forms are of God, & diversely disposed by him, therefore it is the duty of priuate men to obey, & not to make innovacion of states after their owne will. 4.20.8.

Of the immunitie that the Romish clergy take to themselfes, which was was altogether unknowne to the Bishops of the olde Church. 4.11.15.
In matters of Faith, the judgement in the olde time pertained to the Church and not to Princes, although some-time Princes intermeddled their authoritie in ecclesiastical matters, but the same was done to preserue and not to trouble the order of the church.

4.11.15.16.

Of the authoritie of the sworde usurped by the bishops in the papacy: and howe they have by litle and litle from so small beginnings grown to so great encrease. 4.11.9.10.

Pope.

It is proved that the supremacie of the sea of Rome is not by the institution of Christ. 4.6.1.2.3.4.

Neither had Peter any principalitie in the Church or among the Apostles. 4.6.5.6.7.

Neither is it profitable nor may be, that one man should beare rule over the whole Church. 4.6.8.9.10.

Although Peter had had a supremacy in the Church, yet it followeth not that the se of that supremacie ought to be at Rome. 4.6.11.12.13.

It is proved by many argumentes that Peter was not bishop of Rome. 4.6.14.15.

The supremacie of the sea of Rome is not according to the use of the olde Church. 4.6.16.17.

Of the beginning & encreasinges of the Romish papacy, vntill it advanced it selfe to that height, whereby both the libertye of the Church is oppressed and all moderate governement hath beeene overthrowen. 4.7.

In the most part of the councils, the Bishoppe of Rome nor his legates had not the chief place, but some other of the Bishops had it at the Council of Chalcedon: but yet without order. 4.7.12.

Of the title of supremacy and other titles of pride wherewith the Pope boasteth himselfe, and when and how they crept in. 4.7.3.

Gregorie pronounceth that the title of universall bishop was devised by the devil, and published by the crier of Antichrist. 4.7.4.

It is proved by the use of the olde Church, that it is false which the bishop of Rome boasteth, that he hath jurisdiction over all Churches. 4.7.5. Whether ye consider the ordering of bishops, Sect. 6. or ecclesiastical admonitions and censures, Sect. 7. or summoning of Councils, Sect. 8. or authoritie of higher or appeales, Sect. 9.10.

The olde Bishops of Rome in the most part of their Epistles did ambitiously set forth the glory of their sea, but those Epistles at that time had no credit: Also they did thrust in certayne forged things as though they had ben written in the olde time by holye men. 4.7.11.20.

Although in the time of Gregorie, the authoritie of the Bishop of Rome was greatly encreased, yet it is prooved by his writinges that it was then far from unbridled dominion and tyranny. 4.7.12.13.22.

There was strife for the supremacie betweene the bishop of Constantinople & the bishop of Rome. 4.7.14.15.16. vntill Phocas granted to Boniface the third, that Rome should bee the head of all Churches: which afterwarde Pipine confirmed, when hee gaue to the Sea of Rome jurisdiction ouer the Churches of Francke. 4.7.17.

From thence forth the tyrannie of the sea of Rome encreased more and more, partly by ignorance & partly by negligence of Bishops: which destrucion of the whole order of the church Bernarda lamenteth and layeth to

The insolence & shamefines of the bishops of Rome in setting forth their owne supreme authority, 4.7.19.20. which is reproved by sayings of Cypriian and Gregorie, Sect.21.

Rome can not be the mother of all Churches, forasmuch as it is no church. Neither can the bishopp of Rome bee head of bishops, 6th he is no bishop, 4.7.23.24.

It is proved by Paul, that the Pope is Antichrist, 4.7.25.

Although the Church of Rome in olde time had had the honor of supremacy, yet the same is not to be bound to a place, 4.7 26.29.

Of the maners of the citrie of Rome of the Pope, and of the Cardinals and their diuinitie, 4.7.27.28.

The Bishop of Rome first laide hande vpon kingdomes, and then vpon the Empire : Which is proved by mothe sharpe reprehensions of Bernarde to be vnmecte for him that boeth himselfe the successflour of the Apostles, 4.11.11.

Of the gift of Constantine, wherewith hee laboreth to hide his robberie, 4.11.12. and howe there are not yet five hundrede yeeres past, since the Popes were in subjection of Princes, and by what occasion they have shake it off, Sect.13. and howe they brought the city of Rome into their power, but about a hundred and thirtie yeares ago, Sect.14.

Prayer.

True faith can not be idle from calling vpon God, 3.20.1.

How necessary & how manie waies profitable is the exercise of praying, 3.20.2. although the Lorde will not cease while we crave not, nor needeth any to put him in minde, Sect.3.

The firste rule of well framing our prayer, is that we be no otherwised difposed in heart and mind than becommeth them that enter into talke with God, 3.20.4.5.

The second rule is, that in praying we alway feele our owne needes, and that earnestly considering what we ask, we may have with our prayer an earnest and fervent desire to obtaine, 3.20.6.

We ought to pray at all times, and in the greatest quietnes of our estates, the onely remembrance of our sinne ought to bee no small prouocation to moue vs to that exercise, 3.20.7.

The third rule of praying well, is that we forakke all confidence of our owne glorie, leaft if we presumptuously take anything be it never so little, vnto our felues, wee with our vain pride, fall downe from his face 3.20.8.

The beginning of praying well, is the obtaining of pardon, with an humble and plaine confession of offence, 3.20.9.

In what sense the Prayers of certain holy men are to be taken, in which to entreat GOD, they seeme to allledge their owne righteousness, 3.20.10.

The fourth rule of praying well, is that being so overthrown and beaten downe with true humility: wee bee nevertheless encouraged to pray with an assured hope to obtaine : So in our prayers, faith & repentance doe meeet together, 3.20.11.

Of the certainty of faith, whereby the faithfull do determine that God is fauorable vnto them. And howe necessarie the same is in Prayer: Nyether is that certainie weakened, when it is joinned with acknowledging of our owne miserie, 3.20.12.

These foure rules of Praying well, are not examined with so extreeme rigor, but God herein doth beare with many infirmities, yea many intemperances in them that bee his, which is proued by many examples. 3. 20. 16.

We must alway Pray in the name of Christ only. 3. 20. 17. neither were the faithfull ever hearde any other wise. Sect. 18.

They which Pray otherwise, have nothing left for them at the throne of God, but wrath and terror. 3. 20. 19.

It is not against Christies office of mediator: that we bee commanded to Pray one for another. 3. 20. 19.

A confusion of the Sophisters devise, which say that Christ is the mediator of redemption, & the faithfull are mediators of intercession. 3. 20. 20.

Against them, which make dead Saints intercessors to God for them, or doreinge the interces sion of Christ with the Prayers and merites of dead men, 3. 20. 21.

This foolishnesse hath proceeded in the papacy to grosse monstroufnes of vngodlines, and to horrible sacrileges. 3. 20. 22.

A confusion of the argumentes where with the papistes labour to confirme the intercession of dead Saints. 3. 20. 23. 24. 25. 26.

It is vnlawfull to direct our prayers to dead Saints forasmuch as this kind of worshipping doth moste properly belong to God alone. 3. 20. 27.

Of the sort of prayer, and chiefly of thanksgiving: Also of the continuall exercise of the faithfull in prayer and thanksgiving. 3. 20. 28. 29.

Of the babbing of the papistes, and of avoiding all boasting in prayers, of departing into secrete places, and of publike Prayers. 3. 20. 29.

Publike Prayers must bee made in the common and native speech of the lande. And there is entreated of kneeling and vncowering of the heade at prayer. 3. 20. 33.

Of the confidence which the name of the children of God doth bring vnto vs, which even the conscience of our sinnes ought not to overthawe. 3. 20. 46. 37.

Although wee ought to pray for all men, & specially for them of the house hold of faith, yet this withstandeth not, but that wee may pray specially, both for our felues and certain other. 3. 20. 48. 39. 47.

Of the boldnes of asking which the Lorde graunteth to his, and the trust of obtaining. 3. 20. 47.

It is good that every one of vs for exercitse, appoint to him selfe certaine peculiar houres to pray, so that it bee done without superstitious observati on. 3. 20. 50.

In all our prayer we ought diligentely to beware that wee goe not about to bind God to certaine circumstancies. 3. 20. 50.
Of perseverance and patience in the exercise of prayer. 3.10,51,52.

Predestination.

It is proved that the doctrine of predestination is a doctrine of most sweet fruit. There are rehearsed three principal profits thereof: and they are admonished which being moved with a certaine curiosity doe beyond the bounds of Scripture break into the secrets of the wisdom of God, 3.1.1.2 and also they which would have all mention of Predestination to be buried. Sect. 3.4.

What is Predestination, and what is the foreknowledge of God, and how the one of them is wrongfully set after the other. The example of Predestination in all the offspring of Abraham in respect of other nations, is confirmed by many testimonies of Scripture 3.21.5.

Also there is shewed a speciall Predestination, whereby even among the Children themselves hee hath made difference betweene some and other some. Sect. 6.7.

A confirmation of the doctrine of Predestination taken out of testimonies of Scripture 3.22.

Of them that make a foreknowledge of Merits the cause of Predestination. Also of other men that blame God because he electeth some and passeth over other. 3.22.1.

God as well in election as in reprobation hath no respect of works neither passed nor to come, but his good pleasure is the cause of both. 3.22,2,3, 4,5,6,7,11.

This is proved by Augustine, Sect. 8, and the trifling little device of Thomas to contrary is confurfed. Sect. 9.

The promises of salvation are not directed to all, but peculiarly to the elect. 3.22.10.

These two sayings do not disagree that God by the outward preaching of the word calleth many, & yet hee giveth the gift of faith to few. 3.22.10.

Against them which so confess election, that yet they deny any to bee reprobate of God. 3.23.1.

The reprobate doe in vaine conted with God, forasmuch as God oweth them nothing, and will eth nothing otherwise than righteously, and they themselves may finde just causes of their damnation in them selues. 3.23.4,5.

An answere to the wicked question of certaine men, why GOD shoule blame men for these things whereof he hath layed a necessitie vpon them by his Predestination. 3.23.6,8,9.

A definition of Predestination. 3.23.8.

A confusion of them which gather of the doctrine of Predestination, that God hath respect of persons. 3.23.10,11.

Against those hogges which vnder color of Predestination do go carelessly forward in their sinnes: and against all them which say that if this doctrine take place, all endeavoure of well working decayeth. 3.23.12.

Against them which say that this doctrine overthroweth all exhortations to godly life, it is proved by Augustine preaching hath his course, and yet the knowledge of Predestination is not hindred thereby. 3.23.13.

In this point of doctrine we must so temper our maner of teaching, that so farre as we may, we wisely beware of offence. 3.23.14.

Whereas some obey the preaching of the word of God, and other some despite it, or bee more blinded and hardened thereby, although this come to passe by their owne malice and unthankfulness, yet wee must there with also know, that this diuersitie hageth gthe upon the secret counsell of God, than which it is unlawful for to search for any further cause. 3. 24. 12, 13. 14.

An exposition of certaine places, wherein God fccmeth to deny that it commeth to passe by his ordinance that the wicked perish, but, inasmuch as against his will they wilfully bring destruction upon themselves. And there is shewed that those places make nothing against the doctrine of Predestination. 3. 14. 15. 16.

The universalneffe of the promises of salvation, maketh nothing against the doctrine of Predestination of the reprobate: and yet not without cause are they framed universally. 3. 24. 16.

Here also are confused certaine objections of the which denote this point of doctrine.

Priesthoode, Kingdom, and Prophets call office of Chrif.

That wee may knowe to what ende Christ was sent of his father, and what hee brought vs, three things are cheefely to bee considered in him, his Propheticall office, his kingdom, and his Priesthoode: and therefore is giue to him the title of Chrif (or Messiah which signifieth annointed) although hee be specially so called in respect of his kingdom. Albeit that God alway gave prophets and teachers to his Church, yet it is prooved that all the Godly looked for full light of understanding, onely at the comming of Messiah: and that hee when hee appeared was annointed a Prophet, not onely for himselfe, but also for all his body. 2. 15. 16.

As touching his kingdom, first wee must note the spiritual nature thereof, whereupon also is gathered the eternal continuance of it, which is of two forts: the one pertaineth to the whole bodie of the Church, the other is pro-der to every member: both forts are declared and plainly set forth by testimonies of scripture. 1. 15. 3.

It is declared that the profit of the kingdom of Christ cannot otherwife be perceived of vs, but when we knowledge it to be spiritual: and the same profit consisteth in two things, namely that it enricheth vs with all good things necessarie to eternal salvation, secondly, that it fortifieth vs with strength and vertue against the diuell and all his assaults. And so Christ reigneth for vs rather than for himselfe, whereupon wee are rightfully called Christians: Where it is said that at the last day hee shall yeade vp his kingdom to God and his father, and such like sayinges the same maketh nothing against the eternitie of his kingdom. 2. 15. 4, 5.

As touching his Priesthood, that the efficacie and profite thereof may come to vs, it is shewed that wee must beginne at the death of Christ. Hereupon it followeth that hee is an everlasting interceffor, by whose mediation wee obtaine favour, whereby ariseth to godly consciences boldneffe to praye, and quietneffe: finally that hee is so a prieft, that hee joyneth vs in the fellowship of so great an honour, to the ende that the Sacrifices of prayers and praise which came from vs, may bee acceptable to God. 2. 15. 6.

Promises.

Not without cause all the Promises are concluded in Christ: forasmuch as euery promise is a testifying of the lawe of God towarde vs, and none of vs is beloued of god without Christ. Neither was Naaman the Syrian, Cornelius the cauaine, nor the Eunuch to whome Philip was cauaine, without knowledge of Christ, although they had but a verie small taste to him, and

| Whether any thing happen by fortune or chaunce: Where is rehearshed the saying of Basilius Magnus, that Chaunce
The Table.

Chaunce and Fortune are wordes of heathen men: also the saying of Augustine, that he repented that hee had vied the name of Fortune. Yet those things maie bee said to happen by fortune in respect of vs, which being confidered in their nature, or weighed according to our knowledge, do seeme so, although in the secrete counsell of God they bee necessarie: Also a ll things that are to come, may be said to be happening, inasmuch as they bee uncertain to vs. 1.16.8.9.

What things are to be considered, that the doctrine of the Providence of God may be referred to a right hand, that wee haue the profit thereof: and where the causes of those things that happen, appearre not vnto vs, we must beware that wee do not thinke, that things are rolled by the sway of fortune: but wee must so reuerence his secrete judgementes, that we esteeme his will the most just cause of all things 1.17.1.

Against certayne dogges which at this daie doe barke againg the Providence of God, it is proued by the Scripture that whereas God hath so revealed his will in the lawe and the gospel that he illuminateth the minds of them that bee his with the spirite of understanding, to perceiue the mysteries therein contained, which otherwise are incomprehensible, yet the order of governing the world is called a bottomlesse depth, because when we know not the causes thereof, yet we ought reuerently to honour it. 1.17.2.

Such prophanne men doe foolishly comber themselves, when they alledge that if the doctrine of the Providence of God be true, then the praiers of the faithfull in which they aske any thing for time to come are vayne, no counsell is to be taken for things to come, and then men which do anie thing against the lawe of God, do not finne: These daungerous errors they shall awoide, which in considering the Providence of God, shall frame them selues to true modestie 1.17.3.

As concerning things to come, it is proued that the Scripture doth well joyne the aduiesements of men with the Providence of God: because wee are not hindered by his eternall deurees, but that vnder his will, we may both foresee for our selues, and order our owne things: For the knowledge of consulting and taking heede, are inspired into men by the Lordes, whereby wee maie serue his Providence, in the preseruing of oure owne life. 1.17.4.

In all sucsses of time past the will of God doeth gouerne: and yet the doers of wicked deeds are not excused, because they are accused by their owne conscience, and do not obey the will of God, but their owne lust. They are indeede the instruments of Gods providence, but so, that they finde the whole cuill in themselves, and in God is founde nothing but a lawfull vs of their cuillnesse 1.17.5. and 1.18.4.

Where also the same thing is shewed in the election of king Jeroboam, the tenne tribes forsaking the house of David, the slaughtering of the sonnes of Ahab, and in the betraying of the son of God.

A godly and holy meditation of the Providence of God, which is taught by the rule of godlinesse: first that being certainly persuaded that nothing happeneth by fortune, we alway cast our eyes to God the cheefe cause of all things: then that wee doubt not that his singular Providence watcheth for vs, whether we haue to doe with men as well cuill as good, or with his other creatures: To which vs wee must applye the promises of God in Y Y Y 2 the the scripture which testify the same, the examples whereof are rehearsed.
1.17.6.

Wee must also adioyne those testimonies of scripture which teach that all men are under the power of God, whether wee neede to get their good wills or restraine the malice of our enemies:
which last point God worketh diverse wares, sometime by taking away their wits.
sometime when he granteth them wits, his fury maketh them that dare not goe about that which they haue conceived;
and sometime also
when he suffereth them to goe about it, he breaketh their enterprizes: Vpon which knowledge necessarily followeth a thankfulnesse of mind in so prosperous successe of things. 1.17.7.

In adversitie when wee are hurt by men, is required patience and quiet moderation of mind: Which is shewed in the examples of Joseph being afflicted of his brethren:
Job persecuted of the Chaldees, and David railed upon of Semei.
If wee happen to bee distressed with any misery without the works of men, this self-same doctrine is the best remedie against impatience because the scripture testifieth, that en aduersitie also do come frö God.
1.17.8.

A Godlie man principally regarding the providence of God, yet will not leave inferior causes vnmarked.
Therefore if hee haue received a benefit of anie man, he will heartily know and confesse himselfe to bee bounde ynto him. If hee haue taken harme or done harme to any other by his negligence or want of heed, he will impute it ynto himselfe, much lesse will he excuse his owne offences. In things to come chiefly he will have consideration of inferior causes, but yet so that in determining he will not be carried away with his owne wit, but commit himselfe to the wisedome of God:
neither shall his trust so staine upon our warde helps, that hee will carelesly rest upon them if hee haue them, nor be difmaied for feare if he want them.
1.17.9.

A large description of the inestimable felicittie of a godly mind which resteth upon the providence of God; and on the other side the miserable carefulnes wherewith we must needs be distressed when the weakeflie of this earthly cottage maketh vs subiect to so manie diseases, with our life and safety is befieg with infinite dangers at home, abroad, ypon the land, in the water, by men, and by duels. 1.17.10.11.

Those places of Scripture, where it is said that God repented him: make nothing against the doctrine of Providence, forasmuch as therein (like as also when hee is said to be angrie) the scripture applying it selfe to our capacitie describeth him, not such as he is, but such as we feele him to bee. Likewise, where hee spared the Niniutes, to whom he had threatened destruction within fortie dayes: whereas hee prolonged the life of Ezekias for ma-nijears to whom he had declared preset death: because such threatenings containe an vnexpressed condition.

Which is well proved by a like example thing but that which he hath alreadie decreed with himselfe, and doeth appoint so to bee by his secrete direction. 1.18.1.

And this hath place, not onely in outward doings, but also in secret motions. For it is proved by the hardening of Pharaos and other testimonies, that God worketh even in the minde also and hearts of the wicked. Neither maketh it any thing to the contrary, that often times the worke of Satan is visd therein: For God worketh nevertheless, but after his own manner, ving a just reuenge, 1.18.2. & therefore God is not the author of finnes. Sect. 4.

They are poured guiltie of intollerable pride, which refuse his doctrine under pretencie of Modesty. A confutation of their objections when they say, that if nothing happen but with will of God, then hath he in himselfe two contrary wilis, forasmuche as he doth appoint those things to be done by his secret counsell, which hee hath openly forbidden by his law. And there is the word, that God doth not disagree with himself, that the wil of God is not changed, that he doth not enzie himselfe to nil that which he willeth: but whereas there is in God but one simple wil, the same to vs appeareth divers, because for the weaknesses of our understanding, we conceive not how he diversly both willeth not, and willeth one selfe thing to be done. Finally it is proved by Augustine, that man sometime with good will willeth something which God willeth not: and sometime willeth that thing with evil will, which God willeth with good will 1.18.3.

Those things which in the life of men are compted chance, as well of prospectie as adversitie are so many tokens of the heavenlye providence, 5.7. & ought to awaken vs to the hope of the life to come. Sect. 9.

How God worketh in the hearts of them that are his, and Satan in them that be his, but yetso, that they are not excused. 2.4.1.

God worketh also in the wicked, & euyn in the same worke wherein Satan worketh, and yet is not God so said to be the author of sinne, neither is Satan or the wicked excused; but there is difference betweene the one and the other, both in the end and manner of doing. 2.4.2.5.

The olde writers oftentimes referred these things, not to the working of God, but to his foreknowledge or sufferance, least the wicked shoulde thereby take occasion to speake irreverently of the workes of God. But the Scripture, when it saith that God blindeth, hardeneth, and such like, declarcth somewhat more than a sufferance: although God doth worke two ways in the reprobate, namely by forsaking them, and taking his spirite from them, & also by deliverings them to Satan the minister of his wrath. 2.4.3.4.

The ministerie of Satan is visd to stirre forward the reprobate, whomsoever the Lord by his providence directeth them hither or thither. 2.4.5.

Purgatory.

Wee ought not to winke at the doctrine of Purgatorio, forasmuch as it is a damnable invention of Satan which maketh voide the crose of Christ, &c. 3.5.6.

An exposition of certaine places of Scripture which the Papistes doe wrongfully wrest to the confirmation of their Purgatorio. 3. 5, 7, 8, 9.

An aunswer to the object of the Papists, that it hath beene an ancien tage of the Church that prayers should be made for the dead. Where is shewed that this was done by them in the olde time, without the worde of God, by a certaine wrongfull imit. ation, lest Christians if they were slow in having care of funerals & the dead, ought seem worse than heathen men.
Yet herein was a great difference be twixt this slippage of these old men, and the obstinate error of the Papists.

Redeemer Christ.

The knowledge of God the Cretor is unprofitable vnto vs, vnsle.
 faith do also follow, setting him foorth in Christ a father and Redeemer to vs, and this doctrine from the beginning of the worlde in all ages hath bin helden among the Children of God.
2. 6. 1.

It is prooved by diverse arguments and testimonies of scripture, that the happie state of the Church hath al-way beene grounded upon the person of Christ. For both the first adoption of the chosen people, and the preserving of the Church, the deliverance of them in perils, and the reftoring after their dissipation, did alway hang upon the grace of the mediator. And the hope of all the Godly was never repose any other where than in Christ. 2. 6. 2, 3, 4.

It is to be diligently considered how Christ hath fulfilled the office of Re-deeemer, that wee may finde in him all things necessarie for vs, fith (as Ber-naed faith) he is to vs light, meat, oyle, salt, &c. 2. 16. 1.

An exposition howe wee should say that God was our enemy vntil he was reconcile to vs by Christ, whereas to give Christ to vs, and to preuent vs with marche, were signes of the loute wherewith he before embraced vs.
And there is shewed that the scripture vseth this speach and such other, to apply it selue to our capacicie, and yet it doeth not the same falsely. And at this is prooved by the authoritative of scripture and the testimonie of Augustine.

Regeneration.

Against certaine Anabaptists which inuent a phrenitike intemperance in-steede of spiritual Regeneration, namely that the children of God being nowe restored into the state of innocencie, ought no more to bee care-full to bridle the lust of the flesh, but only to followe the spirite for their guide. 3. 3. 14.

where with most strong testimonies of Scripture, the doting error of the Papists is confuted, namely that when the fault is forgiven yet God retaineth the paine, which remaineth to be redeemed with satisfactions, 3. 4. 29 30. and there also is shewed y they can not scape away with their distinction betweene everlasting paine and temporal paines.

Of certaine places of Scripture wherewith they goe about to confirme their error: where is declared there are twokinds of the judgemet of God; the one of vengeance, the other of chastisement, which are wisely to be distinguished aunder 3.4.31.

The first of these, that is to say, vengeance, the faithfull have alway earnestly prayed to escape: the other that is to say chastisement, they have receaved with quiet minde, because it hath a testimonie of love. And where it is saide that God is angrie with his Saints, the same is not meant of his purpose or affection to punishe them, but is spoken of the vehement feeling of sorowe wherewith they are striken so soone as they beare any parte of his seueritie: and this is profitable for them. On the other side the reprobate, when they are striken with the scourges of God, do already after a certaine manner begin to feel the paines of his judgement. All which things are prooved by testimonies of the Scripture, and also by the expostions of Chrysostome and Augustine 3.4.32.33.

God when hee had forgiven the adulterie of David, chastified him both for common example, and also to humble him: and for this reason hee daylie maketh the faithfull (to whom hee is mercifull) subject to the common miseries of this life. 3. 4.35.

An exposition of the article of the Creede, concerning remission of sins. 4.1.20.21.

The keys were giuen to the church, to forgive sinnes, not onely to men at their first conversion to Christe, but to the faithfull all their life long. 4.1.22.

This doctrine is prooved by testimonies of Scripture against the N ocatians and certaine of the Anabaptists which saie that the people of God are by baptism regenerate into an angelike life, and afterward there remaineth no pardon for them that fall 4. 1. 23.24 25.26.27.

A confusion of them which make a voluntary transgression of the lawe a sinne unpardonable 4.1.28.

Repentance.

Repentance commeth of faith, and goeth not before it. 3.3.7.

A confusion of their reasons, which thinke otherwise, but hereby is not signified anie space of time wherein faith breetheth repentance: but only is shewed that no man can earnestly endeavour himselfe to Repentance vnlesse he know himselfe to be Gods. Of the error of certaine Anabaptists, Iesuits, and such other which appoint to their nouices, certaine daies for repentance 3.3.2.

Certaine learned men long before this time, made two partes of Repentance, namely Mortification, which they commonly call contrition, & Visitacion which they wrongfully expounde to bee comfort by the feeling of the mercie of God: where as it rather signifieth a desire to live wel. 3.3.3.

They do also make two other partes of Repentance, the one of the lawe, the other of the Gospel where also are shewed examples of either sort out of the Scripture. 3.3.4.

YYy 4 Atrue
A true definition of Repentance taken out of the Scripture, And how Repentance though it cannot be secured, yet ought to be distinguished from faith 3.3.5.

A plainer declaration of the definition of Repentance: where first is shewed that there is requiring a turning to God, that is to say, an alteration, not onely in outward works, but also in the soule it selfe: 3.3.6. then that it proceedeth of an earnest fear of God: Where also is intreated of the sorrowfulness that is according to God 3.3.7.

Thirdly, that saying is declared that Repentance consisteth of two partes, the mortification of the flesh, and the quickening of the spirit. 3.3.8.

Both these things doe wee obtaine by partaking of Christ, the first by communicating of his death, the second of his resurrection. Therefore, Repentance is a newe forming of the image of God in vs, and a restoring into the righteousness of God by the benefit of Christ: And this restoring is not fulfilled in vs in one moment. 3.3.9.

But there remaineth in all the saints, while they live in mortall bodie, matter of strife with their flesh, and so thought all the Ecclesiastical writers that haue beene of sounde judgement: and specially Augustine, which calleth this nourishment of euill and disease of lustfulling in the elect, weakenesse, and sometime sinne: And indeed it is sinne. 3.3.10.

This is confirmed by the testimonie of Paul, and by the summe of the commandements. Whereas it is said that God cleanseth his Church from all sinne, the same is spoken rather of the guiltines of sinne than of the matter of sinne itselfe, which ceaseth not to dwell in the regenerate (but ceaseth to reigne in them) though it be not imputed. 3.3.11.

A declaration of the seuen causes or effects, or partes or aections of Repentance, which Paul reheareth. Those be studie or carefulnesse, excusing, displeasure, fear, desire, zeal, revenge. Whereunto also is added out of Paul, and declared by an excellent admonition of Bernard, that in such revenge we must keepe a measure. 3.3.15.

The fruities of Repentance are, devotion towarde God, charitie towarde men, holinesse and purenesse in all our life: but all these ought to begin at the inward affection of the heart, from whence outward testimonies may afterward spring forth: Where also is spoken of certaine outward exercises of Repentance, which the olde writers seeme to enforce somewhat too much. 3.3.16.

Turning of the heart to God, is the chief point of Repentance: lack-cloth and athes, weeping and fasting, were vsed of them in the olde time before Christ, as tokens of publike repentance: of which the two last may yet bee vsed to appease the wrath of God in the miserable times of the Church. 3.3.17.

The name of Repentance or penance is not improperly drawn from his natural sense to this outward profession. Publike confession is not alway necessarie in sinnes: but private confession to God may never be omitted, wherein wee ought to confesse, not only those things that we have lately committed, but the displeasure of our grieuous fall ought also to call vs backe to remembrance of our past offences. Of speciall penance which is required of hainous offenders and certain other: and of the ordinary penance which the children of God, etc.
the most perfect, ought to vie all their life long; 3.3.18.

God doth therefore freely justify the that be his, that he may also with the Sanctification of his Spirit restore them into true righteousness; therefore John Christ and the Apostles preached Repentance and remission of sins. The effect of which saying is declared 3.3.19.

Christians ought to exercise themselves in a continual Repentance, and he hath most profited, that hath learned most to dislike himself; 3.3.20.

Repentance is a singular gift of God, unto which he calleth all men, which he giueth to all them whom he purposeth to save, and which the Apostle pronounceth that it shall never be given to willful apostates whose wickedness is unpardonable; y is to saie, such as have sinned against the holy ghost 3.3.1.

Although sained repentance doeth not please God, yet he sometime for a season spareth hypocrites which make a shew of some conversion, which he doth not for their sakes, but for common example, that we may learn more cheerfully to give our minde to vnfaied Repentance: And this is proved by the examples of Ahab, Esau, and the Israelites. 3.3.25.

The School: Sophisters do fowly er in those definitions which they make of Repentance, and no better do they diuide it, when they part it into contrition of heart, confession of mouth, and satisfaction of worke: Where is entreated of certaine questions which they moue, whereupon is easily gathered, that they babble of thinges which they know not, when they speake of Repentance. 3.4.1.

When they require those three things in Repentance, they must needes binde themunto forgiuencesse of sinnes: And if it be so, then are we most miserable, forasmuch as we can never haue quietnes of conscience, which is proved first in that contrition of heart such as they require. 3.4.2.

There is great difference betweene the doctrine of such contrition, & that contrition which the Scripture requireth of sinners, y they truly hunger and thirst for the mercy of God; 3.4.3.

In what sense the old writers thought that solemn penance, which was then required for haynous offences, might no more be estioones done than Baptize. 4.1.29.

Reason of Man.

Mans understanding is not so to bee condemned of perpetual blindnes, that wee leaue it no whit of understanding in any kinde of thing: but it hath some knowledge inasmuch as he is naturally carried with desire to search out truth. And yet this desire by and by falleth into vanitie, because the minde of man can not for dulness, kepe the right way to search out truth, and for the moste parte he discerneth not of what thinges it is behouefull for him to seek the true knowledge. 2.1.12.

As touching earthly things, it is proved by examples, y the minde of man hath a sharpe understanding, as first of all in civil policy and in governance of householde, yet every man understandeth that the fellowshipes of men must be holden together by lawes, and comprehended in minde the principles of those lawes. 2.2.13.

Also in liberal artes & handy crafts for learning whereof, yea for amplifying and garnishing of the lame, there is in man a certayne aptnesse, although some bee more apt than other. But the light of Reason and understanding in me, is so a general good qualitie in all men, that yet it is a free gift.
The Table.

Gift of God's liberalitie towards euerie man which thing God heueth when he createth some Idiotes and dull witted: also when hee maketh one man to excell in sharpe inuention, an other in judgement, an other in quickenesse of minde, againe when hee powreth into men singular motions according to euery mans calling, and according to the time & matter that is to bee done 2.2.14.17.

The inuention of artes, the orderly teaching or depee & excellent knowledge thereof, which appeare to haue bin in the olde Lawyers, Philosophers, Philistians, being prophane men, doe declare unto vs that the minde of men howe much focuer it bee fallen from his first vprightnesse, is yet still garnished with excellent giftes of God. 2.2.15.

They are the gifts of the holy Ghoste which the Lorde giueth to whome hee will, euem to the vngodly for the publike benefit of mankind. Therefore we ought to vse them although they bee communicate vnto vs by the ministrie of the wicked, to whoso they are but transitorie and fleeting, because they are without the founde foundation of truth. 2.2.16.

It is shewed in the first two poyntes, that mans Reason seeth nothing that concerneth the kyndome of God and heavenly matters, which are contained in three things, that is to say, to knowe God, his fatherly favoure towards vs, and the way to frame our life according to the rule of his law. 2.2.18. and to that purpofe are alledged diverse testimonies of Scripture. See 19.20.21. In the third it seemeth that he hath some more understanding than in the other, forasmuch as man is instruited by the lawe of nature to a right rule of life. But such knowledge is vnderperfect in the vnbeleeuere, and ayayleth to no other ende, but to make them vnexcusable: neither doe they by that natural light, see the truthe in euerie thing. And here is expounded the saying of Themistius, that understanding is veuerfall definition is seldom deceived, but the error is when it descendeth to particular causes, and there is shewed, that mans vnveuerfall judgemen in the difference of good and euill, is not alway found and vpright. For it attaineth not those which are the chiefe things in the first table of the lawe, namely of confidence in God &c. In the seconde table, although it have some more understanding, yet it appeareth that it sometime errith: as when it judgeth that it is an abfurditie to suffer too imperious governement, and not to revenge wronges: also it knoweth not the decease of desire in the whole obervation of the lawe. 2.2.22.23.24.

It is proued by the Scripture, that the sharpnesse of our reason in all the partes of our life, is nothing before the Lord, and our mindes doe escape the grace of enlightning, not onely at the begining, or for one day, but at euerie moment 2.2.25.

Resurrection of Christ.

Without the Resurrection of Christ all is vnderperfecte that wee beleue concerning his croffe, Death, and Buriall. The Article concerning the last Resurrection containeth a doctrine of great weight, grave & hard to beleue: for the overcomning of which hardneffe by faith, the Scripture giveth two helps, the example of Christ, and the almightinesse of GOD. 3.25.3.4.

Sabbath.

An exposition of the fourth commandment, the end thereof, and the three causes whereupon wee must note that it consisteth. 2.8.28.

The first cause is a shadowing of spiritual rest, that is to say, of our sanctification: This is prooued by diverse places to have beene the chief thing in the Sabbath.2.8.29.

Why the Lorde appointed the seventh day.3.8.30.31.

This part, forasmuch as it was removed, is taken away by the death of Christ.2.8.31.

The two later causes, that is to say, that there should be certaine dayes appointed for assemblies in the Church, and that there should be given to servants a rest from their labor, do serve for all ages.2.8.32.

Of dayes of meeting in the Church to heare the word of God & common prayers: Where is spoken of obseruing of the sunday, 2.8.32.33. and of superstition to be avoided in this behalfe.2.8.34.

Sacraments.

What is a Sacrament 4.14.1.

For what reason the olde writers vsed this word in that sense.4.14.2.13.

A Sacrament is never without a promise going before, which the Lord sealeth by that mean, wherein hee provideth helpe for our ignorance & dulnesse, & also for our weakness.4.14.3.5.6.11.

A sacrament consisteth of y word & the outward signe: But the Sacramentall word is to be taken otherwise than the Papitises thinke.4.14.4.

Sacraments cease not to bee testimonies of the grace of God, although they bee given also to the wicked, which doe gather to them snares more grievous damnation thereby.4.14.7.

Our faith is so confirmed by sacraments, that yet it hangeth upon the inward effectuall working of the spirite, 4.14.9.10.11. and no vertue is to be put in the creatures. Sect.12.

cerament, whereby is proued y though God in Sacramentes doe truly offer Chritste, yett wycked receive nothing but the Sacrament, that is to say, the outward signe. 4.14.15.16.

Wee must not thinke that there is ioyned or fastened to the Sacraments any secreate vertue, whereby they by themselves doe giue vs the graces of the holy Ghost. 4.14.17.

In the olde tyme God gaue vnto his people some Sacramentes in miracles, and some in natural things. And there is spoken of the tree of life and of the raynebowe 4.14.18.

Sacramentes are on the Lords behalfe testimonies of grace & saluation, and on our behalfe tokens of our profession. 4.14.19.

The Sacraments of the old Church vnder the Lawe, tended to the same ende that our Sacramentes doe, that is to say, Christe: whome yet our Sacraments doe more plainely represent. Wherefore the Scholemens doctrine is to be reiectt, which say, that y olde Sacraments did shewe a shadow of the grace of God, and ours doe giue it presently. 4.14.20, 21, 22, 23. &c.

The five falsely called Sacraments.

When wee denye those five to bee Sacramentes, which are inuented by men, wee striue not about the name but the thing: because the papistes will have them to bee visible forms of invisible grace. 4.19.1.

Many reasons are brought, why it is not lawfull for men to make Sacraments. Also there is a difference to bee put betwecne Sacraments, & other ceremonies. 4.19.2.

The number of seuen Sacramentes cannot bee proued by the authoritie of the olde Church. 4.19.3.

Although the olde Church vnder the law, had mos Sacramets, yet at this day, the Christian church ought to bee content with those two, which Christe hath ordaine: And it is not lawfull for men to make other, nor to adde vnto these any thing of their owne. 4.18.20.

Sacrifices.

A difference betwecne the Sacrifices of Moses his Lawe, and the supper of the Lord in the Christias church 4.18.11.

What the name of a sacrifice properly signifieth : and of the diverse kindes of sacrifices vnder the lawe: which may be divied into two sortes, wherof some may be called of thankgiuing, and other some propitiatory or of cleansing. 4.18.13.

Our onely propitiatory sacrifice, is the death of Christe. Sacrifices of thanksgiuing wee have many, as all the dutie of charite, prayers, prayer-giving of thankes, and all that wee do to the worshipping of God. 4.18.13. 16.17.

This manner of Sacrificing is dayly vfed in the church, & in the supper of the Lorde: And thereupon all Christians are Sacrificing Priests.

Satisfaction Papistical.

Offatisfaction, which they make the third thing in penaunce, of retaying the paine, the fault being forgiuen, and such like lies, which all are overthrown, by setting against the free forgiueneffe of sinnes, by the name of Christe. 5.4.25.

A confutation of the blasphemous error of the Schoolemen, y forgiueneffe of sinnes, and reconciliation is once done in baptisme, but after baptisme, we must rite againe by satisfactions. 3.4.26.

By such errour, Christ is spoild of his honor, & the peace of conscientes is troubled, forasmuch as they can never certainly determine, that their sinnes are forgiuen them. 3.4.27.
The Table.

In Daniel, when Nabuchadnefer is commanded to redeem his finnes with righteousnesse, that same redeeming is referred to God, rather than to men, and the cause of pardon is not there set forth, but rather the manner of true conversion. The same is to bee sayd of certaine other places of Scripture. 3.4.36.

An expostion of that place in the Gospel, Manie finnes are forgiven her, because she hath ioned much: Meaning that love is not the cause, but the prooфе of forgiveness. 3.4.37.

The olde writers of the church did not speake of satisfactions in such sence as the papists doe; for they understand that the penitent do make satisfaction to the Church, and not to God. 3.4.38.39.

Scripture, the VVorde of God, and the aut horitie thereof.

Men do not sufficiently knowe God the creator, and discern him from fained goddes, by consideration of his creatures, vnlesse they be also holpen by the light of his worde. And God hath kept this order in teaching them that belius, not onely since that he chose the Iewes for his pecu liar people, but also from the beginning, even towarde Adam, Noe, and the other fathers. 1.6. 1.

Either by oracles, or by visions, or by the ministerie of other, the fathers had the worde which they were certain ly persuaded to be the worde of God, whereby they knewe the true GOD the creator and governor of all things which worde afterwarde, that bee might provide for men in all ages, he causeth to be written in the law and the Prophectes, as it were in publike registeres. 1.6.2.3. in which place also is proved by testimonies of Scripture, that the doctrine of the worde, must bee ioyned to the consideration of creatures, leas we conceive a fickle knowledge of God.

Of them which sate that the authoritie of Scripture hanger uppon the judgement of the church, & in how ill case we should be, if it were fo. 1.7.1.

This errore is well confuted by the place of Paul in the second chapter to the Ephesians, where hee saith that the faithfull are builded vpon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophete. 1.7.2.

In what sense Augustine sayeth, that he would not have beleued the Gospel, vnlesse the authoritie of his church did move him: which place they doe cauilly fight to the confirmation of their errore. 1.7.3.

Although there be many other argumentes, which do proue, yea, do enforce the wicked to confesse, that the Scripture came from God, yet by none other meanes, than by the secter testimonie of the holy Ghost, our hearts are truely perswaded that it is GOD, which speake in the lawe, in the prophets, and in the gospell. And this is proued by many places of Fahte. 1.7.4. 5.

The orderly disposition of the wil deme of God, the doctrine fauering nothing of earthliness, the goodly agreement of all the partes among themselves, and specially that basenesse of contemptible wordes, yttering the high mysteries of the heavenlye kingdom, are seconde helps to stablish the credit of Scripture. 1.8.1.2.11.

Also the antiquitie of the Scripture, whereas the books of other religions, are later than the books of Moses, which yet doeth not himselse invent a newe God, but setteth forth to the Israelites, the God of their fathers. 1.8.3.4.

The Table.

depaint out God vnto vs, such doth ye Scripture set him forth, ye is to say, eternall, full of goodness, clemency, mercy, righteousness, judgement and truth; and also to the same end. 1. 10. 1. 2.

What is to be thought of the power of the Church in exposition of Scripture. 4. 9. 13.

The Romish doctours do wrongful-ly abuse this colour to the confir mation of their errors and blasphemies. 4. 9. 14.

Of Singing in the Church.

Voyice and Singing auide nothing in prayer, without affection of the hart. 3. 20. 31. 33.

Of the vlage of Singing in Churches 3. 20. 32.

Single life.

Their shamefacedneffe which doe set forth the comlines of Single life for a thing necessarie, to the great reproche of the old church. By what degrees this tyranny crept into the Church: and how it cannot be defended by the presence of certaine olde canons. 4. 12. 16, 27. 28.

Priestes were forbidden to marrie by wicked tyranny, and against the word of God, and against all equity. 4. 12. 23.

An aunciere to the aduersaries ob-ceion, that the priest must by some marke differ from the lay people. 4. 12. 24.

The blasphemy of the pope, saying that mariage is desiligne & vnclenes of the flesh. 4. 12. 24.

It is fond to defend the forbidding of mariage with the examples of the Leviticall Priestes, which when they should go into the sanctuary lay alunder from their wives. 4. 12. 25.

Sinne.

A confutation of Platoes saying, that men Sinne not but by ignorance: also of their opinion which say that in all Sinnes there is an adulised malice & frowardnes. 2. 2. 22. 23. 25.

Against the faule imagination of the Sophistors concerning veniall sinnes, which they call desiries without a determined affent, which doe not long rest in the heart: it is proved that every sine, eoue the lighteft desire defuereth death, and is deadly, except in the faintes which obtaine pardon by the mercie of God. 2. 8. 58. 59.

A confutation of their fonde distinction between deadly & veniall sinnes, and of their felaunder when they say that wee make all sinnes equall. 3. 4. 28.

Howe it is to bee expounded, that God visiteth the iniquitie of Fathers upon the children vnto the third and fourth generation: and whether such reuengement bee vnfeemly for the righteousnesse of GOD. 2. 8. 19, 20.

Sinne against the holy goff.

The true definition of Sin against the holy Ghost, and examples thereof out of the Scripture. 3. 3. 22.

It is not one or another particular falling, but a generall forsaking, the description wherof is declared by the Apostle. Neither is it any manuell if God will bee alwayes vnappaseable to them that haue fo fallen. 3. 3. 23. for al-much as he promiseth pardon only to them that repent, which they thin ke never doe. And though the Scripture doe say that some such haue groned and cried, yet that was not repentance or conversion, but rather a blind torment by desperation. 3. 3. 24.

Of the Soul.

That the Soule or Spirit of man is not only a breath, but an immortall substance, although it were created, is proved by conscience, by the knowledge of God, and by so many excellent gifts wherwith the minde of man is
A description taken out of Bernard, of the miseries of a faithfull soule, being considered as it is in itself and of it selfe: and on the other side, of the assured glorying of a faithfull soule in Christ, which blotteth out all her worthinesse. 3.2.25.

Superstition.
The simplicy of the Superstitious doeth not excuse them, because their blindness is founde to be mingled with vanitie, pride, and obstinacy. 1.4.1.5.

When superstition goeth about to please God, it mocketh him with lying colours. 1.4.3.

The superstitious do not approach into God but against their will and with scruple scare. 1.4.4.

Whosoever do corrupt the true religion, although they follow the current of antiquitie or the custome of any citie, yet they depart from the one and true God. 1.5.12.

It is praised by the etymologie of the wordes Superstition, Religion, Eusebeia or godliness, what difference is betweene Religion and superstition. 1.12.1.

The craft of superstition, when granting the chiefe place to the one God, it beseteth him with a rout of smaller Gods. 1.12.1.3.

Suppkr of the Lord.
Of the bread and wine the signes in the holy supper: and it is declared by his owne words at his Supper, why the Lorde willed that wee should use them. 4.17.1.

Wee gather a great fruit of confidence & sweetenesse out of this sacrament, which testifieth that we are so grown togetherto one body with Christ, that whatsoever he doth, wee may lawfully call it ours. 4.17.2.

This is declared by the worde of the Supper. 4.17.3.
The chiefe office of the sacraments is not to give vnto vs the bodie of Christ without any higher consideration; but rather to seeke that promis wherein hee testifieth that his flesh is verie meat. 4.17.4.

The supper maketh not Christ then first to beginne to be the bread of life, but that wee should eate the force of his bread. He once gave his flesh for the life of the world, and daily gueth it to the be his. Wee must beware that we do not too much abace or aduice the signes. The eating of the flesh of Christ is not faith, but rather the effect of faith. 4.17.5.

So thought Chrysostome & Augustine: and in what sense Augustine saide, that in beleewing we eate the flesh of Christ. 4.17.6.

They doe not say enough, which passing over the mention of flesh and bloud, doe thinke that wee are made partakers onely of the spirit of Christ. The mysterie of the supper is so great, that neither the tongue can expresse with speaking, nor the heart comprehend with thinking the greatnes thereof. 4.17.7.

How farre the perfect communica-ting of Christ exendeth. Where is declared that Christ, which from the beginning was the life guing worde of the father, made the flesh which hee tooke upon him to be also life guing to vs. 4.17.8,9.

The faithfull doe truely eate of the same flesh how great distance of places focuer there be betwene them and it. 4.17.10.

The mysterie of the Supper consisteth of two things, the bodily signes, and the spiritual truth. Which spiritual truth conteneth three things, signification, matter, and effect. 4.17.11.

Of the transubstantiation of bread and wine into the body and bloud of Christ, which the craftesmen of the court of Rome have forged. 4.17.12,13. &c. and 20.

They are without testimonie of antiquitie. And in what sense the olde writers saide, that in the consecration is made a secrete turning. Also the signification of the Supper agreeth nor, vnlesse the substance of the outwarde signes remaine. 4.17.14.

The breade is a sacrament to none but to men to whom the worde is directed. And here are confusi d certain arguments of the teachers of transubstantiation. 4.17.15.

Of some men, which though they doe at one worde grant that the substance of the signes remaineth, yet placing the bodie of Christ in bread and under bread, they fall backe into the local presence, & faine a being every where. 4.17.16,17,18,20.

A confutation of their objections 4.17.21,22,23, &c.

It is proved that this doctrine is not maintained, neither by the testimonies of Augustine, nor by authoritie of scripture. 4.17.19,20,30,31.

A confutation of other secon of their objections, and cheefely of this that they say, that what focuer wee teache of spiritual eating, is against the true and real eating: where also is declared that the bodie of Christ is in the Supper offered to the infidels, but they receaue it not. 4.17.33.

Neither can the sayings of Augustine be drawn to this purpose, that the sacraments are nothing appared by the infidels of men, Which is proved by divers other testimonies of the same man. 4.17.34.

How the body and bloud of Christ is giuen to vs in the Supper, and what manner of presence of Christ we ought to holde therein. 4.17. 18. 19. 32.
Of the exposition of the wordes of Christ in the Supper. 4.17. 20. 21.
The body of Christ is conteined in quantitie, and comprehended in heauen, vntil the last day, as it is proued by the scriptures. 4.17. 26. 27.
Of the papistes carnall adoration, & concomitance, & consecration of the host (as they call it) and carrying it a bout in pompe. 4.17. 35. 36. 37.
The mysterie of the Supper ought to stirre vs vp to giuing of thanks, to exercise vs in remembring the death of Christ, to kindle vs to holinesse of life, and chiefly to charitie. 4.17.
37. 38.
In the papacie the Supper (the true ministration whereof is not without the word) is turned into a dumme accion. And heres is spoken of the laying vp of the Sacrament to be extraordinarily distributed to sicke men. 4.17. 1. 39.

The doctrine of the papistes, when they goe about to prepare men to the worthinesse of eating the bodie of Chrift, death in cruell wife torment consciencs: And the diuel could not by any readier way destroy men. Of the best remedie to auyde this destruction. They erre which in the super doe require of the faithfull perfecion of faith. 4.17. 41. 42.
Astouching the outward vsage of the ministration of the Supper, there amany things indifferent: And how it ought to be ministred most comely.
4.17. 43.
Of the small assemblie at this day at the partaking of the Supper, which is a token of contempt, wherewith the holy fathers in olde time were much displeased: And howe the custome which commanadeth men to comminate once every yere, was a most certaine invention of the diuell. 4.17.
44. 45. 46.
It is proued by authoritie of the scripture & by vifage of the old Church, 4ouer hundred yeres before the death of Gregorie, and by many other argu-mentes, that the constitution which tocke away from lay men the cup of the Lord, came out of the diuels workshop. 4.17. 47. 48. 49. 50.
Of the concomitance of the bloud in the flesh of Chrift, which is a popifh inuention. 4.17. 47.
The Supper of the Lord is profanely abused, if it be given to al men without choice. Of the dutie of ministers in reiefing the vnworthie. 4.12. 5.
A briefe sum of those things which we ought to know concerning the two Sacraments.  And why the Supper is oftenimes ministred, & Baptisme but once. 4.18. 19.

Swearing.
An exposition of the thirde commaundement, in which these three things are conteined, that wee neither think nor speake any thing of God, nor of his wordes and honorable mysteries, nor yet of any of his works, otherwise than reverently. 2. 8. 22.
A definition of Swearing: where is declared that it is a kind of worshippping of God: And therfore wee must beware that our owne contenite nor any dishonour to the name of God, which is done in Forswearing: or any contempt of it, which is done in superfluous othes, or in which y name of any other than God is vfed. 2. 8. 23. 24. 25.
It is proued by Scripture against the Anabaptists: that alothes are not for-bidden vs, that Chrift in the Gospell changed nothing, as touching the rule of Swearing, set forth in the lawe. 2. 8.
26. Which is proued by his owne example: and not onely publike, but also private othes are permitted, keeping the moderation which the lawe com-mandeth. 2. 8. 27.
The Table.

T. Temples.

Of Temples of Christian men for assemblies of the congregation. 3. 20. 30.

It is proved by the authority of the old Church, and the reasons of Augustine, that it is not expedient, that there should be any images in Christian temples. 1. 11. 13.

The preaching of the word, and the Sacraments, are lively images which only are fit to be in Christian Temples. 1. 11. 17. 15.

The wickedness of the Nicene Synod which was holden by the commandment of Irene the Empresse, and the filthy follies therof in allowing images in Temples, and the worshipping of them. 1. 11. 14. 15. 16.

Of the garnishing of Temples and holy things in the old Church. 4 4 8. and 4 5. 18.

Temptations.

Of divers kinds of Temptations: and in what sense it is said that God tempted vs. 3 20. 46.

Testament, old, and new.

Of the likenesse of the old, and new Testament: Where is declared, that they are all one in substance and matter, but only do differ in ministration. The likenesses standeth chiefly in three points. 2. 10. 12.

The first point is, that the old Testament did not hold the fathers in earthly felicity, but had chiefe regard to the life to come. Which is proved by Paul, which faith that the promises of the Gospel are contained ynder it. 2. 10. 3.

The same also is proved by the law and the Prophets: First, by considering the words of the covenant: I am your God. 2. 10. 7, 8.

A conclusion of this point with rehearsing certain testimonies out of the new Testament, Sect. 23.

The second point is, that the old Testament did not stand upon the merits of men, but upon the free mercy of God. The third point is, that the couenant of the fathers with God, did then stand upon like knowledge of Christ the mediator. 2. 10. 4.

Also in signification of Sacraments the Israelites under the law were equal with the Christian people. 2. 10. 5, 6.

There are foure differences of the old Testament from the new, which unto we may add a fift. The first is, that although in the old time also the Lordes will was to direct the soules of his people to the heavenly inheritance: Yet to the ende that they might be the better nourished in the hope thereof, he gave it them to be holden, and after a certaine manner tasted under earthly benefits. But nowe the grace of the life to come, being more clearly revealed by the Gospel, hee directeth our mindes the straighth way to the meditation thereof, leaving the inferior manner of exercising which he used among the Israelites. 2. 11. 1.

Therefore the old Church is compared to an heire under age, which is governed by Gardians. 2. 11. 2.

For this reason, the fathers so much esteemed this life, and the blessings thereof. 2. 11. 3.

The second difference is in figures ZZ 22 where-
The Table.

wherewith the old testament did shew forth the image and shadowe of spiritual good things. The newe testament giueth the present true and perfect bodie. There is also a reason shewed why the Lord kept this order: And a definition of the old testament.

2.11.4.

In this sense it is sayde, that the Iewes were by the introduction or schooling of the lawe led vnto Christ: before that hee was deliuered in the flesh 2.11.5. which appeared in the most excellent Prophets that were endued with singular grace of the spirit. Sect. 6.

The third difference, is taken out of the one and thirtie Chapter of Ieremia, and the third chapter of the second Epistle to the Corinthians, that the olde testament is literall, and the newe testament is spirituall: the olde bringeth death, the new is the instrument of life 2.11.7.8.

The fourth difference is, that the Scripture calleth the olde Testament, the testament of bondage, because it engendreth feare in mens minde: but the newe is called the Testament of liberty, because it raiseth them vp to confidence and suretie. The three latter differences are comparisons of the law and the Gospell. The first containeth also the promises made before the law. The fathers lived so vnder the law and the old testament, that they staied not there, but alwaies aspired to the new, yea and embraced a certaine communicating thereof 2.11.9.10.

The fifth difference is, that before the comming of Christ, the Lorde had severed one nation, in which he would keepe the covenant of his grace, in the meane time neglecting all other nations. So the calling of the Gentiles is a certaine signe, wherewith the excellencie of the newe Testament is set forth above the olde: a thing so incredible, that it seemed ye ner new to the Apostles them selves, being exercised in reading of the Prophets, and endued with the holy Ghost. 2.11.11.12.

A conclusion of this matter, and an answer to divers obiections of some men, which saie that this variety in the Church, this diverse maner of teaching, so great change of vsages and ceremonies, is a great absurdite. Where is declared that the constancy of God appeareth in this changing, and hee hath done nothing but wisely, righteously, & in mercie, when he governeth his Church, after one sort in childhood and after another sort in riper age, & also when hee did keepe close in one people the shewing forth of his grace before the comming of Christ, which afterward hee poured forth vpon all nations 2.11.13.14.

Thefts.

An expostion of the eight Commandment: where is intreated of divers kindes of theftes, and some which although men judge otherwise, yet are accounted Thefts before God. And so hee that doeth not performe that which by the office of his calling he oweth to other, is a theefe. 2.8.45.

What wee ought to doe, that we make obie this commandment, is shewed by divers examples according to the diversitie of persons and offices. 2.8.46.

Traditions.

Forasmuch as the Lorde, willing to teache a rule of true righteousness, hath drawn all the partes thereof to his owne wil, thereby it appeareth, that all the good works which men devise of their owne witnes, are nothing worth before him: But the true worshipping standeth vpon obedience onlie, which is the beginning, mother, and
and preferer of al vertuæ 2,8,5.

Of traditions of men, that is to say, ordinances proceeding from men, concerning the worshipping of God: And of the vngodlines & necessitie of them 4.10.1,2,3,5,6,7,8.

A division of Popish constitutions, which they call Traditions of the Church, into such as containe ceremonies, and other which are saide to pertaine to discipline. The wickednes of both fortes, because they place the worship of God in them, and consciences are bounde with prettie necessitie of them 4.10.9.

For them the commandement of God is made voide 4.10.10.

A true marke of mens traditions, which ought to bee receive of the Church, and of all Godly men. 4.10.16.

A confutation of such pretence which some men use that defende popish Traditions to be of God, because the Church cannot erre, and is governed by the holy Ghost 4.10.17.

It is a meere mockerie to say, that the Apostles were authors of the Traditions, wherewith the Church hath heretofore beene oppressed 4.10.18, 19,20.

The example of the Apostles, when they command the Gentiles to abstaine from thinges offered vnto Idols, from strangled, and from bloud, is falsely alleaged to excuse the tyrannie of the Popes lawes 4.10.21, 22.

The Lords kingdome is taken fro him, when hee is worshipped with the lawes of mens Traditions: which is proued by examples and testimonies of scripture to haue always bee a most hainous offence in the sight of God 4.10.23,24.

The inventions of men cannot be defended by the example of Menoba, which being a private man offered sacrifice, nor of Samuel which sacrificed in Ramasch: 4.10.25. Nor of Christ which willed men to beare the burdens that the Scribes & Pharisees did bende together 4.10.26.

Of holy and profitable ordinances of the Church, and the ende that they tend vnto 4.10.1.

Of such ordinances of the Church as ought to be accounted holy, namely those which serve for comlienesse, or doe preferre order and peace in the Church 4.10.7,28,19. We must wisely consider, which bee of that sort 4.10.30.

It is the durtie of Christian people, to observe such ordinances: And what errors herein are to bee taken heed of: And how in the mean time, the libertie of consciences may still bee preserved sake 4.10.31,32.

Tributes.

Of Tributes, Taxes, Impostitions, and Finances, which are payed to Princes: And howe Princes may vse them with a good conscience 4.10.13.

Trinitie.

In one simple essence of God, wee must distinctly consider three persons or (as the Greekes call them Hypothes) 1.13.2.

A confutation of them which in this matter do condemn the name of person, and reiect it for newnesse 1.13.3,4,5.

The holy doctors have bee compelled to inuent certaine new words, to defende the truth of God against certaine subtill men, which mocked it out with shifting: as against Arrius they inuened this worde Homoousion Consccntiall, and against Sabellius the name of three properties or persons 1.13 4,16.

Also in the scripture there is a distaine lewd men, which say, that the into them. 1.13.23.

It is false which they say, that when

Of Warres.

Warres are lawfull, when Magistrates are driven of necessitie to take weapon in hande, to execute publike revenge upon those that trouble the peace of their dominion, whether they bee ciuill or forreigne enimies. 4.20.11.

It maketh not to the contrary hereof, which many alledge, that there is not in the new Testament anie testimonie or example which prooueth that Warre is a thing lawfull for Christians. But Magistrates ought to take great heed, that in taking of weapon in hande, they nothing at all followe their owne lustes. As Warre, so garrisons also, leagues and ciuill fortifications are things lawfull for Christians to vfe. 4.20.12.

Will of God.

Of the secret Will of God. Also of an other Will, whereunto answereareth Willing obedience. 3.20.43. and 3.24. 1.7.

Will of Man.

Whether the Will of man bee in liberty part through defiled and corrupted so that it bringeth forth nothing but cuill: Or whether it yet receiue some libertie of choise. Where is declared the common saying taken out of the Philosophers, that all things by naturall disposition cout that which is good. And there is shewed that the libertie of wil cannot be proued thereby. 2.2.26.

The soule hath not onely a weake power but no power at all of it selfe to aspire to godnes. And Sith the whole man is subiect to the dominion of sinne, it is proued by testimonies of Scripture & of Augustine, that the will of man is bounde with most streight bondes. 2.2.27.

Man by his fall lost not his Will, but the soundnesse of his Will, so that hee cannot moue, much lesse applic himselfe to goodnesse, but is necessarily drawen or led vnto cuill, howbeit not by compulsion but voluntarily. Which is proued by Augustine and Bernard. A large declaracion of the difference betweene compulsion and necessitie. 2.3.5.

Sith the Lord both beginneth and perficeth good in our heartes, Sith he worketh in vs to will, that is to say the good will, Sith he createth a new heart, takest awaie the stonic heart and giuen a fleshy heart, it followeth, that the Will of man is vitally corrupted and hath no goodnesse at all. 2.3.6.

It is cleerely proued by reason and diverse testimonies of Scripture, that God worketh good will in them that be his, not only in preparing or turning them from the beginning so as it may afterward do some good of itself. But because it is his only work that Will conceive a love of goodness, that it is inclined to the study thereof, that it is stirred and moved to an endeavor to follow it, & againe that the choise, study, and endeavor do not fail, but proceede to effect, finally that man goeth constantly forward in them and continueth to the ende.

2.3.7.8.9

Therefore it is proved by the authoritie of Scripture and of Augustine that this which hath bin taught these manie ages, that God so moueth our will, that it is afterwarde in our owne choise, to obey or disobey his motion & other like sayings are utterly false.

Also in doings, which of themselves are neither righteous nor vnrighteous, and belong rather to the bodily than the spirittuall life, the will of man is not free, but by the speciall motion of God is inclined to clemencie, mercy, wrath, feare, and other diverse affections, when it pleaseth him to make way for his prudence. Which is proved by Scripture, by dailie experience, and by the authoritie of Augustine.

A comparison of the pureness of God with all the righteousnes of men.

3.12.4.5.

All the offspring of Adam being divided into foure kindes of men, it is proved, that they have no holinesse or righteousnesse: First in them which are endued with no knowledge of God, in whom although there doe sometime appeare excellent qualities (which are the gifts of God) yet there is in them nothing pure.

2.3.4.5.6.

The same is shewed in them which being professed by Sacramentes, are Christians onelie in name, denying God in their deeds: Also in hypocrites which with vaine false colours do hide the wickednesse of their heart. 3.14.7 8.

Finally, it is proved that even the children of God truly regenerated by his spirite, can not stande by any righteousnes of their owne works before the judgement of God, because they can bring forth no good workes that is not sprinkled with some vnclennesse of the flesh, and therefore damnable. Moreover although they could bring forth any such workes, yet one sinne is enough to blot out the remembrance of all former righteousnesse. 3.14 9.10.11.

When wee entreate of workes, wee must thrust two petitions out of our mindes: that wee put noe trust in the righteousnes of our owne workes, and that we ascribe no glorie vnto them. 3.14.16.

The scripture setteth our and declareth foure kindes of causes in stablishing our saluation: And it is proved that in them all there is no regarde of workes. 3.14.17.

Where sometimes the Saintes doe bolden themselves with remembrance of their owne innocencie & vrightness; how the same is to be taken: and how it doth in no wise abate any thing from the free righteousnes in Christ. 3.14.18.19.20.

Those rewardes are giuen to the works of the faithfull, which the Lord in his law hath promised to the followers of righteousnesse: but thereof there are three causes to bee considered. 3.17.3.

We may note in the scripture two acceptances of man with God,of which the latter although it have respecte to the good workes of the faithfull, yet is also the free mercy of God. 3.17.4.5.

When it is said that God doeth good to them that love him, heere is not rehearsed a cause why hee should doe them good, but rather the maner of what sorte they bee by his grace. 3.17.6.

An exposition of certayne places wherein the scripture giueth to good workes the name of righteousnesse. And there is shewed that those places are not against the doctrine of justification of faith. 3.17.7.

One good worke or many doe not suffice for righteousnesse before God, although one sufficeth to condemne. And here the principle hath no place the contraries haue all one rule. 3.18.10.

THE ENDE OF THE TABLE.

TO THE CHRISTIAN AND STUDIOUS READERS of this Booke, Augustine Marlborate wisheth health.

He so ever shall read and peruse these two Tables following, & especially the latter, may maruell what I mean (after so manie impressions & corrections of this worke) to collect & gather at the places of holy Scripture therin allledged: & a great part of the authorities therin exponded, whereas if any fruite or profit thereof were to bee had, the same long before might have been done: and especially about three yeares past, when the author himselfe was so diligent therein: who besides the many and profitable additions (which it containeth) hee himselfe setting the same in order, with his owne handes, and reducing it to a most exact perfection did then set and publish it forth, in such sort, that in four bookees being divided into chapters and diverse sections he hath riggs right worshipful and in familiar manner, comprised the somme of the whole Christian religion. And certainelie I cannot deny but it would have bene verie good and commodious, if that anie one man would have taken the paine faithfully and troutelie to have colliected those places: which thing I thought once to have done by the aduise of the imprinter, seeing that my charge and office did else where call me, as soone when I had perused and set it in an other order than it was before, and had even finished it, I was compell'd to o"mit is, or at the least to surcease for the time. And after that this booke being put forth both in Latine and French, was set to sale in euerie place, because I saw no man (who then did take the paine to reduce the places of Scripture to a Table, and understanding how profitable the same were to so all men) could not choose but after my power, and as I was sure serues in those troublesome some times, so employ my whole care and travell therein. And because all things should be done and come forth more certaine and in better order: I would not give credite nor trust to the numbers which the imprinter had before set and made: for when I had diligently conferred them all, I founde manie false, manie omi\tiated and some disorderlie set. And seuerie that happened verie some to suche as are not best skillful in examining and persifying the places of holy Scripture to be done deceived. Wherefore all things diligently restored, and that supplied which seemed to want, I did so order the places of Scripture collected out of the old and new testament, that if there were anie through forgetfulnesse, or by anie other means omitted or overshipped: (as it cannot bee but that in a great harvest some one care of corne shall escape the reader's hande). I dryst warrant: for some shall be founde, that this Table being brought to triall, you shall not finde one much more plentifull or larger. Nevertheless I doe praze and request the reader, that if they doe finde any, they will adversifie the imprinter, whereby the same may better bee examined and corrected. And this is to be noted, that such whole verses as I have comprised in this table; they were not whole but in part alleged, much less expounded in the institution which thing I did upon good consideration. For oftentimes it happeneth that in diverse places of the institutions, some authorities are alleged, which are proved but by some part of the verse. And because in noting the places and numbers, we must use repetitions (which for the most part bring a lothfomnesse to the reader). I thought it better to put in the whole verses, than by often divisions, to use vaine and superfluous repetitions. And as concerning the commoditie which the reader may gather by this my travell (besides that which by use and experience I am taught by those Tables, which for mine owne private studie and exercise I wrote upon the institutions herebefore set forth) I darst to assure this much that they which are not exercised in enreaseing the holy Scripture, and yet deiorsome to serve the Church of God, do diligentlie endeavour themselves therto, they shall finde a large and a plaine maie, both of dextritis to expounde the writings of the Prophetses and Apostles, as also apply to apply the authorities here alleged, to suche like to the edifying of the Church, which is the verie ende of the whole. And although we was not good Commentaries to discover unto us the natural sense of the Scripture, which we do now finde and apply, yet because they who wrote the same, and who with good sucreffe have travelled therein, were contented with the plaine and sincere expostion of the same, none could tell by the vise of the saide Commentaries onelie (unless they were well practised in the principles of religion) howe and so what common place they ought to apply the argument then in hande. But who can so be contented to use this Table, whensoever he shall finde the places which bee entreateth, he shall see howe and so what ende the same is to be applied, whether to the confirmation of true doctrine, or to the conquering of the adversaries, or to the reconciling of such places as seeme to be repugnent. And
The Preface.

And this shall be more commodious and profitable, not only to the amplifying of any argument, but also to satisfy them, which are desirous to be confirmed in the principal points of Christian Religion. For it is manifest, how simple and slender is their oration and speech, which bring and allage nothing else, but as they read in the Commentaries: where the authors themselves, being most worthy and well learned, do chiefly desire brevity, because the readers should use and study the common places themselves, to the end, that they should the more largely be applied to those things which in the Commentaries are but briefly expounded. Again, forasmuch as we have not always in readiness, what good authors have written upon the scriptures: and very few commentaries upon some books, and none of them upon this Institution, are to be found, or had: This Table, expounding the obscure and hard authorities, shall greatly further and help the readers. For they shall either find some ready interpretation, or some entrance whereby to search and find out the true sense. And as touching the translation, I trust it shall not seem strange to the reader, in that I have rather followed the selfe same words, as they be in the Bible, than as they are alleged by Calvin in this his institution: For he being a man most excellent well learned, and of great reading (as by his works is doth appear, how ready and familiar the Scriptures were to him) had not always the books in readiness, or being open before him, when hee wrote: neither was it necessarie that whatsoever hee did auouch out of the old or newe Testament, he should express or write it in the selfe same words: for it is sufficient, that the sense be faithfully receiued, and the true propriety of the words observed, and so to eschew the cauliinges of all men, fauing such as will finde faults in that, which in the least part cannot be followed nor observed. Being therefore perswaded, that neither hee himselfe will be offended, nor the reader mislike, if the sentences in the Bible be translated according to the Hebrew, as concerning the olde Testament, and according to the Greek, as touching the newe Testament: I have aduentured to aduance the authoritie of the Scriptures in another order (as concerning the words) than they are alleged in this book of Institutions. And therefore sometimes that which is recited in the third person, this Table doth express it in the seconde, and so contrarywise: but yet so, that the sense and meaning is always referred, which beinguerie man shall easie perceiue, if diligently and without hasty judgement, hee doe consider euery thing together: for else curious heads doe loose that fruite, which by aduised reading they might haue and receiue. And as concerning the names and numbers of the books, and of the Chapters of the olde testament, we haue not followed the common translation, but that which is moste agreeable to the Hebrew. And therefore wee doe aduance the readers, that they doe not take the firste book of the Kings, for the first of Samuel:nor the second of Kings, for the second of the same Prophets: which is so done by shen, who heretofore have quoted the Chapters in this imprinted booke, because they followed the Concordances of the Bible, called the great Concordances, which is collected according to the common translation: & by that means, as is mate evidentlie appeare to all men some booke of the old Testament are not rightlie insiulted: and the Psalmes otherwise and in another order divided, than did the Hebrewes. And forasmuch as all the principal points of religion, are in this booke copiously and faithfully expounded, wee make easie to refute the false opinions of the aduersarie. whatsoever shall come to the reading thereof, either with a minde to learn, or a desire to profite: there is no doubt, but hee shall with much profit himselfe, & helpe others: whose consciences he may so strengthen and assure, as they neede not to quail in anie point, because they be assured, that their faith is grounded upon the sure foundation of the Prophets and Apostles, who wrote and spake, being inspired by the holy ghost.

3 Abraham bequeathed God, & it was counted to him for righteousness. 3.17.8.10

4 Now to him that worketh, the wages is not counted by favour, but by debt. 3.11.20

5 But to him that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness. 3.11.3.6

6 Even as David declareth the blessedness of the man, unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying: 2.17.5. & 3.11.4. 20.22

7 Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. 3.11.11

8 Howe was it then imputed when he was circumcised, or not circumcised? &c. 4.16.3

9 After he received the signe of circumcision, as the seal of the righteousnes of the faith which he had, when he was not circumcised, &c. 4.14.5. 21.23. & 4.16.20

10 And the father of circumcision, not unto them only which are of the circumcision, &c. 4.16.12

11 For the promise he should bee the heir of the world, was not given to Abraham, or to his seed, through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. 3.14.11

12 For if they which are of the law, be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise is made of none effect. 3.21.11. & 3.13.3

13 For the law causeth wrath: for where no law is, there is no transgression. 2.7.7. & 3.11.19

14 As it is written: I have made thee a father of many nations, even before God whom he believed, who quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were. 2.10.11. & 3.15. & 3.14.3

15 And being full certified that what he had promised he was able also to performe. 3.2.31

16 Who was delivered to death for our iniquities, and is risen againe for our justification. 2.16.5. & 2.16.13. & 2.17.5

17 Then being justified by faith, we have peace towards God through our Lord Jesus Christ. 3.2.16. & 3.13.5

18 Knowing that tribulation bringeth forth patience, &c. 3.8.3

19 And hope maketh not ashamed, because the loue of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the holy Ghost, which is giuen vnto vs. 3.1.2. & 3.2.12

20 But God setteth out his loue towards vs, seeing that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for vs. 2.12. 4. & 2.16.4. & 3.4.25

21 Much more then, being now justified by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him. 2.16.5

22 For if when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Sonne, much more being reconciled, wee shall be saved by his life, 2.16.2.4.5. & 2.17.3.6. & 3.11. 21. & 3.14.6

23 As by one man sinne entred into the world, and death by sinne, and so death went over all men, forasmuch as all men have sinned. 2.1.6. 8. & 2.13.4

24 But yet the gift is not so, as the offence: for if through the offence of one many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which by one man Jesus Christ, &c. 3.5.4

25 Neither is the gift so, as which entred in by one that sinned: for the fault came of one offence unto con-condemnation, but the gift is of many offences to justification. 2.17.3. 19 For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many also be made righteous. 2.1.4. & 2.16.5. & 2.17.3. and 3.11.4. 9.12.23. and 4.14. 21 Moreover, the law entered there up to, that by offence should abound: nevertheless, where sin abounded, there grace abounded much more. 2.5.6. & 2.7.7. 2.11.7. & 2.15. 2.18. 3.3.6. & 3.3.5. & 4.16.1. 6.11. & 4.19.8. 4.15.5. 4.3.9.11. 6.3 Knowe ye not, that all we which have been baptised into Jesus Christ have been baptised into his death? 4.15.5. 4. We are buried then with him in baptism into his death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the father, so we also should walk in newness of life. 2.8. 3.1. & 2.16.7.13. & 3.3.5. & 4.16.1. 6.11. & 4.19.8. 4.15.5. 3.3.9.11. 12 Let not sin therefore reign in your mortal body, that ye should obey it in the lusts thereof. 3.3.13. 14 For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace. 3.19.6. & 4.15. 12 18 Being then made free from sin, ye are made the servants of righteousness. 3.6.3. & 3.16.2. 19 I speak after the manner of men, because of the infirmity of your flesh: for as ye have given your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity, so commit iniquity. 3.10.23. & 3.22. 12 For the wages of sin is death: but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. 2.8. 5.8.59. & 3.4.28. & 3.14.11. 7.1 Knowe ye not brethren, for I speak to them that know the law, that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth? 4.15. 7 What shall we say then? is the law sin? God forbid. Nay I know not sin but by the law: &c. 2.5.6. & 2.11. 7.2 12 Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, and just and good. 2.9.4. 14 For we know that the law is spiritual, &c. 2.8.6. 15 For I allow not that which I do: for what I would that I do not, but what I hate that I do. 2.27. 12 18 For I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing: for to will is present with me, &c. 2.9. 19 For I do not the good thing, which I would, but the evil, which I would not, that doth. 1.2.27. & 3.3.11. 20 Nowe if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but the sin that dwelleth in me. 2.2.27. 23 But I see an other law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and leading me captive into the law of sin, which is in my members. 3.3.14. 24 O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? 3.9.4. & 3.11.11. & 4.15. 3.12 8.1 Nowe then there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, which walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit. 3.1.18. & 4.15. 15.13. 3. For that which was impossible to the law, in as much as it was weak, because of the flesh, God sending his

14. We know, and we are persuaded through faith, that there is nothing unclean of itself: but to him that judgeth any thing to be unclean, to him it is unclean.

17. For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink: but righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

22. Haft thou faith? have it with thyself before God: blessest be he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth.

23. For he that doubteth is condemned, if he eateth, because he eateth not of faith: and whosoever is not of faith is sinne.

15. We which are strong, ought to bear the infirmities of the weak and not to please ourselves.

5. Now the God of patience and consolation, graunt that you be like minded one towards another, according to Christ Jesus.

6. That ye with one mind and with one mouth may praise God, even the father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

12 Now this I say, that euerie one of you saith, I am Paul, &c. 4.13.

13 Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? Neither were ye baptized into the name of Paul? 3.5.2 & 4.15.

20 Where is the wise? where is the scribe? where is the disputer of this world? &c. 2.20 21 For seeing the world by wisdom knewe not God in the wisedome of God, it pleased God by the foolishnes of preaching to save them that believing.

23 But we preach Christ crucified unto the Jews, even a stumbling-blocke, and unto the Grecians foolishness.

26 For bretheren, ye see your calling how that not many wise men after the flesh, neither mighty men, nor noble are called.

8 Which none of the princes of this world knew, but had they known? &c. 1.12.2 & 2.14.2 & 4.17.

10 But God hath revealed them vnto vs by the spirit. For the spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God. 1.13.14 & 3.2.34

11 For what man knoweth the things of a man, but the spirit of a man, which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the spirit of God. 3.2.34

12 Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God, that we might know the things that are given to vs of God. 3.2.35 & 4.8.11

13 Comparing things vnto spiritual things.

14 But the natural man perceiues not the things of the spirit of God: for they are foolishnes vnto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. 3.11.20.

16 For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he might instruct him? but we have the mind of Christ. 1.13.14 & 3.13.4

3.2 I give you myke to drinke, and not meate; for yee were not able to beare it: neither yet now are ye able.

3.19 13

3 Wherefore there is among you envying, and strife, and divisions, are ye not carnal? and walken as men? 5.4.1.14

4 For when one saith, I am Paul, another, I am Apollos; are ye not carnal, and walken as men? 4.4.2 & 4.13.14

6 I have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase. 4.14.

7 So then neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase. 2.5.25 & 4.15.6

8 And euerie man shall receive his wages according to his labour. 3.16.

3.1 O foolish Galathians, who hath bewitched you, that ye shoulde not obey the truthe, &c. 1.11.7, & 4.1.27, &c. 4.18.11

2 Receive ye the spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of the faith preached? 3.2.33, & 4.1.6

6 Yea rather as Abraham beleuved God, and it was imputed to him for rightoufnesse. 3.17.8

8 For the scriptures foreseeing, that God would iustifie the Gentiles through faith, preached before the gospell vnto Abraham, &c. 3.11.3

10 For
10 For as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse: for it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things, &c. 2.7.5. & 2.7.17. & 2.16.2. & 3.11.

12 And the law is not of faith: but the man that shall do those things shall live in them. 3.11.18. & 3.11.

13 Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, &c. 2.7.5. & 2.7.17. & 2.16.2. & 2.16.6. & 2.16.19. & 2.17.4. & 3.4.27. & 3.11.12. & 3.19.3. & 4.13.

16 Now to Abraham, and to his seed were the promises made, &c. 2.6.2. & 2.13.3. & 4.14.21

17 And this I say, that the law which was four hundred and thirty years after, can not disannul the covenant that was confirmed afore of God in respect of Christ, that it should make the promises of no effect. 3.11.20

18 For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more by the promise, but God gave it into Abraham by promise. 3.11.17

19 Wherefore then serveth the law? it was added because of the transgression, &c. 1.14.9. & 2.5.6. & 2.7.2

21 Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid, &c. 3.11. 19. & 3.4.6

22 But the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by the faith of Jesus Christ should be given to them that believe. 3.4.6

24 Wherefore the law was科目 to bring us to Christ, that we might be made righteous by faith. 2.7.2. & 2.7.11. & 2.11.5

27 For all yee that are baptised into Christ, have put on Christ. 2.1.3. & 3.1. & 4.14.7. & 4.15.6. & 4.16.21. & 4.

28 There is neither Jew nor Greece: there is neither bond nor free: there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. 2.11.11. & 4.20.1

4.1 Then this I say, that the heir as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be: 2.7.11. & 2.11.5. & 2.11.

2 But is under tutors and governors, to the time appointed of the father. 4.10.14

3 Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the rudiments of the world. 4.10.14

4 But when the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his son, born of a woman, &c. 2.7.15. & 2.7.11. & 2.12.7. & 2.13.1. & 2.13.3. & 2.17.5. & 4.20.15

5 That he might redeem them which were under the law, yea might receive the adoption, &c. 2.7.15. & 3.19.2

6 And because ye are the sons, God hath sent forth the spirit of his son into your hearts, which crieth, Abba, that is, Father. 2.14.5. & 3.1.3. & 3.2.11. & 3.13.5. & 3.20.37

7 But even then, when ye knew not God, ye did service unto whom the which by nature are not gods. 1.4.3. and 1.12.3

8 But nowe, seeing ye know God, ye are rather known of God, &c. 1.27. & 4.10.10. & 4.19.7

10 Ye observe days, & monethes, and times, and yeares. 2.8.33

11 I am in fear of you, lest I have bestowed on you labour in vain. 2.8.33

22 For it is written that Abraham had two sons, one by a servant, another by a free woman. 2.11.9. & 4.2.3

24.
By the which things, another thing is meant, for these mothers, are the two Testaments, &c. 2. 11, 9.

For Agar or Sina is a mountain in Arabia, and it answereth to Jerusalem that now is, &c. 3. 26.

But Jerusalem, which is above, is free: and is the mother of vs all. 4. 18.

We are after the manner of Isaac, children of the promise. 4. 16, 12.

Put our the servant and her sonne, &c. 3. 18, 2.

Who soeuer are justified by the law, ye are fallen from grace. 3. 19, 14.

For we through the spirite, wayte for hope of righteousness through faith. 3. 24, 3.

In Christ Jesus neither circumcision auayleth any thing, nor vn circumcision, &c. 3. 11, 20.

For brethren, ye have beene called vnto libertie: only vse not your libertie, &c. 3. 19, 11.

For all the lawe is fulfilled in one word, which is, Thou shalt loue thy neighbor as thy selfe, 2. 8, 53.

For the flesh lusteth against the spirite, and the spirite against the flesh, &c. 2. 7, 5. & 2. 22, 27.

Moreover the works of the flesh are manifest, which are adultery, fornication, uncleanness, wantonness, 2. 18. & 3. 14, 1. & 4. 15, 10.

While wee haue therefore time, let vs doe good vnto all men, &c. 6. & 3. 20, 38.

But God forbid that I should rejoice, but in the crosse of our Lorde Jesus Christ, whereby the world is crucified vnto mee, and I vnto the world. 2. 16, 7.

For in Christ Jesus, neither circumcision auayleth any thing, nor vn circumcision, &c. 4. 14, 24.

From hencefoorth let no man put me to business: for I beare in my body the marks, &c. 3. 18, 7. & 3. 25.
